

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS REPORTS

ANNOTATED

NEW SERIES.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

KRYPTOK COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
STEAD LENS COMPANY.

Preliminary injunction — discretion.

1. The granting of a preliminary injunction rests in the discretion of the trial court, not in its arbitrary, whimsical will, but in its sound judicial discretion, informed and guided by the established principles, rules, and practice of equity jurisprudence; and where the court has not departed from them, its injunctive orders may not be reversed without clear proof of an abuse of its discretion.

Injunction — protection of rights.

2. One may not be enjoined from protecting and enforcing his rights by lawful means, unless his acts to that effect are done or threatened unnecessarily, not really for the purpose of protecting his rights, but maliciously, to vex, annoy, and injure another.

Same — defense — disproportionate injury.

3. It is a good defense to an application for an injunction that the wrong and injury likely to be inflicted upon the opponent of the application by its issue will probably be greater than that which the applicant is likely to suffer from its denial.

I. Where injunction sought to restrain other infringement suits.

It will be noted that KRYPTOK Co. v. STEAD LENS Co. involved the question of a comparison of injuries as affecting the discretion of the court in issuing an injunction wherein a manufacturer, the defendant in one infringing suit, sought to restrain the commencement or prosecution of suits against his customers, involving a similar infringement. It is the purpose of this note, however, to cover not only cases of this character, but also ordinary suits to restrain infringement; since the same principles apply in both classes of cases so far as concerns the comparison by the court of the injuries and benefits to the parties therefrom.

It is well established that in a proper case the court may enjoin a multiplicity of suits against users of an alleged infringing article where a suit is also pending against the manufacturer, to enjoin the manufacture of the alleged infringing article and to recover profits and damages on account of the manufacture and sale

Patent — infringement — suit against users.

4. The owner of a patent cannot recover in a suit against a manufacturer of an infringing article which the latter sells to retailers all the relief to which he is entitled in suits against the latter, and a suit or a decree for an injunction, gains, profits, and damages against the manufacturer is no bar to suits for infringement against those who purchase from him and use or sell the infringing article.

Injunction — against suits.

5. The owner of patents sued a manufacturer for infringement on June 11, 1909, closed its evidence in chief on April 19, 1910, threatened to bring suits against four retailers who purchased the infringing article from the defendant in October, 1910, brought one such suit in November, 1910, notified the manufacturer's customers that the article they bought of it infringed, and threatened to sue them if they did not stop selling the article.

Held, these facts furnished no just ground to enjoin the owner of the patent from prosecuting the suit against the retailer he had already commenced, or from commencing others of like character.

A PPEAL by complainant from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri, enjoining it from bringing other suits for infringement of patents. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

thereof. Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Avery Portable Lighting Co. 87 C. C. A. 206, 159 Fed. 935.

Thus, on the theory that public policy requires that the question of infringement of manufactured goods be tried in an action between the patentee and the manufacturer of the alleged infringing goods, rather than between the former and the purchaser of the goods from the latter, thereby flooding the court with suits of the latter character, a preliminary injunction has been held proper to restrain the patentee from bringing different suits against the users of the alleged infringing goods, although the issuance of the injunction might result in inconvenience or injury to the patentee. Ide v. Ball Engine Co. 31 Fed. 901.

So, in an aggravated case of threatened irreparable injury to defendant's business, or if there is evidence of malice and oppression or bad faith on the part of the plaintiff, the court may enjoin temporarily the commencement of new suits against the users of the alleged infringing article until after the trial of the case between the plaintiff and the defendant, who is the manufacturer of the article. Kelley v. Ypsilanti Dress-Stay Mfg. Co. 10 L.R.A. 686, 44 Fed. 19.

And where the result of bringing many suits for infringements against the manufacturer's customers would be the impairment or destruction of the former's rights as the successful party to a suit by the patentee against him personally, involving a similar infringement, such infringement suits will be restrained. Kessler v. Eldred, 208 U. S. 285, 51 L. ed. 1065, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611.

So, where a manufacturer, by a stipulation on the record of a suit against one of his customers, to restrain the use or sale of an article manufactured by him, on the ground that it was an infringement, is admitted to defend the suit, and a result is reached favorable to him, he may rely upon the judgment therein to obtain an injunction restraining the prosecution of similar suits against other customers, the probable damage to him from a multiplicity 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of suits against his customers being sufficient to authorize the injunction. Marshall v. Bryant Electric Co. 107 C. C. A. 599, 185 Fed. 499, writ of certiorari denied in 220 U. S. 622, 55 L. ed. 613, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 724.

And National Cash Register Co. v. Boston Cash Indicator & Recorder Co. 41 Fed. 51, asserts the power of a court of equity, by a petition in the main suit against a manufacturer, to restrain the complainant from bringing further suits against the purchasers or users of the patented article, and holds that such injunction should be granted where numerous suits brought by the complainant against the customers of the defendant are vexatious and oppressive.

The showing of injury must be very strong to induce the court, by a preliminary injunction, to restrain a patentee from bringing suits against the users of the alleged infringing articles, although a suit is also pending against the manufacturer thereof, since the loss to complainant is apt to be different, by reason of the delay in the trial of the suit against the manufacturer, and the operation of local statutes of limitation upon his rights against the users, and also because the right of the complainant to claim an accounting and reparation from the users generally dates from the commencement of his suit. Computing Scale Co. v. National Computing Scale Co. 79 Fed. 962.

It has been asserted, however, that the proper practice in such cases is to secure a postponement of the suits against the user until after a trial of the case against the manufacturer; and this may generally be done upon motion addressed to the court wherein each particular suit is pending. Ibid.

To prevent a multiplicity of suits the court may, in a proper case, and on a proper showing, restrain the prosecution of suits between the patentee and the mere user of the patented machine, to be suspended to await the result of the suit between the patentee and the principal infringer, from whom the user purchased the particular machine. A preliminary in-

Argued before Sanborn, Circuit Judge, and Marshall and William H. Munger, District Judges.

Messrs. John H. Atwood and Edward D. Ellison, for appellant:

It is only when more suits than one are instituted with a view of annoying, harassing, or oppressing a litigant, either by putting him to unnecessary expense or by attempting to terrorize his customers, that such a situation arises that the chancellor can lawfully exercise his injunctive power.

New York Filter Co. v. Schwarzwalder, 53 Fed. 579; Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Avery Portable Lighting Co. 152 Fed. 645, 87 C. C. A. 206, 159 Fed. 935; Dittgen v. Racine Paper Goods Co. 164 Fed. 85; Ameri-junction will not, however, be granted in such cases. Kelley v. Ypsilanti Dress-Stay Mfg. Co. supra.

II. Where injunction sought to restrain infringement.

a. On application for preliminary injunction.

1. In general.

In acting on applications for temporary injunctions to restrain the infringement of letters patent, there is much latitude for discretion. The application may be granted or refused unconditionally, or terms may be imposed on either of the parties as conditions for making or refusing the order. And the state of the litigation, where the plaintiff's title is denied, the nature of the improvement, the character and extent of the infringement complained of, and the comparative inconvenience which will be occasioned to the respective parties by allowing or denying the motion, must all be considered in determining whether it should be allowed or refused; and if at all, whether absolutely or upon some and what conditions." Forbush v. Bradford, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 317, Fed. Cns. No. 4,930.

In Westinghouse Air-Brake Co. v. Carpenter, 32 Fed. 484, Judge Brewer remarked that on an application for a preliminary injunction a court considers always the relative situation of the parties and the injury or benefit which may result to them either from granting or refusing the injunction.

The duty of the court to consider the convenience of the parties in granting a preliminary injunction, or in suspending the operation of an injunction pending an appeal, is also asserted in Barnard v. Gibson, 7 How. 650, 12 L. ed. 857, holding, however, that the question as to the action of the court in that regard cannot properly be raised on appeal. In replying to the contention that the decree enjoining the defendants from the use of their machines destroys their value and places them in a 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) can School Furniture Co. v. J. M. Sauder Co. 106 Fed. 731.

The discretion which is vested in a chancellor does not authorize him to grant a preliminary injunction in any and all kinds of cases, with or without a reasonable showing.

Logansport v. Uhl, 99 Ind. 539, 50 Am. Rep. 109; Baxter v. Chicago Bd. of Trade, 83 Ill. 149; Brown v. Newall, 2 Myl. & C. 568, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. 348, 1 Jur. 422; Lowenfeld v. Curtis, 72 Fed. 105; Russell v. Farley, 105 U. S. 433, 26 L. ed. 1060.

Messrs. Wash Adams and Theoph. L. Carns, for appellee:

The law protects manufacturers from assaults upon customers by a rival owning even an adjudicated patent, pending the remediless condition, and that many thousands of dollars have been invested in the machinery which, by such procedure, becomes useless, the court said: "The hardship stated is an unanswerable objection to the operation of the injunction until all the matters shall be finally adjusted. If the injunction has been inadvertently granted the circuit court has power to suspend it or set it aside, until the report of the master shall be sanctioned. And unless the defendants below are in doubtful circumstances and cannot give bond to respond in damages for the use of the machines, should the right of the plaintiff be finally established, we suppose that the injunction will be suspended. Such is a correct course of practice, as indicated by the decisions of this court, and that is a rule of decision for the circuit court."

It is sufficient to induce the court to refuse to grant a preliminary injunction if it appears that there would be at least as much probability of its doing irreparable mischief as preventing it. North v. Kershaw, 4 Blatchf. 70, Fed. Cas. No. 10,311.

2. As affected by the merits.

(a) Clearness or doubt as to validity of patent or fact of infringement.

An application for a preliminary injunction to restrain the infringement of a patent imposes upon the applicant the burden of establishing the validity of his patent, which generally requires proof either of favorable decisions thereon by the court in which the application was presented, although in some other case, or by some other court of concurrent jurisdiction. He must also clearly show the actual fact of infringement by the defendant, and also usually show that on a comparison by the court of the advantages and disadvantages resulting to the parties and to the public from issuing the injunction, the equities are with him. Columbia Wire Co. v. Freeman Wire Co. 71 Fed. 302.

A court is more apt to balance conven-farther juridical determination of its validity.

Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Avery Portable Lighting Co. 152 Fed. 642, 87 C. C. A. 206, 159 Fed. 935; Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. v. Rubber Tire Wheel Co. 164 Fed. 871; Kessler v. Eldred, 206 U. S. 285, 51 L. ed. 1065, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611; Dittgen v. Racine Paper Goods Co. 164 Fed. 89; Rubber Tire Wheel Co. v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. 106 C. C. A. 318, 183 Fed. 978.

An appellate court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of a chancellor in refusing to dissolve an injunction, either absolutely or upon condition of giving security, unless there is manifest error in the conclusion reached by him.

iences and compare injuries to the parties in exercising its discretion in granting or refusing a preliminary injunction where the validity of the complainant's patent or claim of infringement is not entirely free from doubt. Morris v. Lowell Mfg. Co. 3 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 67, Fed. Cas. No. 9,833; Howe v. Morton, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 586, Fed. Cas. No. 6,769; North v. Kershaw, 4 Blatchf. 70, Fed. Cas. No. 10,311; Parker v. Sears, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 93, Fed. Cas. No. 10,748.

Hence, where the right of the complainant under its patent, and the violation thereof by the defendant, are not clear, plain, and manifest, and by granting an injunction there would be a greater probability of producing incalculable mischief than there would be of preventing it, neither an absolute nor conditional injunction ought to be granted. Day v. Candee, 3 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 9, Fed. Cas. No. 3,676.

And in such a case a preliminary injunction will not issue if the result therefrom will be to put in jeopardy the defendant's business, where the complainant can be compensated in damages and the defendant is financially responsible. George Ertel Co. v. Stahl, 13 C. C. A. 29, 24 U. S. App. 563, 65 Fed. 517; Standard Elevator Co. v. Crane Elevator Co. 6 C. C. A. 100, 9 U. S. App. 556, 56 Fed. 718.

Nor where the patent has never been adjudicated and proof of public acquiescence is inadequate, and there is a controversy upon the claim of infringement, and the defendants have been for years in a business which will be seriously injured by the injunction, and there is no proof that they are not pecuniarily responsible. Johnson v. Aldrich, 40 Fed. 675.

In some jurisdictions the rule has been asserted that where the validity of the patent is fully established and the infringement is clear, the owner has the right to protection by injunction, although it may cause great injury to the infringer. Potter v. Fuller, 2 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 251, Fed. Cas. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ritter v. Ulman, 24 C. C. A. 71, 42 U. S. App. 263, 78 Fed. 222; Bradshaw v. Miners' Bank, 23 C. C. A. 578, 46 U. S. App. 663, 77 Fed. 932.

The order of injunction will not be reversed unless it appears that the legal discretion of the lower court was improvidently exercised.

Thompson v. Nelson, 18 C. C. A. 137, 37 U. S. App. 478, 71 Fed. 339; Southern P. Co. v. Earl, 27 C. C. A. 185, 48 U. S. App. 716, 82 Fed. 690; Rahley v. Columbia Phonograph Co. 58 C. C. A. 639, 122 Fed. 625.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 11, 1909, Kryptok Company, a corporation; exhibited a bill in the court

No. 11,327; Potter v. Whitney, 1 Low. Dec. 87, Fed. Cas. No. 11,341.

In the cases applying the rule, however, there has generally appeared some fact or circumstances disentitling the defendant to invoke the equitable consideration of the court.

Thus where the validity of a patent and the infringing character of the articles complained of are conclusively established against the defendant by the decision of the court of appeals of another district, and no certiorari to the Supreme Court having been allowed, the decision is by the court of last resort, a preliminary injunction will be issued restraining the defendant from using in his business infringing articles which he bought from the manufacturer, who was the defendant in the suit mentioned. Under such circumstances the fact that it may take time and trouble to locate and remove the infringing articles is no defense to the application for injunction, since that is a risk the user of the infringing article always takes. The defendant, however, being a municipality, and public convenience requiring that the removal shall be by instalments, the injunction will be so framed. National Meter Co. v. Poughkeepsie, 75 Fed. 405, affirmed in 32 C. C. A. 463, 45 U. S. App. 761, 89 Fed. 1014.

If the validity of a patent and the fact of infringement are clear, it is no objection to the issuance of a preliminary injunction that the defendant, relying upon the opinion of experts that the article he manufactures is not an infringement, has expended large sums of money in preparing to make use of the infringing machinery. Norton v. Eagle Automatic Can Co. 57 Fed. 929.

That great hardship will be imposed upon the defendants if a preliminary injunction be issued against them is not a valid reason for not issuing the same, where the validity of the patent and the fact of infringement are clear and many of the defendants were officers in another company which some time previously was adjudged guilty of the same infringement, such offi-below at Kansas City, in the state of Missouri, against Stead Lens Company, another corporation, for infringement of letters patent Nos. 637,444 and 876,933, on improvements in bifocal lenses, and prayed for an injunction and an accounting of gains and profits and for damages. On September 9, 1909, the Stead Company answered, and denied the validity of the patents and its alleged infringement of them. On April 19, 1910, Kryptok Company closed its evidence in chief, and any delay thereafter in the proceedings in the case seems to have been attributable to the Stead Company. That company was a manufacturer of bifocal lenses alleged to infringe the patents, and Hausman & Company, a corporation of Pennsylvania, was one of their customers, that bought the lenses of the Stead Company at wholesale and sold them at retail. In November, 1910, about seventeen months after it instituted its suit against the Stead Company, and about seven months after it closed its evidence in chief in that suit, Kryptok Company brought a suit, in Philadelphia, against Hausman & Company, for infringement of the patents. Thereupon the Stead Company filed a petition and affidavits in the suit in Kansas City, and prayed that the Kryptok Company be enjoined from prosecuting its suit against Hausman & Company, and from beginning any other suits against others who were purchasing bifocal lenses of the Stead Company; and upon this petition, these affidavits and counter affidavits presented by cers thereafter entering upon the present enterprise. United Indurated Fibre Co. v. Whippany Mfg. Co. 83 Fed. 485, reversed in 30 C. C. A. 615, 57 U. S. App. 270, 87 Fed. 215, on the ground that the complainant's case was not clear, and it did not appear that the decisions relied upon construed the patent in accordance with the present claims of the complainant, and broad enough to cover defendants' process.

Where the defendant stands fair before the court, it is generally held not to be a matter of course to issue a preliminary injunction to restrain the use of an alleged infringing article, although a prima facie showing is made of the right of the patentee to the thing patented, and of the violation thereof by the defendant, but it must also appear, if the injunction is not issued, that complainants will be irreparably injured, and that no subsequent decree of the court can sufficiently ascertain and make good their damages; especially where the result of the injunction would be greatly to injure the defendant or the public.

Thus, even if the court regards the complainant's claim both as to the validity of the patent and infringement to be well established, a comparison of advantages and injuries resulting to the parties from a preliminary injunction will nevertheless be made, and may result in the denial of the injunction. Morris v. Lowell Mfg. Co. 3 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 67, Fed. Cas. No. 9,833.

And even when complainant's title is clear, if there are peculiar circumstances showing that the defendant's interests would be very injuriously affected by the issuance of an interlocutory injunction, while the interests of the complainant would not be so affected by refusing it, the court, in its discretion, may refuse it. (Injunction to restrain manufacture and sale of machine.) Potter v. Whitney, 1 Low. Dec. 87. 3 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 77, Fed. Cas. No. 11,341.

As to the effect of fully establishing the validity of a patent upon the right to a preliminary injunction to restrain its infringement, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fringement, the rule is thus stated in Morse v. Lowell Mfg. Co. supra: "In granting or refusing a preliminary injunction, the court will carefully consider the situation of the parties. Its important office is to preserve the rights of the patentee pending the litigation of his title. If the title has already been fully established, or is otherwise so clear that no reasonable doubt of its validity remains, a court of equity would, in many cases, grant such an injunction, as it would a final injunction, notwithstanding the injury which might result to the defendant. But where there is no danger of loss to the plaintiff, and great loss will result to the defendant, the case must be substantially free from doubt to require such action."

In granting an interim injunction, the court will cautiously consider the degree of convenience and inconvenience to the parties therefrom, and according to the doubt which may exist in the mind of the court upon the facts, and according to the degree of inconvenience to the parties, the court will be guided. Birdson v. McAlpine, 8 Beav. 229.

And where a reasonable question is raised as to the validity of a patent, a preliminary injunction to restrain an alleged infringement thereof will not issue, where the issuance thereof will work great injury to the defendant, without corresponding benefit to the complainant, and the complainant can be adequately protected without it. Swift v. Jenks, 19 Fed. 641 (proceedings by one manufacturer against another, to restrain the manufacture of an alleged infringing article).

Nor where the decisions affecting the validity of the patent leave the matter in some doubt, and a preliminary injunction would result in breaking up an extensive business established by the defendants, and the complainant has established a license fee for the use of the invention, so that, if a final decree is in its favor, it will have a remedy by way of royalty. Eastern Paper Bag Co. v. Nixon, 35 Fed. 752.

Nor where the validity of the patent is in substantial controversy, and the issuance Kryptok Company, the court below entered an order whereby it enjoined Kryptok Company from proceeding farther with its suit against Haussman & Company, and from commencing any suits for infringement of its patents against any of the purchasers of bifocal lenses of Stead Company until the final decree should be rendered in the suit of the Kryptok Company against the Stead Company. From this order the Kryptok Company has appealed to this court.

The grant of a preliminary injunction rests in the discretion of the trial court, not in its arbitrary, whimsical will, but in its sound judicial discretion, informed and guided by the established principles, rules, and practice of equity jurisprudence; and where the court has not departed from them, its injunctive orders may not be reversed without clear proof of an abuse of its discretion.

Established principles of equity jurisprudence are (1) that one may not be enjoined from doing lawful acts to protect and enforce his rights of property or of person, unless his acts to that effect are clearly shown to be done unnecessarily, not for the purpose of preserving and enforcing his rights, but maliciously, to vex, annoy, and injure another; and (2) that where the injury to the applicant if the preliminary injunction is refused will probably be greater than the injury to the opponent if it is granted, it should be issued; while if the contrary is the probable result, the application for it should be denied. Rus- of the injunction would result in great injury to the defendant, who is financially able to respond to any claim against him. Diamond Match Co. v. Union Match Co. 129 Fed. 602.

But a patentee who has established the validity of his patent against the manufacturer of an infringing article will not be compelled to litigate the same question over again against scores or hundreds of users, or denied the only relief which can secure him the fruits of his invention during its lifetime, merely because the injunction prayed for is in form pendente lite, even though the issuance thereof will result in personal inconvenience to the defendant, as well as inconvenience to the public at large. Westinghouse Air Brake Co. v. Great Northern R. Co. 86 Fed. 132.

A preliminary injunction will issue against the manufacturer of an article alleged to infringe a patent, although the latter is of doubtful validity, the public, however, having acquiesced in the patent for a long period, and its validity having been sustained in different proceedings at law, although in granting the injunction the risk is run of doing considerable damage to defendant by his work being stopped for a long period, where, on the other hand, the refusal of an injunction might occasion injury to the plaintiff to an indefinite extent, it appearing that the injunction had been withheld on defendant's promise to give a bond to account to the plaintiff for all damages occasioned by the infringement, should the final decision be in favor of the plaintiff, and that the defendant has failed to give this bond, and the fact of his solvency is not clear. Newall v. Wilson, 2 DeG. M. & G. 282.

If the question of infringement is not clear, and a preliminary injunction will greatly interfere with the business of the defendant, whose financial responsibility is unquestioned, no preliminary injunction will issue. Williams v. McNeely, 56 Fed. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

265; Rogers Typographic Co. v. Mergenthaler Linotype Co. 58 Fed. 693.

Or where there is a question as to the infringement, and the defendant is financially responsible, and the extent of the injury to the complainant will be the depriving of his royalty or license fee, and this without reference to the effect of the injunction upon the defendant. Overweight Counterbalance Elevator Co. v. Cahill & H. Elevator Co. 86 Fed. 338; Scoville Mfg. Co. v. Patent Button Co. 99 Fed. 743.

Nor where the fact of infringement is in controversy, and there would be no serious, irreparable damage to complainant prior to the trial of the case on the merits, providing the defendant gives security to answer to the complainant for all damages from the infringement. Motion Picture Patents Co. v. New York Motion Picture Co. 174 Fed. 51.

Although, for the purposes of an application for a preliminary injunction, the validity of a patent alleged to be infringed may be unquestioned, and it may receive a broad construction, nevertheless, where the defendant denies the infringement, and the fact of infringement is not clear, and it further appears that the patent will soon expire, the issuance of the injunction will be denied, where it would result in great loss to the defendant. American Sulphite Pulp Co. v. Great Northern Paper Co. 159 Fed. 167.

(b) Doubt as to miscellaneous facts.

When the court has serious doubts as to the validity of contested claims, a preliminary injunction will not issue where the result would be a serious interference with the business of one manufacturer in order to strengthen the business of another. Welsbach Light Co. v. Benedict & B. Mfg. Co. 82 Fed. 747.

In Schalkenbach v. National Ventilating Co. 129 App. Div. 389, 113 N. Y. Supp. 352, a preliminary injunction the purpose of which was to restrain the defendant from manufacturing in violation of the terms of a license was denied where the fact of sell v. Farley, 105 U. S. 433, 438, 26 L. ed. 1060, 1061; Shubert v. Woodward, 92 C. C. A. 509, 522, 167 Fed. 47, 60; Blount v. Société Anonyme, 3 C. C. A. 455, 458, 6 U. S. App. 335, 53 Fed. 98, 101.

The Stead Company, by its petition, based its application for this injunction upon two grounds: upon the proposition of law that in this suit against it Kryptok Company could procure all the relief it was entitled to obtain for the infringement of its patents by the Stead Company and by Hausman & Company and the other customers of Stead Company who bought the infringing article of it at wholesale and sold it at retail, and upon the averment of the fact that the Kryptok Company had brought the suit against Hausman & Company and threatened to bring like suits against three other customers of the Stead Company, and had notified and were notifying its customers that they were infringing its patents, and had threatened and were threatening its customers with like suits for infringement, not for the purpose of protecting and enforcing its rights under its patents, but for the sole purpose of vexing and annoying the Stead Company, which was morally bound to defend the suits against its customers, and of maliciously injuring its business. The proposition of law which the Stead Company relied upon was an error of law. There was no denial that the patents were issued, and from their issue the legal presumption arose that they were valid. While infringement the violation was not clear, and the defendant would sustain far greater damage by the issuance of the injunction than would the plaintiff by its denial.

To protect an unadjudicated patent where the defense involves such a pure question of fact as whether the complainant was the individual inventing the device, a temporary injunction will not issue where the result would be severe loss to defendant if his position should be substantiated, and the interval before final hearing need not be sufficiently long to occasion the complainant any substantial loss. Meyers v. Skinner, 179 Fed. 860.

Nor where the outcome of the proceeding to enjoin the infringement will ultimately turn upon a defense as to which the preliminary proofs are very conflicting, and the defendant is a mere user of the alleged infringing article, and no special injury to complainant from such use is alleged or shown. Jefferson Electric Light, Heat, & P. Co. v. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. 67 C. C. A. 189, 134 Fed. 392 (a preliminary injunction was granted in this case on final hearing, 135 Fed. 365, affirmed in 71 C. C. A. 481, 139 Fed. 385).

3. Effect of laches of complainant or plaintiff.

Laches and tacit, not to say express, acquiescence in the use of a patent by the defendant, estops the plaintiff from equitably demanding a preliminary injunction to restrain further infringement. Keyes v. Eureka Consol. Mfg. Co. 45 Fed. 199, affirmed in 158 U. S. 150, 39 L. ed. 920, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 772.

The plaintiff, by standing by for many years without complaint or demand for compensation, furnishes conclusive evidence that the continuance of the use of his invention for a few weeks, or even months, longer, if paid for in the end, will not be an injury of such an irreparable nature as to require the issuance of a preliminary injunction, especially where the issuance of the injunction would suddenly stop large mills and manufactories, causing great and 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) irreparable injury not only to the defendants, but to the public at large, without any corresponding benefit to the plaintiff, whose interest it is that the defendants should use his invention if they pay him for it. Parker v. Sears, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 93, Fed. Cas. No. 10,748.

A preliminary injunction will not be granted to restrain the use of alleged infringing machines where such use has been acquiesced in for over nine years, during which the defendant has built up a large industry, and where he is financially solvent and responsible for any judgment against him. Keyes v. Pueblo Smelting & Ref. Co. 31 Fed. 560.

Where the defendant has invested large sums in its business with the knowledge of the complainants, and the latter have been guilty of inexcusable laches in asserting and maintaining their rights, if the defendant is amply responsible, and will suffer greater injury from the issuance of the injunction than will the complainants from its refusal, a preliminary injunction will be refused, even though it is conceded that the defendant has not succeeded in casting serious doubts upon the validity of the complainants' patent. Hurlburt v. Carter, 39 Fed. 802.

4. When equities favor complainant or plaintiff.

Where the validity of a patent has been sustained in different courts, and the fact of infringement is clear, a preliminary injunction will not be withheld on the grounds that the infringement complained of is so small (being against a mere user of articles valued at $22) that it does not seriously imperil the complainant's business, where the effect of the injunction will not seriously imperil defendant's business. Carter & Co. v. Wollschlaeger, 53 Fed. 573.

A preliminary injunction will be granted to restrain a manufacturer from manufacturing and selling an article alleged to infringe a patent of the complainants, where much more injury would or might result to the complainants from a refusal was denied, the legal right to sue and to prosecute suits for infringement to a hearing must be admitted in the consideration of this injunction, because thus only could that issue ever be tried or determined. Kryptok Company therefore had the legal right to sue Haussman & Company and every other purchaser and retailer from Stead Company of the infringing lenses, and if it proved their infringement, it had the right to an injunction forbidding each of them from selling or using any of the lenses, and to a recovery of the gains and profits each of them had made by purchasing and selling them, and to the damages it had sustained by their infringement. It is always difficult to prove the gains and profits an infringer obtains, and the damages suffered by the owner of a patent from the sales of the infringing article are equally difficult to prove, so that the most valuable relief to which he is entitled in equity is the injunction against further infringement. Such an injunction against the retailers Kryptok Company could not secure in its suit against Stead Company. It might in that suit recover the gains and profits Stead Company had acquired by its manufacture and sale to its customers of the infringing lenses, and the damage Stead Company had inflicted thereby, but it could not in that suit recover the gains and profits the purchasers from the Stead Company had made, nor the damages their infringement had inflicted. The owner of a patent cannot recover, in a suit of the injunction than to the defendants by granting it, it appearing that the defendants have very little invested in their business, and no substantial damages would be apt to accrue to them, while, if they were to go on with the business as competitors, they might seriously injure the complainant's business, and in the end, perhaps, not be able to respond in damages, and there might also be a class of damages for which complainants could not be entirely compensated, they being manufacturers. Irwin v. Dane, 2 Biss. 442, 4 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 359, Fed. Cas. No. 7,081.

If the validity of a patent has been established in different actions, and the fact of the infringement is clear, a preliminary injunction will issue where the issuance thereof will be attended with but slight loss to the defendant, a manufacturer of the alleged infringing article, while the denial thereof will be productive of great loss to the complainant, a manufacturer of the invention. Hat Sweat Mfg. Co. v. Davis Sewing Mach. Co. 32 Fed. 401.

A manufacturer will be restrained by a preliminary injunction from using in his manufacturing business alleged infringing machines, where he has not yet commenced the use of the machines, while, on the other hand, the complainant has been using his invention for a long period of time, and has built up a large trade in the product of such invention. Columbia Wire Co. v. Freeman Wire Co. 71 Fed. 302.

So, where the complainants are the owners of the patents alleged to be infringed, and are manufacturing under them, and have been engaged in such manufacture for some time, and the defendant entered upon the manufacture of the competing article just prior to the commencement of the suit, and has invested very little money in it, and acquired no reputation for his manufacture in that line, a preliminary injunction will issue, it being apparent that much more injury would or might result to the complainants from a refusal of an injunction than to the defendant by granting it. Irwin v. Dane, supra.

new one, while the complainants' is old and well established, there is generally less hardship in enjoining the former's business until a hearing upon the merits, than in permitting the infringement to continue to the injury of the complainants. Plimpton v. Spiller, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 286, 35 L. T. N. S. 656, 25 Week. Rep. 152.

Where the complainant is the manufacturer of an invention and the defendant is engaged in selling the infringing article, a preliminary injunction will issue, since, under such circumstances, it is manifest that a refusal thereof would work great and perhaps irreparable injury to complainant's business, while it is not easy to perceive how the defendant, being a merchant, and not a manufacturer, can be materially injured by being required to discontinue his sales until the question of infringement is finally determined. Covert v. Curtis, 25 Fed. 43.

5. When equities favor defendant.

(a) Where plaintiff in business of licensing invention.

Generally, where the defendant does not make or vend the alleged infringing machine, but only uses it, so that the injury to the plaintiff is merely the loss of royalty, and not damage from a constantly increasing competition, an injunction will not issue if the loss or inconvenience to the defendant will be great. Forbush v. Bradford, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 317, Fed. Cas. No. 4,930; Morris v. Lowell Mfg. Co. 3 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 87, Fed. Cas. No. 9,833 (burring machine); Neilson v. Thompson, Webster, Pat. Cas. 278.

Where the nature of a machine alleged to infringe a patent is such, and it is intended to be put to such a use, that the use thereof will not be injurious to the complainant, and he can be fully compensated for any injury from the infringement, since the injury, if any, will be merely the value of the royalty, a preliminary in-

against a manufacturer of an infringing article which he sells to retailers, the full relief to which he is entitled in suits against the retailers, and a decree for an injunction and damages against a manufacturer is no bar to suits against those who purchase from the manufacturer and use or sell to others. Birdsell v. Shaliol, 112 U. S. 485, 488, 28 L. ed. 768, 769, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244. The proposition of law, therefore, on which the petition for this injunction is based, must fall.

The evidence fairly established these facts: Kryptok Company, in October, 1910, more than eleven months after it sued Stead Company, and more than five months after it closed its evidence in chief, notified Stead Company that it would sue four of the purchasers from it if it did not stop its alleged infringement, and in November, 1910, it sued one of them. But it had the legal right to sue them, and to endeavor by such suits to obtain an injunction to stop their alleged continuing trespass upon its rights. It notified many of the customers of the Stead Company that the lenses they were buying of that company were infringements of its patents, and that if they did not cease dealing in them it would sue them for infringement. But there was danger that if, knowing of their infringement, it failed to give these notices, it might thereby lose its right to recover the gains and profits they made anterior to the filing of its bills against them. Layton Pure Food Co. v. Church & D. Co. 32 L.R.A. (N.S.)

junction will be denied. (Machine used in dredging operations.) Morris v. Shelbourne, 8 Blatchf. 266, 4 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 377, Fed. Cas. No. 9,836.

So, where the complainant is not a user of the patented article, but seeks to benefit under the patent by licensing the use thereof by others, and the parties are wide apart in their views as to the proper amount of royalty to be paid, a preliminary injunction against the continued use of articles then in use will not be issued, although the acquirement and use of similar articles will be restrained. Campbell Printing Press & Mfg. Co. v. Manhattan R. Co. 47 Fed. 663.

And even though the court has serious doubts as to the good faith of the defendant, if the complainant does not use his patent as a monopoly, but grants licenses to others to use it, and there is some doubt on the question of prior use, a preliminary injunction will be withheld, providing the defendant gives security to answer for any judgment for damages recovered against him. Greenwood v. Bracher, 5 Bann. & Ard. 302, 1 Fed. 856.

It has been asserted that while the fact that the plaintiff grants licenses at a fixed sum, and that the defendant is not the maker and vendor, but only uses the machine, is of itself a circumstance to be taken into account by the court in exercising its discretion in ordering a preliminary injunction, nevertheless that is not a sufficient reason to refuse the writ, except in combination with other circumstances, either of doubt as to title or of hardship in the operation of the injunction. Howe v. Newton, 2 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 531, Fed. Cas. No. 6,771.

A preliminary injunction will issue restraining the use of a patent by a licensee, fraudulently procured, or by anyone holding under such licensee, taking with notice of the charge of fraud, and such relief will be given without reference to the injury thereby caused the defendant. Consolidated Fruit-Jar Co. v. Whitney, 1 Bann. & Ard. 356, Fed. Cas. No. 3,132.

(b) Where defendant is mere user of article.

An important circumstance to be considered in determining whether, in the exercise of its discretion, an injunction should be granted restraining the use of an alleged infringing machine, is the fact that defendant does not make or sell it, but only uses it in his business; since in such case injury to the complainant from the infringement is generally the mere loss of royalty rather than any damage from a constantly increasing competition. Morris v. Lowell Mfg. Co. 3 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 67, Fed. Cas. No. 9,833.

In Sanders v. Logan, 2 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 167, Fed. Cas. No. 12,295, equity jurisdiction was denied where a bill praying for an injunction and accounting was based on the use of machines containing parts alleged to infringe complainant's invention, and the only injury to complainant's right was not in using his invention, since it was for his interest that the invention should be used, but the injury was rather in the failure to pay the license charge for the use of it. The court said that as a remedy, an injunction should be administered only for prevention or protection, and where it is not necessary for these purposes, it is merely vindictive, injuring one party without benefit to the other, and added: "There are many cases of patents where it is the only efficient remedy to protect the patentee, and prevent continuing trespasses on his rights. But there are others in which it answers neither purpose, and is only used for extortion or vengeance. A chancellor who would issue an injunction to stop a mill or manufactory, locomotive or steam engine, because in their construction some patented device or machine has been used, would act with more than doubtful discretion. Stopping the mill or steam engine might inflict irreparable injury, but could not benefit the inventor. The compensation to him for this trespass on his rights is the price of a license. The wrong done him is not the use of his invention, 274, 104 C. C. A. 475, 481, 182 Fed. 35, 41, and cases there cited.

The result is that all the acts of Kryptok Company were justified by the law, were well calculated to and tended to preserve and enforce its legal rights under its patents, and these acts fail to convince that they were not done for that purpose, or that they were done unnecessarily and maliciously, for the sole purpose of annoying and vexing Stead Company and injuring their business.

Finally, it is a good defense to an application for a preliminary injunction that the wrong and injury likely to be inflicted upon the opponents of the application by its issue are greater than those which the applicant is likely to suffer from its denial.

but the nonpayment of a given sum of money. To issue an injunction in such a case, where neither prevention nor protection is sought or required, but only compensation, would be an abuse of power. An injunction is not to be used as an execution or for extortion."

Considering this point in Parker v. Sears, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 93, Fed. Cas. No. 10,748, the court said: "The issuing of an interlocutory injunction is always a matter of discretion with the court, and depends on the peculiar circumstances of each case. To suspend the operation of a single mill or manufactory, but for a week or two, because some wheel, bucket, or other small portion of its machinery may chance to infringe some dormant patent, would be a doubtful exercise of discretion, where the benefits to result from it to the complainant are so comparatively trifling, and his loss, if any, so perfectly capable of compensation. How much more so when we are called upon to stop the operations of one hundred."

On the same point in Neilson v. Thompson, Webster, Pat. Cas. 278, Lord Cottenham said that stopping the works under such circumstances is just inverting the purpose for which an injunction is used, since an injunction is used for the purpose of preventing mischief, and this would be using the injunction for the purpose of creating mischief, because the plaintiff cannot possibly be injured.

Where the alleged infringement is in the use of an article in connection with other machinery in the defendant's business, and hence the only damage to the plaintiff should he establish the infringement, is the loss of his royalty, while to enjoin the operation of the machinery would be to cause great loss to the defendant, a preliminary injunction will not issue. Consolidated Roller-Mill Co. v. Richmond City Mill-Works, 40 Fed. 474.

Nor where the alleged infringing article is but a part of a large machine upon which the daily newspaper of the defendant is printed, and a change of this part of it, though possible, is difficult, and might embarrass

The only loss which Stead Company would probably have sustained by the prosecution of the suit against Hausman & Company and the commencement of the threatened suits against three of its other customers, if the injunction had been denied, would have been the cost of defending those suits, which cost, it alleges, it was morally, but not legally, bound to pay. The loss which Kryptok Company will probably sustain from the issue and continuance of the injunction, if its bills are well founded, will be the postponement of its injunction against the infringement by these customers of its patents for several years, and the loss of those gains and profits made by those customers which it is unable eventually to prove. The evidence is not conbarrass his usual course of business and cause him much expense, and would be of no especial advantage to the plaintiffs, since they do not use printing machines, but make and sell them in the market, and hence, whatever they are entitled to in the way of damage amounts in effect to a royalty. Hoe v. Boston Daily Advertiser Corp. 14 Fed. 914.

Nor where the defendant is not engaged in manufacturing and selling the alleged infringing article, and hence does not interfere with the business of complainants by competition or otherwise, and does not injure their business or impair the present value of profits which they derive from their monopoly, but he has merely a single machine connected with and used for lighting his private residence, and it would be a great inconvenience to him and of no legitimate advantage to complainants to compel him to discontinue such use. Gilbert & B. Mfg. Co. v. Bussing, 12 Blatchf. 426, Fed. Cas. No. 5,416.

Nor when the use is of but one machine and the defendant is neither forestalling the market, competing with the complainants, nor multiplying suits for infringement in event the claim of infringement is established, and the use of the machine in his business is of great importance thereto, and the effect of an injunction would be to close up suddenly the defendant's business, thereby causing him great damage as well as being productive of great expense and inconvenience to third parties, and the complainants have none of the machines on hand, and neither manufacture nor use any of them, and hence their only injury, if injured, is the deprivation of the value of the license to use the machine. Hockholzer v. Eager, 2 Sawy. 361, Fed. Cas. No. 6,556.

Nor where the defendants are pecuniarily responsible, and are not manufacturers of the alleged infringing article, but are simply using it in their business. Nilsson v. Jefferson, 78 Fed. 366.

Nor when the use is of machinery in a large manufacturing plant, the enjoining of which would produce great mischief, for vincing that the probable loss of the Stead Company from the denial is greater than that of the Kryptok Company from the granting of the injunction.

No case has been cited that sustains an injunction of the character here in question under a similar state of facts. In Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Avery Portable Lighting Co. (C. C.) 152 Fed. 642, upon which counsel for the Stead Company seem to rely, the suit against the manufacturer was instituted on July 24, 1906, and within three months the complainant had brought ten suits against purchasers from the defendant, and threatened more. Perhaps those facts indicated a purpose unnecessarily and maliciously to annoy the defendant and injure its business. But, even so, the court granted an injunction against the commencement of more such suits only, and refused to enjoin the prosecution of the ten that had already been commenced. There is a wide difference between a case in which ten suits against customers of the defendant are brought within three months after the bill against a manufacturer is filed, and probably before the complainant has made his prima facie case, and one in which no such suit is instituted until seventeen months after the bill is filed, and more than six months after the complainant has closed its case in chief.

Because the proposition of law upon which Stead Company founded its petition for the injunction was an error, because the evidence in the petition and affidavits fail which, if the suit should terminate in favor of the defendant, there would be no remedy, where, on the other hand, there is no doubt of their pecuniary ability to pay any damages awarded against them by reason of such use. Essex Hosiery Mfg. Co. v. Dorr Mfg. Co. Fed. Cas. No. 4,533.

So, a preliminary injunction will not issue although the validity of the patent and the fact of the infringement are fully established in another suit to which the defendant is not a party, where the defendant is using a large number of machines in its manufacturing business, the use of which is necessary to enable it to fill large orders booked for the future, and the complainant is unable at once to furnish to the defendant machines of its own manufacture, since, under such circumstances, the enforcement of the complainant's naked right to an injunction is not necessary to enable it to recover the profits and damages to which it is entitled as against the defendant, and to award the injunction would result in throwing out of employment a great number of persons, thereby causing much suffering and distress, and would bring to a stop a useful industry, prevent the performance of contracts, and cause a disarrangement of business beyond that which is under the direct control of the defendant. Huntington Dry-Pulverizer Co. v. Alpha Portland Cement Co. 91 Fed. 534. In this case the complainant suggested as a measure of relief that it would build for defendant enough machines of the complainant's device to take the place of the infringing machines then used by the defendant, and offered to consent that the injunction order operate against the infringing machines only when it should furnish machines of its own device, capable of doing the work then being performed by those in use, and that, as the work of each infringing machine was provided for by its patented device, such supplanted machine should fall within the scope of the order, and its further use be discontinued. The court, however, did not give relief along this line, merely remarking that the estimated cost of the machines was a very large sum of money, and it did not appear within what time they could be built and when ready for use, nor whether they could advantageously be erected upon the defendant's premises.

Where there can be no difficulty in ascertaining the loss to complainants by the use by the defendant of cars claimed to infringe complainants' patent, and to restrain the use thereof pendente lite would unnecessarily deprive the defendant of the large capital invested in the building of the cars before the question of infringement is adjudicated, and the defendant is solvent, no preliminary injunction will issue. Pullman v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 4 Hughes, 236, 5 Fed. 72.

Nor where the effect of the injunction would be suddenly to stop mining operations in all the mines of a district, causing great, if not irreparable, injury to the defendants and to the public, and where the complainants' right to the invention may be fully recognized and all injury to them fully compensated by damages. Whitcomb v. Girard Coal Co. 47 Fed. 318.

Where grave doubts arise as to what the final decree on the merits of a proceeding to enjoin an infringement will be, the summary powers of the court to grant an injunction pendente lite will not be exercised where, after due regard to the injuries and advantages resulting therefrom, it appears that the injury to the complainant is slight, since the articles whose manufacture complainant seeks to restrain are quite generally manufactured by other parties and are on the open market for sale, while, on the other hand, the granting of a temporary injunction would result in great loss to defendant, a large manufacturer of the article. Johns-Pratt Co. v. Sachs Co. 155 Fed. 120.

A preliminary injunction, however, will be granted even as against the user of an alleged infringing machine, where the refusal of it would be to jeopardize complainant's market. Bresnahan v. Tripp Giant Leveller Co. 43 C. C. A. 48, 102 Fed. 899.

And it has been asserted that there are no reasons which disentitle a complainant to the remedy of a preliminary injunction to show that Kryptok Company's notices to the customers of Stead Company of their infringement and of coming suits were given, that they commenced the suit against Haussman & Company, or that their threats to sue three other customers of Stead Company were made, unnecessarily and maliciously, for the sole purpose of vexing and annoying Stead Company and injuring their business, and because it does not appear that the injury to Stead Company by refusing the injunction would probably be greater than to the Kryptok Company by granting it, the order below must be reversed.

And it is so ordered.

against the infringement of his patent by a defendant who is a user of the infringing article, when the facts are such that he would be entitled to it if the defendant were a manufacturer or a seller. Other language of the court, however, indicates an exception in the one case that would not exist in the other, since it is further stated that whenever it is manifest to the court that, upon the case made, an injunction will be granted at final hearing to the complainant, one should be awarded to him preliminarily, in the absence of facts presenting special equitable considerations to induce the court, in the exercise of judicial discretion, to withhold it. The court, however, held that there was nothing in the circumstance that defendant was merely a user of the patented invention, or that the complainant derived his profit exclusively from the manufacture and sale of the patented article, to warrant the court in refusing an injunction. Allington & C. Mfg. Co. v. Booth, 24 C. C. A. 278, 45 U. S. App. 627, 78 Fed. 878.

The effect of a prior adjudication of the validity of the same patent where the defendant is a mere user of the article is emphasized in Campbell Printing-Press Co. v. Prieth, 77 Fed. 976, holding that where the infringing machine has been installed and in operation but a few days prior to the filing of the bill, and the old machine previously used is still in defendants' possession, and at slight expense is capable of being put in condition to do their work, so that, if given a few days' time, they will be able to conduct their business as cheaply and expeditiously as before the infringing machine was installed, the loss or hardship to them is not sufficient to induce the court to deny a preliminary injunction, where the validity of the patent and the fact of infringement have been clearly established in another court of concurrent jurisdiction, since on appeal this case was reversed on the ground that the decision referred to and relied upon as establishing the validity of the patent had been reversed on appeal. 25 C. C. A. 624, 39 U. S. App. 591, 80 Fed. 539. See supra, 2, a, as to effect of clearness or doubt as to validity of patent or fact of infringement.

6. Public convenience.

Where the benefit to the complainant from enjoining the use pendente lite of the alleged infringing article is doubtful, and the injury which will thereby be occasioned the public and the defendant is certain, the injunction will not issue.

Thus, where the complainant introduced into public use a certain style of lamp for public lighting, and the use of the same by a company engaged in lighting the streets of a large city is of importance to the public, and enjoining the use thereof would result in great injury, both to the defendant and the public, and would be without direct benefit to the complainant, which is insolvent, while the defendant is solvent, a preliminary injunction will not issue. Southwestern Brush Electric Light & P. Co. v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. 45 Fed. 893.

Nor where the alleged infringer is a common carrier, and the alleged infringement is the use of an article in connection with that business, the restraining of which would not be of legitimate benefit to complainant, while it might result in great loss to the defendant, and make travel by the public more unsafe. Root v. Mt. Adams & E. P. Inclined R. Co. 40 Fed. 760.

Nor where the defendants and the public to be benefited by certain harbor improvements then under way will probably sustain heavy loss and be subjected to inconvenience by being prevented from using a dredge alleged to consist in part of machinery which infringes complainants' patent, and where, if the dredge is found not to be an infringement, the defendants and the public will have suffered deprivation of legal rights for which they will have no adequate remedy, and, on the other hand, if the complainants finally prevail, the exact amount necessary to compensate them for the infringement can be computed and recovered in an action for damages. Bowers Dredging Co. v. New York Dredging Co. 77 Fed. 980.

Nor to restrain a city from entering into a contract for paving a street with alleged infringing paving material, where by so doing the loss to the city will be considerable, while, without the injunction, all the alleged rights of the complainant may be secured if he establishes the same. Guidet v. Palmer, 10 Blatchf. 217, 6 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 82, Fed. Cas. No. 5,859.

Nor where the alleged infringing machine is used for a public purpose, to keep the roads of a large cemetery in repair, and the plaintiff's profits arise from licensing the use of the machine, for which a fixed royalty is charged, the amount of which the defendant offers to pay into court, to abide the result of the suit. Blake v. Greenwood Cemetery, 14 Blatchf. 342, Fed. Cas. No. 1,497.

Nor where it is admitted that the defendant is financially responsible, and is under contract to furnish alleged infringing articles to the government within a limited time, for use in time of war, and there is immediate and impending danger. American Ordnance Co. v. Driggs-Seabury Co. 87 Fed. 947.

Where the defendants, in the use of machinery alleged to contain infringing parts, have gradually created and developed an extensive market for the product of such machines, to the extent that if their works were stopped the market could not be supplied and serious inconvenience would result, and they have also invested large capital in the business, employing a great number of workmen, many of whom would be temporarily cut adrift if an injunction were granted, and it is difficult to see how the defendants could remove the alleged infringing apparatus without substantially dismantling and reorganizing their works, a preliminary injunction will be refused. New York Grape Sugar Co. v. American Grape Sugar Co. 20 Blatchf. 386, 10 Fed. 837.

It has, however, been held that the fact that there is an enormous demand by the public for the infringing articles, and the complainant is unable entirely to meet this demand, which would result in great inconvenience to the public, furnishes no legal excuse for a wholesale infringement of the invention, nor a valid objection to a preliminary injunction restraining the same. Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Autolux Co. 181 Fed. 387.

The fact that cars equipped with an alleged infringing article are in actual use, and to enjoin the use of the article upon such cars will result in inconvenience to the public, is not sufficient ground for denying a preliminary injunction, where the circumstances call for the issuance thereof, although that fact is a ground for the modification of the injunction as to the time of its operation, in order that the defendant may be able to substitute noninfringing material. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Union R. Co. 78 Fed. 365.

And it has been held that where the validity of a patent and the fact of the infringement have been decided by the court in a case similar to the one then presented, the consideration of either public or private convenience will have little weight on the right of complainant to a preliminary injunction. Sickels v. Tileston, 4 Blatchf. 109, Fed. Cas. No. 12,837 (injunction to prevent use of attachment to machinery on steamboat).

And that where the validity of a patent has been repeatedly sustained in different actions, and the fact of infringement is clear, the complainant, as a matter of right, is entitled to a provisional injunction, although great injury may thereby be occasioned to the infringer and also to the public. But the order for the injunction will be conditional, conditioned upon the failure of the defendant to pay a reasonable license fee for the use of the invention during the unexpired term, to be ascertained by a reference to a master. Such relief will be given although the defendants are common carriers of persons and also carriers of the mails of the United States, and their business is large and extensive, and is carried on by means of connection with other railroads, and the issuance of the injunction might result in a prolonged interruption of their business, and would do great and irreparable injury to them, and cause great detriment and inconvenience to the public, and the removal of the infringing device would endanger the safety of passengers. Hodge v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 Blatchf. 165, Fed. Cas. No. 6,560.

And although the defendant is a common carrier, nevertheless, if the validity of the patent is practically conceded, and it is apparently easy for the defendant to substitute other articles equally as efficient as the infringing devices, a preliminary injunction will be granted; in such form, however, as to allow the change to be made without undue inconvenience to the traveling public. Campbell Printing-Press & Mfg. Co. v. Manhattan R. Co. 47 Fed. 663.

So, where the defendant, although a common carrier, has known for a long period of time that it was using an infringing valve on many of its cars, and has preferred to run the risk of an injunction rather than to displace its present equipment, no equities are disclosed requiring the court to withhold a preliminary injunction, although the issuance thereof may result in hardship and inconvenience to the defendant and the public. Westinghouse Air Brake Co. v. Great Northern R. Co. 31 C. C. A. 525, 59 U. S. App. 592, 88 Fed. 258.

A preliminary injunction will be granted to restrain a common carrier from purchasing and using an alleged infringing article (vulcanized rubber car springs), except those then in use, where a prima facie showing of infringement is made out, and no ground for refusal can be founded upon any claim of inconvenience to the public or to the parties. Goodyear v. Central R. Co. 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 626, Fed. Cas. No. 5,563.

Although, by the issuance of a preliminary injunction, great loss will result to the defendant, and the public will be inconvenienced thereby, nevertheless, such injunction will issue where the court, in another case involving the same patent, after full consideration, and upon substantially similar evidence to that now presented, sustained the validity of the patent and the fact of infringement, it appearing that the operation of the injunction has already been suspended for nearly a year, thereby affording to the defendant abundant opportunity to make such changes in its machinery as to avoid further infringement. Lan- yon Zinc Co. v. Brown, 53 C. C. A. 354, 115 Fed. 150.

It is asserted in Warren Bros. Co. v. Montgomery, 172 Fed. 414, that neither a city nor the defendants are in a position to set up public inconvenience from the stoppage of work which has not yet been begun, where the contract was made with full knowledge of the claims of complainant and that an injunction would probably be sought; the court, however, held that substantial justice would be done by withholding a preliminary injunction as to the particular contract on condition that the defendants execute a bond, conditioned to pay all costs and damages ordered against them.

Where no question is made of the fact of infringement, but the issuance of a preliminary injunction is objected to on the ground that the defendant is a municipal corporation, and is using the infringing device in a public building, no equity is thereby raised in favor of the corporation against the issuance of a preliminary injunction, it also appearing that the device was installed with knowledge of the claim of infringement, and a bond was taken to hold the municipality harmless in damage by reason thereof, and other fixtures may be substituted for the infringing fixtures with very little delay. And this is true although the amount of the royalty on the infringing fixtures is not large, and the time during which the injunction will operate will be short. Pelzer v. Binghamton, 37 C. C. A. 288, 95 Fed. 823.

On a petition for a preliminary injunction to enjoin the use of an alleged infringing filtering process, the fact that the defendant is a public servant, engaged in supplying a city with water, is no ground for refusing an injunction, where it was eager for the injunction bill to be brought, and stated its desire that an application for a preliminary injunction be made, in order that the matter might be disposed of speedily. New York Filter Mfg. Co. v. Niagara Falls Waterworks Co. 26 C. C. A. 252, 51 U. S. App. 355, 80 Fed. 924.

7. Where patent soon to expire.

Another ground on which an injunction will be refused is that the patent will soon expire, and the defendant is using the alleged infringing machine in connection with other machinery which it will require considerable time for him to change, and by the time the change is completed the patent will have expired. Morris v. Lowell Mfg. Co. 3 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 67, Fed. Cas. No. 9,833; Parker v. Sears, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 93, Fed. Cas. No. 10,748; Potter v. Whitney, 1 Low. Dec. 87, Fed. Cas. No. 11,341.

Although the validity of a patent is fully established and the fact of infringement is clear, nevertheless the court will not grant a preliminary injunction where the patent will expire in four days, even though the bill was filed some time prior. National Cash-Register Co. v. Navy Cash-Register Co. 99 Fed. 565.

In such cases, the court may refuse to issue a preliminary injunction, but may require the defendants to give bonds to keep an account and pay all profits from the infringement or loss to the complainant, it appearing that all the legitimate rights of the complainant will be thereby protected. Howe v. Morton, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 586, Fed. Cas. No. 6,769.

The fact that the patent will soon expire, however, is not in all cases conclusive against the right to injunction; there may be circumstances in the conduct of the infringer which will induce the court to interfere at the very latest period to stop a fraudulent or even wilful use of a patent right. Morris v. Lowell Mfg. Co. 3 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 67, Fed. Cas. No. 9,833.

As, where the patent is for a machine to make some article of manufacture or merchandize in a cheaper method than was before known, and where the source of profit to the patentee arises from his monopoly of the article, he having no competitors in the market, the damages to the patentee by the piracy of his invention might be very great, and the court would issue an injunction on a plain case in the last month or week of the patent's life, or even after the time limited for its expiration, to restrain a sale of the machines or articles piratically manufactured in violation of the patent while it was in force. Parker v. Sears, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 93, Fed. Cas. No. 10,748.

And the fact that a patent will soon expire does not authorize the refusal of an injunction pendente lite, where its validity has been adjudicated by an appellate court, and it appears that the expired patents are improvements on an unexpired generic patent. Electric Storage Battery Co. v. Buffalo Electric Carriage Co. 117 Fed. 314.

A preliminary injunction will be granted restraining an infringement by a person who has not yet commenced to put on the market the alleged infringing goods, although there are but a few months before the expiration of the patent. Westinghouse Air-Brake Co. v. Carpenter, 32 Fed. 484.

b. Suspension of injunction on appeal.

On appeal the court may suspend the operation of a preliminary injunction where the interruption of defendant's business thereby may be attended with serious consequences and the time the patent is to run is limited. As a condition to such suspension, however, defendant will be required to give a bond to satisfy all damages caused by the infringement. Interurban R. & Terminal Co. v. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. 108 C. C. A. 298, 186 Fed. 166.

And although a patent has been sustained in an action at law, if a bill of exceptions has been taken, a court of equity will deny a motion for a preliminary injunction, where the defendants are manufacturers, and use the invention in connection with other machinery in their manufacturing business, but do not manufacture the invention itself, while the complainants manufacture the invention, but do not use it other than to sell it, and hence the particular infringement does not deprive the latter of their monopoly, but only of what they would be entitled to receive for the article or a license to use it, while, on the other hand, the defendants cannot be restrained from using the invention without being at the same time deprived of the use of the entire machinery used in connection therewith, and hence the practical effect of the injunction would be to stop the defendants' machines, thereby depriving the latter of the use of a large amount of capital invested in the business, and would also throw out of employment a large number of operators of the machine. Forbush v. Bradford, 1 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 317, Fed. Cas. No. 4,930.

Although the defendant offers to give a bond for damages should the result of a contemplated appeal be adverse to him, an injunction after decree will not be suspended even though the defendant claims the injunction will prevent him from carrying out enormous contracts then on hand, thereby destroying their connection, to his irreparable damage, where, however, it appears that he can buy the articles in the open market, and thus fulfil his contracts. Flower v. Lloyd, 36 L. T. N. 544.

c. Final Injunction.

A distinction is made in Brown v. Deere, 2 McCrary, 422, 6 Fed. 487, between a preliminary injunction and a final injunction; as to the rights of the parties with reference to the issuance thereof to restrain infringements, the former is regarded as a matter of discretion, while the latter is regarded more as a matter of strict right.

In this case, after a hearing upon the merits and a favorable decree for the complainant, the court refused to suspend an injunction although it appeared that before the hearing the defendants had entered into a large number of contracts to furnish their machines to agriculturists, and there was not adequate time for them to reconstruct same, so as to avoid the infringement, without disappointing their customers and fastening large damages upon themselves for nonfulfilment of their contracts. The court, while admitting that the plaintiff seemingly put very little value on his patent until the defendants and their associates introduced and popularized same, nevertheless held that plaintiff's rights existed and must be protected, even to the extent of restraining the manufacture of the infringing article, although such injunction would result in great loss to the defendants as well as to the people contracting with them, since the plaintiff conceded that it would be impossible for them fully to supply the trade.

That an injunction after a hearing on the merits, if the decision is favorable to the complainants, is a matter of right, is also the theory adopted by the court in Consolidated Roller Mill Co. v. Coombs, 39 Fed. 803. On this point it is said: "After an adjudication upon the merits, the case becomes somewhat complicated by the provisions of the Constitution and statutes which secure to the inventor 'the exclusive right to his discovery.' If this right be 'exclusive,' it is difficult to see how the court can limit or impair it by requiring the patentee to accept anything less than the complete monopoly which the law awards him. While he may not be a manufacturer himself, and may derive his sole profit from licensing others to use his device, still, such licenses are entirely voluntary upon his part, are completely within his own control, and the courts have, strictly speaking, no power to demand of him that he shall license the defendant to use his machine, as they are enabled to do indirectly by refusing an injunction upon requiring a bond to pay the amount of the license or such damages as he may have suffered by defendant's use of his machines. If this, then, were a final decree, we should have no hesitation in denying this motion to stay the injunction, unless immediate notice were given of an appeal, when the provisions of the ninety-third rule would attach, and the staying of an injunction would become a matter of discretion, to be determined by the facts of each particular case."

However, in Dorsey Harvester Revolving Rake Co. v. Marsh, 6 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 387, Fed. Cas. No. 4,014, after a hearing on the merits and giving the complainant a decree for an accounting and an injunction, the court said that the injunction ought to be so framed as not to subject the defendants to any avoidable loss or injury, and to this end provided that no injunction should issue until a further order of the court if the defendants, within a stipulated time, filed a bond securing to the complainant the profits and damages which, on the accounting, they may ultimately be decreed to pay. In this case the complainant was not a manufacturer of the invention, and hence would be adequately protected by the payment of a just compensation for the use thereof; while, on the other hand, the defendants had an extensive establishment and a large capital invested in it, and a sudden stoppage of the business would be disastrous to them without benefit to the complainant.

And the court will arrange the terms of the injunction so as to accomplish the result intended with the least disturbance to the business of the defendant (a railway company), where the business is one concerning the public. Westinghouse Air Brake Co. v. Great Northern R. Co. 86 Fed. 132.

In other jurisdictions it is held that, although the proof of the infringement, as well as the validity of the patent, is satisfactory, a final injunction will not be granted where the allowance thereof will cause much greater injury to defendant than benefit to the complainant, and in such case the decree will be only for an accounting. McCrary v. Pennsylvania Canal Co. 5 Fed. 367. The facts in this case are not very fully set forth. It, however, appears that the invention involved was an improvement in coupling and steering canal boats, but it does not appear whether the defendant was a manufacturer or a mere user of the article found to infringe.

And a final injunction will not be granted where the infringement relates to the minor part of a large machine, the use of which is essential to the defendant, while probably the complainant would not materially suffer by the continuance of the use of the device for the short time remaining before the expiration of the patent, providing the defendant gives security that he will account to the complainant for the infringement, either by way of damages or royalty. Draper Co. v. American Loom Co. 88 C. C. A. 588, 161 Fed. 728.

Nor where the patent alleged to be infringed will expire in about two months, and the defendant is a railroad company, using in its business many hundreds of the patented articles, scattered over 2,000 miles of track, and hence but few of the devices could be removed before the expiration of the patent if a reasonable time be given for the removal thereof in installments, as is usual in such cases. Vermilya v. Erie R. Co. 89 Fed. 96.

Nor where the effect of the injunction would be to restrain the use by a city of an invention necessary for daily use in the prevention of fires, and the complainants' rights may be otherwise protected. Bliss v. Brooklyn, 4 Fisher, Pat. Cas. 596, Fed. Cas. No. 1,544.

Nor where the injunction will interfere with the use of wooden pavements constructed in a city in infringement of complainant's rights, and will only operate injuriously upon the public, without benefitting the complainant, but the complainant will be limited to relief by way of profits and damages. Ballard v. Pittsburg, 12 Fed. 783. A. G. S.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

HERBERT BROWN et al., Plffs. in Err,
v.
R. B. MARTIN et al.

(137 Ga. 338, 73 S. E. 495.)

Venue — life estate — forfeiture for waste.

1. An action under Civil Code 1910, § 3660, by a remainderman against a life tenant, to have the estate of the latter declared forfeited and the remainderman put in possession, because of waste committed by the tenant, is a suit "respecting titles to land," and the venue thereof is the county in which the land involved is located.

Headnotes by HILL, J.

Note. — No case other than Brown v. Martin has been found which passes upon the question whether a suit to oust a life tenant for waste is one respecting title to land, which must be brought in the county where the land is located.

In fact the remedy of forfeiture against a life tenant is in force in but few of the 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pleading — demurrers — sufficiency.

2. None of the grounds of demurrer were well taken, and the court erred in dismissing the petition.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Calhoun County to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to declare a forfeiture of a life estate and to acquire possession of the property because of alleged waste committed. Reversed.

Statement by HILL, J.:

Herbert Brown and others, as remaindermen under a certain deed, brought an action against Mrs. Madden and R. B. Martin, to declare a forfeiture of the life estate conveyed by the deed, and to acquire possession of the property because of alleged waste committed. By the terms of the deed the property was conveyed to Mrs. Madden for life, for the comfortable maintenance of herself and children, and at her death to go to the children in fee simple. The plaintiffs are the children just referred to. The original petition made substantially the following averments: On June 16, 1908, a decree was taken subjecting the interest of Mrs. Madden in the property named in the deed to a certain indebtedness, under which decree her life estate was sold at public outcry, and was bought in by her; but, she failing to comply with her bid, under the terms of the decree "title to the said property went to various creditors, subject to a fixed charge for the maintenance of petitioners." The defendant Martin was one of the creditors, and went into possession of the land, holding the life interest only as held by Mrs. Madden, and subject to the liabilities imposed by law on her, and entitled to only such rights as she had. The land is located in Calhoun county. Mrs. Madden is a resident of that county, and Martin is a resident of Randolph county. Various acts of waste have been committed by Martin, and allowed by him to be committed by others, consisting of working the timber for turpentine purposes, cutting, selling, and destroying valuable timber in large quantities. Mrs. Madden, the life tenant, fails and neglects to prevent these acts of waste, and both defendants have been guilty of such acts "as to forfeit her or his interest states (16 Cyc. 646), and appears to be little used at the present time.

As to jurisdiction of actions at law for breach of contract or for tort concerning real property in another state or country, see Smith v. Southern R. Co. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 928, and Hodges v. Hunter Co. 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 994, and the notes thereto.

in said land, and cause said estate to vest absolutely in fee simple in petitioners," and they elect to claim immediate possession. The prayers of the petition are that the life estate be declared to be forfeited; that Mrs. Madden and Martin, holding under her, be decreed to have forfeited their interest in said estate; and that plaintiffs recover the land, with the title, possession, and right of possession vested in them free of condition, together with the rental value of the land since the filing of the suit.

An amendment to the petition was allowed, in which it was alleged Mrs. Madden leased to one Sealy about 75 acres of the land for the purpose of working turpentine thereon, and Sealy extracted the turpentine from the trees and carried it away, and cut timber and converted it into barrel staves, and used large quantities of timber for making turpentine, which "act was done by Mrs. Madden, with the knowledge and assistance, in the year 1906, of R. B. Martin." Mrs. Madden and Martin conspired and confederated, while she was life tenant, to sell and dispose of the real estate, and in furtherance of that intention Martin leased the land and sold said timber for Mrs. Madden. "Said Madden permitted said Martin to waste said real estate, by neglecting to care for same, and neglecting to prevent the cutting of same. Said Madden has committed voluntary waste, and in a manner evidencing entire disregard of the rights of the next taker, by cutting said timber, allowing it to die and fall upon the ground and rot. Said Martin had full knowledge of this fact, and knew that said waste was permissive and voluntary, and took title to said land under a decree, with full knowledge of the facts that said Madden had committed said acts." Martin has continued the acts of waste, and his title was taken subject to full knowledge that Mrs. Madden had forfeited her entire life estate.

A demurrer was filed by Martin, setting up the following grounds: "(1) Because no cause of action, either legal or equitable, is set forth in the petition. (2) Because no such acts are alleged in the petition as will justify the court in decreeing a forfeiture as prayed. (3) Because no copy of the decree under which it is alleged defendant holds title is attached to the petition, nor does it appear with sufficient fullness under what title the defendant claims. (4) Because the land referred to in paragraph 1 of the petition is not described with sufficient fullness or definiteness. (5) Because the petition shows that the superior court of Calhoun county has no jurisdiction of this defendant."

The court rendered judgment as follows: "The plaintiffs having amended their petition, and said amendment having been allowed, and the within and foregoing demurrers having been renewed to said petition as amended, it is, after argument, ordered that said demurrers be sustained, and the petition as amended dismissed, both parties by agreement treating the decree referred to in the petition as being a part of and attached to the petition." To this judgment the plaintiffs filed their bill of exceptions.

Mr. M. C. Edwards, for plaintiffs in error:

Cases respecting titles to land shall be tried in the county wherein the land lies.

Kehr v. Floyd, 132 Ga. 626, 64 S. E. 673; Wall v. Mercer, 119 Ga. 346, 46 S. E. 420; Baker v. Davis, 127 Ga. 652, 57 S. E. 62; Southern R. Co. v. Grizzle, 124 Ga. 735, 110 Am. St. Rep. 191, 53 S. E. 244; Mashburn v. Dannenberg Co. 117 Ga. 568, 44 S. E. 97.

Messrs. Hawes & Pottle for defendants in error.

HILL, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no merit in the first and second grounds of the demurrer. Acts of waste on the part of the life tenant, of the character alleged in the petition, would give the remaindermen the right to bring an action to declare a forfeiture of the estate of the life tenant, as provided for in the Civil Code 1910, § 3666. In view of the recital of the court, in his order quoted in the statement of facts, that by agreement both parties treated the decree referred to in the petition as though it were a part thereof, the third ground of demurrer will be considered as having been waived. It might be here remarked, however, that this decision, in its entirety, is made without reference to the decree, as it does not appear to have been actually attached to the petition, and was not brought to this court. This statement is made in view of the fact that the plaintiffs may have been parties to the decree and bound thereby, and it may have contained provisions which would affect their rights with respect to the present litigation. There is no merit in the fourth ground of demurrer. Paragraph 1 of the petition gives the numbers of the land lots involved, and this description, taken in connection with the allegation elsewhere in the petition that the property is situated in Calhoun county, sufficiently identifies the land referred to, or can be made to do so when aided by parol testimony.

This brings us to the fifth and last ground of the demurrer, by which the defendant Martin challenges the jurisdiction of Calhoun superior court with respect to him. Counsel in their briefs largely deal with the case on the theory that it is an equitable proceeding, and should be located in the county of his residence, because he is the defendant against whom substantial relief is prayed; however, counsel for the plaintiffs in error does insist that the suit is one respecting title to land, and therefore properly brought in Calhoun county, where the land in controversy is situated. In order to determine the venue of the suit, it is important to classify the action. While the petition does not in terms so state, the suit evidently is brought under the statute of this state providing for a forfeiture in behalf of the remainderman against the life tenant, in the event the latter wastes the estate, which statute is hereinafter copied. Originally at common law an action of waste was maintainable only against the holder of the legal estate, or a guardian in chivalry, or tenant in dower or by the curtesy, on the theory that, this class of estates being creatures of the law, the law would protect the inheritance of the heir by affording him a remedy for waste committed. No action could be maintained against the holder of an estate for life or for years, since they were created by the demise or lease of the owner, and it was deemed that his failure, when granting the estate, to provide against waste by the tenant, constituted an act of neglect on his part, the consequences of which he would be left to suffer. 2 Bl. Com. 283. The statute of Marlbridge (52 Hen. III. chap. 23) extended the common-law liability, so as to make it apply to tenants of the last-named class, and to make them liable for full damages resulting from waste; and the statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. I. chap. 5) gave a more stringent remedy in such cases by a writ of waste, under which the tenant was liable to forfeiture of the thing wasted and treble damages. 2 Bl. Com. 283, 284; 1 Reeves, Real Prop. § 558; Roby v. Newton, 121 Ga. 679, 68 L.R.A. 601, 49 S. E. 694. In Parker v. Chambliss, 12 Ga. 225, it was held: "In this state, a tenant in dower is liable for waste committed on the estate, but she does not thereby forfeit her estate, and treble damages, as provided by the statute of Gloucester. The remedy against her is by an action on the case, in the nature of waste, to recover the actual damage done to the estate; or by an injunction to restrain her from committing waste, when necessary, on a proper case made." In the opinion Judge Warner, after pointing out that we had adopted the common and statute law of England only where "properly adapted to the circumstances of the inhabitants of this state," and quoting Chancellor Kent to the effect that the writ of waste had gone out of use, and special action on the case in the nature of waste had superseded the common-law remedy, on page 238, said: "We therefore adopt and recognize the principles of the common law, including the statute of Gloucester, so far as the same make the tenant in dower liable for waste committed, but reject the harsh and penal remedy provided by that statute." This decision was made in 1852.

Code of 1863, § 2235 (which is identical in language with § 3666 of the Code of 1910), contained the following provisions: "The tenant for life is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property, so that in such use he exercises the ordinary care of a prudent man for its preservation and protection, and commits no acts tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder or reversion. For the want of such care, and the wilful commission of such acts, he forfeits his interest to the remainderman, if he elects to claim immediate possession." In Dickinson v. Jones, 36 Ga. 97, a case of injunction to restrain threatened waste, it was assumed that the statute of Gloucester was of full force in Georgia; but in Woodward v. Gates, 38 Ga. 205, 212, it was pointed out that the apparent holding in the Dickinson Case was obiter, no question of forfeiture being there involved; and the true rule in Woodward v. Gates was declared to be that the effect of the adoption of the Code of 1863 was that (page 213), "in case of waste, the tenant for life shall forfeit his interest to the remainderman, if he elects to take immediate possession. But the rule of the statute of Gloucester as to treble damages is not still adopted." And this decision was construed and followed in Belt v. Simkins, 113 Ga. 894, 39 S. E. 430. It appears, therefore, that the present statute (Civil Code 1910, § 3666), quoted supra, is declaratory, and at the same time restrictive, of the common law, and that the right of action thereunder is purely an action at law. What was the nature of this action at common law? Blackstone says: "This action of waste is a mixed action; partly real, so far as it recovers land, and partly personal, so far as it recovers damages." 3 Bl. Com. 228. It would seem, therefore, that, our statute having eliminated the treble damages feature, and retained only the forfeiture provided for by the common law, an action brought under such statute would be a real action.

The suit in the present case is based purely on this statute. It is in no sense an equitable action, and no equitable features are involved. The allegations of the petition, simplified, are to the effect that the life tenant has been guilty of acts of waste, within the meaning of the statute, and thereby rendered his estate subject to the forfeiture, and that the remaindermen elect to have such forfeiture declared, and to take immediate possession of the estate. The prayers all seek relief within the bounds of the statute; that is, that the interest of the life tenant be declared to be forfeited and the plaintiffs be put in possession of the land. True, there is an additional prayer that the defendants be required to account for the rental value of the premises since the filing of the suit; but this is merely a prayer for incidental relief with respect to a right which will accrue to the plaintiffs pending the action, provided they succeed in maintaining their claim of forfeiture, which, if declared, would relate back at least to the filing of the suit. There is also a prayer to the effect that the plaintiffs recover the premises free of any charge for the maintenance of the life tenant, or anyone holding under her. The property was conveyed to the life tenant for life, for the comfortable maintenance of herself and children. The children are the remaindermen, and are the plaintiffs in this case. The right of the life tenant to maintenance from the property is incidental to and a part of her life estate, and would cease with the loss of that estate, in the event a forfeiture thereof be declared. Neither of the prayers just mentioned seeks any relief other than is incidental to an action under the statute. The suit being one in which no equity is invoked, but purely a real action under a statute having its origin in the common law, its venue is not affected by the constitutional provision that equity cases shall be tried in the county of the residence of a defendant against whom substantial relief is prayed. (It might here be remarked that no equity jurisdiction can attach with respect to legal waste, except for purposes of injunction. 5 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 491.) "Real actions at common law were those by which all disputes concerning corporeal hereditaments were decided." Will's Gould, Pl. 6. They extended to actions claiming title to rents, commons, and the like, in fee simple, fee tail, or for life, as well as actions for the recovery of the land itself. 3 Bl. Com. 117. Such actions were local in character. 3 Bl. Com. 234. But with us the venue of suits is now controlled by constitutional and statutory provisions. In addition to the constitutional provision regarding equity cases above referred to, the Constitution further declares that "cases respecting titles to land shall be tried in the county where the land lies," and, with exceptions as to specified actions not material here to mention, "that all other civil cases shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides." This suit was brought in Calhoun county, in which the land involved is located. The demurrers were filed by the defendant Martin, who did not reside in that county; and unless the suit was one "respecting titles to land," within the meaning of the constitutional provision referred to above, there was no jurisdiction over Martin.

Was it such a suit? Numerous adjudications have been made with respect to what did or did not constitute an action respecting titles to land; but an examination of all the cases we have been able to find discloses that those held not to be of this nature are, in the main, reducible as follows: (a) Those in which the action sounded in trespass, and the object was the recovery of damages, or proceedings were for the purpose of injunction to prevent trespass, or an attempt was made to fasten a lien on property,—actions in which the question of title was only incidentally involved to the extent of showing a right on the part of the plaintiff to maintain his action. Examples of this class are Omond v. Flournoy, 34 Ga. 510; Powell v. Cheshire, 70 Ga. 357, 48 Am. Rep. 572; Beckwith v. McBride, 70 Ga. 642; and Wheatley v. Blalock, 82 Ga. 406, 9 S. E. 168. (b) Those in which the legal title was out of the plaintiff, and it was sought to cancel a deed, or to obtain specific performance, or in some other way invoke the aid of a court of equity in order to establish the plaintiff's legal title. The following cases fall within this class: Smith v. Bryan, 34 Ga. 53; Bivins v. Bivins, 37 Ga. 346; Taylor v. Cloud, 40 Ga. 288; McArthur v. Matthewson, 67 Ga. 134; Lowe v. Mann, 74 Ga. 387; Saffold v. Scottish American Mortg. Co. 98 Ga. 785, 27 S. E. 208; Fulgham v. Pate, 77 Ga. 454; Clayton v. Stetson, 101 Ga. 634, 28 S. E. 983; Ellis v. Farmer, 119 Ga. 238, 46 S. E. 105; and Martin v. Gaissert, 134 Ga. 34, 67 S. E. 536.

The line of cases just cited are the progeny of Smith v. Bryan, 34 Ga. 53, in which the ruling was that "a bill in equity to set aside and cancel a deed, on the ground of fraud, is not a case respecting title to land," within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution fixing the venue in such cases. In that case (34 Ga. 62, 63) the court used this language: "What, in intentment of the Constitution, are 'cases respecting titles to land?' We understand them to be cases in which the plaintiff asserts his title to the land in question, and depends for a recovery upon his maintenance of it, or to supply a link in the chain wanting by reason of accident or other cause. In order to determine whether or not a plaintiff at law or a complainant in equity, who selects his forum upon this clause of the Constitution, has made a case of jurisdiction for the selected court, it is necessary to examine carefully his allegations. What, then, is the gravamen in this case? Is it that, at the time of filing this bill, the complainant had title to the lands, and that the defendant held possession, or committed waste, or did any other act respecting them, without his consent, and in derogation of his title? Not at all. . . . His case is not that the title never legally passed from him, nor that it has legally returned to him. His prayer is not that his title, under existing circumstances, may be adjudged good and valid, but that, by reason of certain facts dehors the title, the contract which divested him of it may be annulled, and it restored. The case, then, does not respect title to lands, but is respecting a contract in relation to them, and certain fraudulent practices, which, it is alleged, vitiate that contract." And in Clayton v. Stetson, 101 Ga. 634, 638, 28 S. E. 983, 984, it was said: "If the plaintiff, without resorting to the powers of the superior court as a court of equity, and without invoking equitable relief, can, upon her legal title, recover, the suit is well brought in the county where the land lies; but if, in order to vest herself with a legal title upon which she can recover at law, it becomes necessary at first to assert an equity as against the person invested with the legal title, then we conclude that the action should have been brought in the county wherein the defendant resided."

In the present case, proof of the conveyance to them by deed of the remainder interest (giving to them the right of ultimate enjoyment), and proof of acts of waste on the part of the life tenant such as to create a forfeiture of the intermediate estate, within the intendment of the Civil Code, § 3666, quoted supra, is sufficient to show in the plaintiffs a legal title, and make out a prima facie case for recovery. We are satisfied that where the plaintiff, as in this case, confines himself to the remedy afforded him by the statute, he is seeking only to maintain a title devolving upon him by law, as against the defendant's possession and claim of title under deed, and the suit is one "respecting titles to land," within the meaning of the Constitution. The very gist of the action is: Whose legal title is superior with respect to the right of possession in presenti, — the defendant, claiming the life estate 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under deed, or the plaintiff, claiming it under forfeiture by virtue of the statute? The object of the action is to gain possession, and the right to possession is determined by an adjudication as to which has the superior legal title. We think the case we are considering measures up to the criterion laid down in Clayton v. Stetson, quoted supra, by which to determine when the action is one respecting titles to land, and that the venue of the suit, as brought, is in Calhoun county.

None of the grounds of demurrer were well taken, and the court committed error in sustaining them and dismissing the petition.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

CLEVELAND, CINCINNATI, CHICAGO, & ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY,
Appt.,

v.

PAUL O. TAUER.

(— Ind. —, 96 N. E. 758.)

Fire — interference with apparatus — liability.

1. A railroad company which permits a train to stand on a street crossing in violation of statute is liable for injury done to private property through the inability of the city fire apparatus to reach it because of such obstruction.

Pleading — complaint — proximate cause — loss by fire.

2. A complaint, to hold a railroad company liable for injury to private property by fire because of its unlawful obstruction of a highway crossing to the delay of the fire apparatus, is not demurrable for failure to show that the wrong was the proximate cause of the loss, if the facts alleged do not show as a necessary inference that such was not the fact.

Same — contributory negligence — negating.

3. A complaint, to hold a railroad company liable for injury to property by fire

Note. — Duty of railroad or street railway company to avoid interference with extinguishment of fire.

because of its wrongful obstruction of a highway crossing so as to delay the fire apparatus, is insufficient if it does not show freedom from negligence on the part of complainant, bringing about the fire, contributing to its spread, or in removing goods, for which purposes a general allegation that the loss was the proximate result of defendant's acts is not sufficient.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boone County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to property by fire, alleged to have been caused by an unlawful obstruction of the highway by defendant, to the delay of the fire apparatus. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. J. Hackney, F. L. Littleton, S. M. Ralston, and Bert Winters for appellant.

Messrs. Shelby & Worley and Wymond J. Beckett for appellee.

Cox, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is an action for damages to personal property occasioned by fire which originated on the appellee's premises, within the corporate limits of the city of Lebanon. The damages were alleged to have been aggravated by the negligence of appellant in delaying the city firemen in charge of the fire apparatus on the way to the scene of the fire, by obstructing, with one of its freight trains, a street along which they had to pass with it. From a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for $2,500, this appeal is taken.

Appellant first relies on the action of the trial court in overruling its demurrer to the complaint.

The first objection to the complaint is that its allegations do not serve to show that the obstruction of the street leading to the scene of the fire was the proximate cause of any of appellee's damages; that it appears from the facts alleged that the connection between the obstruction of the crossing by appellant's train and the fire is too remote to give rise to a cause of action for any part of the damage wrought by the fire. After alleging the status of the appellant as the owner and operator of the railroad, and its location in the city of Lebanon, the fact of appellee's ownership of the greenhouse and stock of flowers and plants, and its location in the city with reference to the railroad of appellant, and the building in which the city firemen and apparatus were stationed, between which fire house and appellee's greenhouse the tracks of appellant intervened, the proper equipment of the city's fire department with apparatus and men, and the existence of an adequate water system with hydrants located conveniently to the greenhouse, and the necessity for the firemen to proceed to the fire on the street in question on the day of the occurrences complained of, the complaint further alleged that, at about the hour of 7 o'clock in the evening of the day in question, a fire broke out in the boiler room connected with the greenhouse, and an alarm of fire was immediately sent to the fire department. It averred that the fire department at once responded, and proceeded to the fire by the nearest and most practicable route, which lay along the street obstructed; that when the firemen and apparatus reached the appellant's track, they found the street closed by appellant's freight train standing across it; the train being composed of an engine and twenty-five cars, the engine being about 40 feet west of the street crossing, and the train extending about a quarter of a mile east thereof. It alleged that the firemen notified appellant's employees in charge of the train of the fire, and that they demanded that the obstruction be removed, so that they could proceed; that they saw, or in the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, that the train prevented the firemen from continuing their run to the fire; and that they knew, or could have known, that the quickest way to clear the crossing was to back the train east of the crossing, which, it was alleged, could have been done in less than two minutes, or they could have uncoupled the train and cleared the crossing in about the same time; but that, with full knowledge of all of the conditions, they carelessly and negligently refused to so open the crossing, but that they unlawfully and carelessly and negligently obstructed the street with the train for more than ten minutes, and then proceeded with the long train westwardly across the street. It is alleged that, had the firemen not been stopped by the obstructed crossing, they could and would have saved the greenhouse from destruction; that before they finally reached the greenhouse the fire had spread from the boiler room to the greenhouse, which contained the plaintiff's flowers and plants, and killed them, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000. The complaint concluded with the allegation "that all of said damages and destruction of said greenhouse and contents was the direct and proximate result of the carelessness and negligence of said defendant, as herein averred," and a demand for judgment.

2671, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, which makes it a misdemeanor for a conductor or other person in charge of a railroad freight train to permit or suffer the same to remain standing across any public highway, street, alley, or farm crossing, or who, whenever it becomes necessary to stop such train across any public highway, street, alley, or farm crossing, neglects to leave a space 60 feet across such highway, street, alley, or farm crossing. See Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wynant (1884) 100 Ind. 160; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kitley (1888) 118 Ind. 152, 20 N. E. 727; State v. Malone (1893) 8 Ind. App. 8, 35 N. E. 198; Becker v. State (1904) 33 Ind. App. 261, 71 N. E. 188.

The violation of a statutory duty is negligence per se, and when injury and damage flow directly therefrom as a natural and probable result of the wrongful act, unaffected by the contributory negligence of the injured party, a liability is incurred by the wrongdoer. 29 Cyc. 436; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 10; 3 Elliott, Railroads, §§ 1155, 1206; Pennsylvania Co. v. Hensil (1880) 70 Ind. 569, 36 Am. Rep. 188; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Barnhart (1888) 115 Ind. 399, 16 N. E. 121; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kitley (1888) 118 Ind. 152, 20 N. E. 727; Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Young (1896) 146 Ind. 374, 45 N. E. 479; Nickey v. Steuder (1904) 164 Ind. 191, 73 N. E. 117; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Terrell, — Ind. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 95 N. E. 1109.

Of course, the violation of the statutory duty must produce or help to produce the injury; the injury or damage must flow from the wrong. While consequential damages which may be recovered are such as might reasonably be anticipated by the perpetrator of the wrongful act, and must be the natural and probable effect of the wrongful act, yet it is not essential to a recovery against the wrongdoer that he should have foreseen the identical injury to the particular person. If the act has a tendency to injure someone, and finally does so, the wrongful act is a proximate cause. 1 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. § 25; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 59; Davis v. Mercer Lumber Co. (1904) 164 Ind. 413, 73 N. E. 899; Hohenstein-Hartmetz Furniture Co. v. Matthews (1910) 46 Ind. App. 616, 92 N. E. 196; King v. Inland Steel Co. — Ind. —, 96 N. E. 337.

The purpose of the statute was to keep open the ordinary ways of communication of the people in going about their affairs, where such ways are crossed by railroads. Great quickness in responding to fire alarms, it is well known, is constantly sought in fire-fighting organizations. Speed 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) in getting to the scene of the fire, as well as in throwing the quenching element on the flames, is a test of efficiency. So we know that the loss of a few minutes' time often means much in checking or controlling fires and saving property. In this case we know from the allegations of the complaint that the firemen got to the burning property of appellee, and that some loss occurred which would not have, if the firemen had not been delayed by what appears from the allegations of the complaint to have been the unlawful act of appellant's employees. Whatever that loss was which the earlier arrival of the firemen, undeterred by the unlawful or negligent obstruction of the street crossing, would have prevented, the appellant is liable for, in the absence of contributory negligence on the part of appellee, for such loss would be directly attributable to appellant's wrongful act.

Appellant's employees were bound to know that the obstruction of the street crossing by their train might work inconvenience, delay, or positive harm and damage to someone in some matter connected with the proper use of the highway so obstructed; and the complaint adds to this that they actually knew that a fire was raging beyond the tracks of the railroad, and that the firemen were on their way to the fire on the obstructed street, and were demanding that the obstruction be removed, so that they might proceed. That some damage—that which the firemen and the means at their command for stopping and controlling the fire would have been able to prevent, if undelayed by the obstructing train—would occur the employees of appellant must have known. That damage would be the proximate result of the obstruction, and appellee was entitled to have determined, as a question of fact, to what extent the obstruction of the crossing proximately caused him injury. The facts alleged do not show, as a necessary inference, and therefore as a matter of law, that the obstruction was not the proximate cause of damage to appellee.

In the case of Metallic Compression Casting Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 109 Mass. 277, 12 Am. Rep. 689, it appeared that, to obtain the only available supply of water to throw upon a burning building, a line of hose was laid across a railroad track, and a train was run over it and severed it, while the water was being applied to the fire. In any action by the owner of the building against the railroad company to recover consequential damages, it was contended, as in this case, that no direct or immediate injury was occasioned to the plaintiff by the act of the defendant, but that the injury was occasioned by the fire directly, and by the defendant but remotely. In the opinion of the supreme court, holding the railroad company liable. it was said: "The law regards practical distinctions, rather than those which are merely theoretical; and practically, when a man cuts off the hose through which firemen are throwing a stream upon a burning building, and thereupon the building is consumed for want of water to extinguish it, his act is to be regarded as the direct and efficient cause of the injury."

In a later case, that of Kiernan v. Metropolitan Constr. Co. (1898) 170 Mass. 378, 49 N. E. 648, the same court held that a liability was incurred by a construction company doing public work in the streets, which had taken possession of the only available fire hydrant in the vicinity of a fire, and whose employees objected to and for a time prevented the use of the hydrant by firemen called to extinguish the fire.

In the case of Little Rock Traction & Electric Co. v. McCaskill (1905) 75 Ark. 133, 70 L.R.A. 680, 112 Am. St. Rep. 48, 86 S. W. 997, a street car ran over and cut the hose through which firemen were throwing a stream of water upon a burning building, whereupon furniture contained therein, which otherwise could have been saved, was consumed for want of water to extinguish the fire; and it was held that the act of cutting the hose was to be regarded as the proximate cause of the loss of a part of the furniture.

The case of Houren v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 236 Ill. 620, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1110, 127 Am. St. Rep. 309, 86 N. E. 611, is very much like the one under consideration. In that case it appears that a train obstructed a street crossing in violation of a statute, and firemen and fire-fighting apparatus were thereby delayed in reaching a fire. It was held that the violation of the statute was negligence per se, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of damages to appellant by the spread of the fire to his house. In the opinion of the court, it is said: "It seems clear to us that if a prudent man of experience had reflected upon the probable consequences of entirely closing up this street in a great city, he would have foreseen, first, that to close the street would obstruct and delay public travel thereon; second, that among the travel liable to be so obstructed and delayed would be the passage of teams, engines, and other appliances of the fire department; third that of the travel of the fire department was so obstructed and delayed, any fire which the men of that department were seeking to reach would be more extensive, and do 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) greater damage, than if the obstruction and delay had not taken place." See also Gilson v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1892) 65 Vt. 213, 26 Atl. 70, 36 Am. St. Rep. 802, note, p. 827; Couch v. Neg. § 2306; 1 Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, p. 107.

The case of Mott v. Hudson River R. Co. (1863) 1 Robt. 585, which is cited and relied on by counsel for appellant, is much like the cases which we have referred to at length. It was before three justices of the superior court of New York city, and a majority of these decided that damages caused by the spreading of a fire in consequence of the defendant negligently running over and cutting hose through which water was being thrown on the fire, whereby the only supply of water available was cut off, were too remote to sustain an action. The majority opinion is much weakened as authority by the clear opinion of the dissenting justice, and it seems wholly destroyed by the later contrary decision of the appellate division of the New York supreme court, in the case of Phenix Ins. Co. v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 122 App. Div. 113, 106 N. Y. Supp. 696.

The case of Lebanon, L. & L. Teleph. Co. v. Lanham Lumber Co. (1909) 131 Ky. 718, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 115, 115 S. W. 824, 18 Ann. Cas. 1066, in which it was held that the negligent failure of the defendant to give telephone connection with the fire department for a call to extinguish a fire in plaintiff's buildings for a time that rendered the efforts of the firemen, who afterwards arrived, fruitless, was too speculative and remote to authorize a recovery, and upon which reliance is placed by appellant, is easily distinguishable from this and the cases above referred to, which are therein considered and conceded to have been well decided.

The case before us may be near the verge of liability, but it is not outside; for there is here an act done which is unlawful, and from which some damage directly flowed to appellee.

It is next contended by counsel for appellant that the complaint is bad for a failure to negative contributory negligence on appellee's part. The act of 1899 (§ 362. Burns's 1906) did not change the rule which has long prevailed in this state, that in actions to recover damages to property wrought by negligence of another, the plaintiff must allege his freedom from contributory negligence, either by direct averment, or by facts from which the inference that he was free from contributory negligence must be drawn. There is in the complaint no direct averment that the appellee was free from contributory negligence, and the facts alleged in the complaint do not compel any inference that the appellee was free either from any negligence which might have brought about the fire, or contributed to the spread of it after it was started, or that he could not have saved goods by removal. All of the facts alleged may have been true, and yet the appellee may have been guilty of contributory negligence.

But the general averment "that all of said damages and destruction of said greenhouse and contents was the direct and proximate result of the carelessness and negligence of said defendant, as herein averred," is relied on by counsel for appellee as being sufficient to rescue the pleading from the objection that it does not negative appellee's contributory negligence. A similar allegation to this is frequently found in complaints for negligence, and its office is to aid the allegations as to negligence of the defendant as a proximate cause of the damage sustained. It has no real significance, as a part of the complaint, as to any negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

Both negligence on the part of the appellant, which was effective in producing the damage to appellee, and freedom from negligence on the part of appellee, which contributed thereto, were, under the rules of pleading in force in this state, necessary to be shown to make the complaint good as the statement of a cause of action. The general averment in the complaint just quoted must be taken to be the pleader's conclusion from the facts specifically alleged. The facts specifically alleged warrant the conclusion that appellant's negligence was potent in causing appellee's damage, but they do not necessarily warrant the conclusion that the appellee was free from negligence which contributed thereto; and therefore the latter conclusion cannot be said to be involved in this general averment. Wahl v. Shoulders (1895) 14 Ind. App. 665, 43 N. E. 458; Louisville, N. A. 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

& C. R. Co. v. Schmidt (1885) 106 Ind. 73, 5 N. E. 684; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Johnson (1884) 96 Ind. 40; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Johnson (1884) 96 Ind. 44, 46; Pennsylvania Co. v. Gallentine, 77 Ind. 322; Cincinnati, L. & A. Electric Street R. Co. v. Klump (1905) 37 Ind. App. 660, 77 N. E. 869; *Potter v. Ft. Wayne & W. It seems that the cause was submitted to the jury on the theory that the complaint was good without an allegation of freedom from contributory negligence; that the rule in force since the act of 1899, placing the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant in actions for personal injuries, applied as well to actions for injuries to property, for the court charged the jury in instruction No. 8, that, "if you shall find from a preponderance of all of the evidence in the case that the plaintiff was guilty of any act of negligence that proximately contributed to or caused the damage sued for, the plaintiff cannot recover." The complaint is bad as against a demurrer, because it does not negative contributory negligence, and the giving of this instruction was error. Other questions raised are not likely to arise in another trial.

The cause is reversed, with instructions to the lower court to sustain the appellant's demurrer to the complaint, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

HORACE LAVALLEUR et al., Appts.,

v.

J. H. HAHN.

Statute of frauds — parol evidence to show fraud in contract.

In an action to recover from an agent to purchase real estate, the secret profit which he made by falsely representing that he was compelled to pay for the property the price paid him, parol evidence is admissible on the ground of fraud, to show that he had,

Note. — No other case has been found involving the precise question as to the admissibility of parol evidence to show that the purported vendor in a written contract for the sale of property was in reality an agent of the other party, employed to purchase the property.

It has been said that "there is perhaps in fact, been acting as agent, and promised to purchase as cheaply as possible, although the positive written contract to pay him a certain sum for the property as vendor is thereby contradicted.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Jasper County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover a profit alleged to have been secured through fraud and deceit in the purchase of real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Action to recover a sum of money secured by defendant from plaintiffs through fraud and deceit. Defendant's defense was a general denial. At the conclusion of the testimony, the trial court directed a verdict for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Messrs. Mowry & Cross for appellants.
Messrs. Tripp & Tripp and E. J. Salmon for appellee.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs are residents of Jasper county, Iowa, and defendant is a resident of the same county, and in the year 1907 was engaged in the real estate business at the town of Colfax. One L. E. Zachary, at that time a resident of Colorado living at the city of Pueblo, owned 320 acres of land in Jasper county, Iowa, which plaintiffs were desirous of purchasing, and they employed defendant to purchase the same for them from Zachary. Defendant was in partnership with one Stouffer, and it seems that on the 21st day of September, 1907, this partnership, in the name of Hahn & Stouffer, entered into a written contract with Zachary and wife for the purchase of the 320 acres of land at the agreed price of $24,000. This contract was entered into pursuant to correspondence had between Zachary and defendant during the latter part of August and the 1st of September of the year 1907. At the time of the purchase, defendant represented to Zachary that he was buying the land for other parties who lived in Kansas, but that for convenience the land was to be conveyed to him. By the terms of the contract, Zachary was to deed the land before March 10, 1908, but, as a matter of fact, the deed was made by Zachary and wife to J. H. Hahn and H. G. Stouffer on October 3, 1907, although not delivered perhaps until a later date, and recorded March 30, 1908. Defendant stated at the time the deed was made that he was buying the land for someone else; that the conveyance should run to him and his partner, and that they would convey the land to the purchaser. The testimony shows that on the 19th day of September, 1907, one of the plaintiffs called upon defendant at his office, in Colfax, to ascertain whether he (defendant) could buy the land for the plaintiffs. After some negotiations, defendant undertook to purchase the land, and the following is some of the testimony with reference to this agreement:

"I said to him [Mr. Hahn], 'You go and buy that land as cheap as you can, and make as good terms as you can,' but that we would pay $80 an acre, but that he should buy it as cheap as he could, and make the terms as good as he could make them; and he said, 'All right, I will do it; I will go out and see Mr. Zachary; I will make the terms as good for you boys as I can.' He said, 'I want to get away today; this is Friday, and I want to get back Sunday.' He said, 'You get your draft for a thousand dollars at once.' There was nothing said about a contract up to that time. After I got the $1,000 draft, it was along late in the evening, along about 6 o'clock, and after he had receipted for the $1,000 he said, 'Boys, I ought to have a no rule of law which is more flexible or subject to a greater number of exceptions than the rule which, in actions at law, excludes parol evidence offered to vary or explain written documents." And "it may be stated, generally, . . . that the courts have endeavored to adapt their rulings, either way, to the obvious demands of abstract justice in each particular case." 17 Cyc. 638.

So, where an agent to purchase property has been guilty of fraud or duress toward his principal; or where, even in the absence of fraud, some contemporaneous parol agreement has been the inducing cause of a written contract for the purchase of property, executed and delivered by an intending purchaser to one who was, in fact, his agent, employed to purchase the property from a third person; or where a written instrument, in form an absolute contract for the contract for this farm.' I said, 'All right.' Then we made the contract. After the contract was made, he said, 'Boys, if I do not buy this for $80 an acre, you will not hold me to the contract?' I said, 'Certainly not,' and replied, 'If you can buy it for less, you will buy it for less.' He said, 'Certainly.' That statement was made after the written contract was made. Exhibit B, Robinson, is the contract that was executed at that time. Mr. Hahn went to Pueblo, Colorado. I saw him start. We had a conversation with him after he returned from Colorado in regard to this matter, in Colfax, on the following Monday, the 22d or 23d. I said to him, 'What do you want of me?' and he said he had bought it. I ask him how, and he said at $80 an acre; that he had stayed there until 2 o'clock at night, and that was the best he could do. He further said that there would have to be a change made in the contract; that he would have to pay a thousand dollars more down, and that the rate of interest would be raised; that if we would make it an all cash payment before a certain time, we would be allowed $300 off. Another contract was drawn at that time. Mr. Hahn drew it. Exhibit C. Robinson, is the contract that was drawn and signed on the 23d day of September, 1907, by myself and Mr. Hahn. I believed at that time the statements made to me by Mr. Hahn, to the effect that he had been obliged to pay $80 an acre for the land, and relied on them; if I had known his statements to be false, and had known that he had agreed to pay only $75 an acre for the land, I would not have entered into the second contract. Deeds were afterwards made for the land. The consideration paid for the land was $25,600, or $80 an acre. The money was paid as follows: $2,000 to Hahn; $1,000 for possession paid to Cross and myself; $2,880 for two notes (they were the rent notes that we had given to Mr. Zachary, and he had sold them to the Valley National Bank of Des Moines, Iowa); $530 to Meredith & Son; there was $3,300 and some odd dollars that was adjusted through Hahn; then there was $13,500 Allfree mortgage on this land, and that brought it down to $3,300 and some odd dollars; I do not remember just how much. We (Ed Cross and myself) had the place rented, and had given our notes for three years. I had put something like $375 of improvements on the place, and Ed Cross had put something like $200 worth of improvements on the farm, and, of course, we could not let the place go for nothing. The $1,000 was paid to cover these improvements. The $530 paid to Meredith & Son was for a mortgage on the place. The $13,500 to Allfree was a 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) mortgage we put on the place; that was so we could pay cash for the place, and we put a mortgage of $13,500. The money we received on that mortgage was paid to Mr. Hahn, and as a matter of fact he received that money. There was $105 of taxes paid, and a mortgage of $2,732.64 to the Security Loan & Trust Company of Des Moines, Iowa. As a matter of fact, we paid $25,600 for the premises, less $1,000 allowed us for possession. Exhibit D. Robinson, is in the handwriting of Mr. Hahn, and it represents the settlement for the farm between Mr. Hahn, L. L. Lavalleur, and myself. I did not know at the time of the settlement for the farm that Hahn had purchased the farm for less than $80 an acre. He had told me that he paid $80 an acre. The first that I had learned that he had purchased the land for less than $80 was probably along in April, 1908. I suspectioned there was something wrong when we were making settlement. I could not get anything out of Hahn. The date of the settlement and the date of the memorandum was, I think, March 9, 1903."

Another witness by the name of Cross testified as follows: "I was with Horace Lavalleur at the office of J. H. Hahn, in Colfax, on the 19th day of September, 1907, and heard some of the conversation between Lavalleur and Hahn at that time, with reference to the land in controversy. . . . Mr. Hahn said that he would go out and buy the land as cheap as he could. He said he would go out that evening, and wanted a thousand dollars to take with him to make the purchase. He said, 'I will go out and work in your interest [Horace and L. L. Lavalleur's], and I will buy the land as cheap as I can, and make as good terms as I can.' He said, 'Of course, I will buy it in Mr. Stouffer's and my name, so Mr. Zachary won't know I am getting the land for you, as he might not allow the $1,000 for giving possession.' Exhibit B, Robinson, was signed by the parties at that time. When that was signed, Mr. Hahn said, 'Now, if I do not buy the land for you boys, you will not hold me to this contract?' and they said, 'Certainly not;' that they would not do that. Nothing that I remember was said by Mr. Hahn that he would not hold Lavalleur to the contract in case he could buy the land for less than $80 an acre. This took place after the contract was signed. The statement of Mr. Hahn that he would buy the land as cheaply as possible took place at the same time as the other conversation. It was at the time they gave him the $1,000 draft, the same day."

The other plaintiff testified: "I was present in his office, in Colfax, Iowa, on the 19th day of September, 1907, and took part in the conversation. . . . Mr. Hahn said, 'I will go out and try to buy this land for you boys as cheap as I can. If I cannot buy the farm for less than $80 an acre, then you will give $80?' We said that was all right, and we went over to the bank to get a draft for $1,000. He said, 'Boys, I will go out and work in your interests, and buy the land for you as cheap as I can; if I can buy the land for less than $80, I will do it; but if I cannot, I will give $80.' We said that was all right, and for him to buy it as cheap as he could, and he said he would do it. This conversation was after the signing of the contract (Exhibit B, Robinson). Of course, it had been talked before the contract was signed, and afterwards, too. Hahn said, 'Boys, I will go out and work in your interests; if I cannot get the land for $80 an acre, you will not hold me to this' and we told him, 'No.' Mr. Hahn said that he was going to see L. E. Zachary, in Colorado, about the purchase of the land. I saw Mr. Hahn after he returned from Colorado, at my residence in Ira, Iowa. Horace Lavalleur was with him. They drove into my place. I was out in the field somewhere, and they called me, and I went where they were. Hahn said, 'Well, I got the farm.' I said, 'Did you?' and he said, 'I got it all right, but I have got to have a little more money.' I asked him how much, and he said he would have to have another $1,000. We talked awhile, and he read over another contract. I supposed it would be all right, and we went to Ira and got a thousand dollars at the bank, and my brother and I signed the other contract, and they went home. He said that he had to pay $80 an acre for the land; that he worked there until 2 o'clock at night with Zachary and his wife, before he could get them to sign a contract. He said that he had worked and done everything he could, but he could not get them to sign a contract for less than $80. He said that Zachary had to have more money; that he needed some more money right at present, and that we could not have thirty days, but would have to have it in a shorter time, and that we would have to pay 6 per cent interest, when it should have been 5½. I was not present when the settlement was made, only the $2,000 payment. The other settlement was made by my brother. They could not get the papers straightened out, and some of it is not yet settled. The title to the farm is not yet cleared up. Conveyances of the land were made to Horace Lavalleur and myself. The consideration paid for the land was $25,600, at the rate of $80 an acre. At the time Mr. Hahn and Horace

Lavalleur called at my place, in Ira, after the return of Hahn from Colorado, I did not know how much he had agreed to pay Mr. Zachary for the place. Nothing more than what he said. He said he had to give $80 an acre. I believed and relied upon his statements. If I had known his statements to be false, and, as a matter of fact, he had agreed to pay but $75 an acre, I would not have entered into the second contract."

In addition to the testimony first quoted, Horace Lavalleur testified as follows: "The defendant, J. H. Hahn, received $170 as compensation for acting as our agent in the purchase of the Zachary land. He figured it out. Do not know that I can explain how he figured it out, but he set down the figures showing how it was done. We were to get $300 off if we made it a cash payment, and $170 of that was not allowed. He said he was out there and made those trips, and that he was entitled to $170. He said he had to pay his fare both ways and his expenses. He said he was keeping out the $170 to pay his bills. Mr. Stouffer was not present when this talk was had in regard to this matter between Mr. Hahn and myself. I had a talk with Mr. Stouffer about buying the farm. Mr. Stouffer was out there at the time. He was not present when the contracts were made. Mr. Stouffer is the first man I spoke to about the sale of the land. The settlement I finally made was not made until after Mr. Hahn returned from Pueblo. I think he went out there (Pueblo) on the 21st day of September, and I think this settlement was made on the 9th day of March, afterwards. It was at the final settlement, on the 9th day of March of the year following, that I had the talk with Mr. Hahn about the $170. I asked Mr. Hahn what was going to him. He commenced to figure up. I wrote him a check when he was done figuring it up for what it amounted to. I gave him a check for $3,351.50. That is just the amount that Exhibit D shows."

So far as material, the first contract referred to by these witnesses, of date September 19, 1907, reads as follows: "This agreement made and entered into this 19th day of September, A. D. 1907, by and between J. H. Hahn, party of the first part, and Horace and L. L. Lavalleur, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That the party of the first part has this day bargained and sold to the party of the second part the 320 acres of land known as the L. E. Zachary farm, being now occupied by Horace Lavalleur and E. A. Cross and described more particularly as follows: [here follows description of land].

for the consideration of twenty-five thousand and six hundred and 00-100 dollars (25,600) upon the following terms and conditions: Ten hundred and 00-100 dollars (1,000) cash, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged. Ten hundred and 00-100 dollars (1,000) October 1, 1907. Eighty hundred and 00-100 dollars (8,000) on or before March 10, 1908. Ten hundred and 00-100 dollars being the amount expended for improvement and surrender of possession of said place on March 1, 1908, and which amount is to be credited as part of the purchase price of said land. The said improvements to remain upon the said place, and the parties of the second part agree to pay the two notes of $1,440 each, making $2,880, which are due January 1, 1909, and January 1, 1910, being the rent notes of the said place for the seasons of 1908 and 1909, and which are now sold to the Valley National Bank of Des Moines, Iowa, the same to be credited as part of the above purchase price of said place. The parties of the second part further agree to pay the mortgages of $2,500 and $500 now upon the said place, the same to be deducted from the purchase price as above, and to execute in favor of L. E. Zachary real estate mortgage and notes for the sum of eighty-seven hundred twenty and 00-100 dollars (8,720), dated on March 1, 1908, on or before eight (8) years, and bearing 5½ per cent interest, payable annually. It is further agreed by the party of the first part that he will execute a warranty deed and deliver a good abstract of title, pay the interest on the $3,000 loans now upon the said place up to March 1, 1908, and the taxes on the said place for the year 1907; and it is further agreed by the party of the first part that he will execute the said warranty deed and deliver the said good abstract of title to the Citizens' State Bank of Colfax, Iowa, not later than January 1, 1908 (unless called for sooner by the parties of the second part), to be held by them for the fulfillment of this contract. It is further agreed by the parties of the second part if it is possible for them to arrange matters to lift the said mortgages of $3,000 now against the said place, and to make a loan sufficient to pay the said amount together with the sum of $8,720 (which sum was to be in a mortgage to L. E. Zachary), that they will execute the new loan and will pay cash in lieu of the mortgage to the said L. E. Zachary, less any expense he may be to in making the said change." (Duly signed by the parties.)

The said improvements to remain upon the said place, and the parties of the second part assume and agree to pay the two rent notes of $1,440 each, making $2,880, which are due January 1, 1909, and January 1, 1910, being the rent notes for the said place for the seasons of 1908 and 1909, and which are now sold to the Valley National Bank of Des Moines, Iowa, the same to be credited as part of the above purchase price of the said place. It is further agreed by the party of the first part that he will execute a warranty deed and furnish a good abstract of title, and deliver the same to the Citizens' State Bank of Colfax, Iowa, not later than January 1, 1908, or sooner if called upon to do so by the parties of the second part, if they are ready to close deal before that date. Pay the interest on the loans of $3,000 now upon the place up to March 1, 1908, and the taxes for the year 1907; the said delivery to the Citizens' State Bank being for the purpose of getting the papers in readiness to get the deal closed up as soon as possible. It is further agreed by the party of the first part that if the deal can be closed up and all cash paid (in lieu of the mortgage that was to be executed, together with the cash payments as per contract), that the party of the first part will allow a discount of $300 for the same, together with the expense the parties of the second part may be to in canceling mortgages now against the said place. It is further agreed by the parties of the second part that if it is possible for them to arrange matters to lift the said mortgages, amounting to $3,000 in all, against the said place, and to make a loan sufficient to pay the said amount together with the sum of $7,720 (which sum was to be a mortgage), that they will execute a new loan and will pay cash in lieu of the mortgage which was to be executed" (Duly signed by parties.)

The defendant, although a witness on his own behalf, did not in any way deny the testimony which we have set out, but planted himself squarely upon the contracts just quoted, claiming that all the testimony introduced by plaintiffs was inadmissible, because it tended to vary and contradict the written contracts between the parties. The sole question in the case is the admissibility of the testimony quoted, under the issues tendered by the pleadings. The action is to recover damages from the defendant on the theory that he was plaintiffs' agent for the purchase of the farm, and that as such he was bound to the exercise of absolute good faith in the matter. It is charged that he did not carry out his duties as agent, but, on the contrary, sought to profit himself by the transaction, and was guilty of actual fraud and deceit. Defendant's claim, as we understand it, is that, as the written contracts show he was not an agent, but a vendor of the land, plaintiffs cannot show by parol evidence that he stood in any other relation to them. He especially relies upon the so-called parol evidence rule, and, if it be found that the rule does not apply to the issues as tendered by the pleadings, then the trial court was in error in excluding the testimony and in directing a verdict for the defendant. The general rule is that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict, vary, add to, or subtract from the terms of a valid written agreement in an action between the parties thereto or their privies. Elliott, Ev. § 568. But to this rule there are many exceptions, among them the following:

(1) "It may always be shown that the document in question never had any legal existence. On this ground rests the very important exception that duress or fraud in the inception of the contract may be proved, although accompanied by the most solemn formalities. Such proof does not recognize the contract as ever existing as a valid agreement, and is received, from the necessity of the case, to show that that which appears to be a contract is not and never was a contract. . . . For the purpose of proving the contract, verbal statements which are material and fraudulent, although made before or at the same time with the written agreement, may be proved. In such case the rule that prior negotiations are merged in the written agreement does not apply. No rule is better settled than this. Where fraud is alleged, a very broad range is given to the testimony. . . . In such cases any secret agreement or trust may be shown by them, although directly contradicting the face of the conveyances. The consideration may be inquired into, the purpose and object of mortgages or assignments may be shown, and generally the entire transaction may be investigated. Again, in actions upon a written contract, brought by one of the contracting parties against the other, the rule under discussion is constantly invoked; and parties are allowed to prove fraudulent representations or conduct which formed an inducement to the contract." Jones, Ev. Pocket ed. § 435.

(2) "It is a principle, to which we shall frequently have occasion to allude, that, 'in order to exclude oral evidence of a contract, it must be first established that there is a subsisting written contract between the parties; and, where the immediate issue is whether there is or was a writing covering the contract, it is not competent to exclude oral testimony bearing on that issue upon an assumption of such writing. To do so is to beg the question.'" Jones, Ev. Pocket ed. § 434; Brewster v. Reel, 74 Iowa, 506, 38 N. W. 381; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 284. This exception has been shortly stated as follows: Parol evidence is admissible to show that an apparent contract never had a legal existence. Browne, Parol Ev. § 33. As illustrating the application of the exception, see cases cited under this section.

(3) "Parol evidence is competent to show that a writing in form a complete contract, and delivered, was not to become binding until the performance of some condition resting in parol." Browne, Parol Ev. § 32. This exception is very similar to the second one just quoted, and the manner of its application is shown in the cases cited by Mr. Browne under the section quoted.

(4) "It has long been the settled rule that in courts exercising equitable jurisdiction, it is admissible to prove by parol that instruments in writing apparently transferring the absolute title are in fact only given as security." Jones, Ev. Pocket ed. § 446. "Although evidence to show that an instrument absolute in form is not such in fact is most frequently used to show that an apparent deed is a mortgage, it is not limited to this class of cases. The rule that deeds and other instruments absolute in terms can be thus transformed into instruments for the security of money is purely an equitable doctrine; and it has sometimes been held that in actions at law evidence for this purpose is not admissible. But in some states such evidence has been held proper in legal actions, as well as in those of an equitable nature; and, as the differences between legal and equitable procedure become less marked, there will doubtless be a tendency toward the adoption of the same rule of evidence both in legal and in equitable proceedings." Jones, Ev. Pocket ed. § 448.

The exceptions are well sustained by authority, and we have heretofore recognized them in many cases. See Hinsdale v. McCune, 135 Iowa, 683, 113 N. W. 478; Sutton v. Griebel, 118 Iowa, 78, 91 N. W. 825; McCaskey Register Co. v. Hall, 140 Iowa, 87, 117 N. W. 1124; Cavanagh v. Iowa Beer Co. 136 Iowa, 236, 113 N. W. 856; McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, 390, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 113 N. W. 858, 15 Ann. Cas. 665; Oakland Cemetery Asso. v. Lakins, 126 Iowa, 121, 101 N. W. 778, 3 Ann. Cas. 559; Bonewell v. Jacobson, 130 Iowa, 170, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436, 106 N. W. 614; Morrison Mfg. Co. v. Bryson, 129 Iowa, 645, 103 N. W. 1016, 106 N. W. 153; Providence Jewelry Co. v. Fessler, 145 Iowa, 74, 123 N. W. 957; Rohrabacher v. Ware, 37 Iowa, 85; Walker v. Camp, 63 Iowa, 627, 19 N. W. 802; Sutton v. Weber, 127 Iowa, 361, 101 N. W. 775; Fisher v. Lee, 94 Iowa, 611, 63 N. W. 442.

The exception which permits the introduction of parol evidence where fraud is alleged has been thus formulated: "It has been held that, where the execution of a written instrument has been induced by an oral stipulation or agreement made at the time, on the faith of which the party executed the writing, and without which he would not have executed it, but such agreement or stipulation is omitted from the writing, even if its omission is not due to fraud or mistake, evidence of the oral agreement or stipulation may be given, although it may have the effect of varying the contract or obligation evidenced by the writing, where there has been an attempt to make a fraudulent use of the instrument in violation of such promise or agreement, or where the circumstances would make the use of the writing for any purpose inconsistent with such agreement dishonest or fraudulent. This rule is put upon the ground that the attempt by one party afterward to take advantage of the omission of such terms from the contract is a fraud upon the other party, who was induced to execute it upon the faith of such promise; and hence he will be permitted to show by parol evidence the truth of the matter." See 17 Cyc. 693, 694, citing many cases.

Going now to the substantive law of the case, it is apparent, if the testimony before quoted is to be believed, that defendant was plaintiffs' agent to purchase the land at the lowest price he could for the benefit of his principals, the plaintiffs herein; that he did make such purchase (that is, bought the land for $75 per acre), but that he concealed that fact from plaintiffs, and represented that he had had to pay $80 therefor; that he settled with plaintiffs on that basis, and conveyed them the land which he had purchased in the name of his firm, although for the plaintiffs, and received their money on the theory that he had paid $80 per acre for it. This under our holdings constituted a fraud upon them, and they are entitled to recover the profits made by defendant in the transaction. Merrill v. Sax, 141 Iowa, 394, 118 N. W. 434; Morey v. Laird, 108 Iowa, 670, 77 N. W. 835; Green v. Peeso, 92 Iowa, 261, 60 N. W. 531; Rorebeck v. Van Eaton, 90 Iowa, 82, 57 N. W. 694; Schneider v. Schneider, 125 Iowa, 1, 98 N. W. 159; Leasure v. Boie, 142 Iowa, 284, 120 N. W. 643.

Now, if to the parol evidence rule there be an exception in the case of fraud, then clearly it was competent for the plaintiffs to show that, instead of purchasing the land from the defendant, Hahn, as the written contracts show, he (Hahn) was acting as their agent for the purchase of the lands, and that the contracts were never intended to be binding, or the complete evidence of the transaction, but were being used fraudulently by the defendant to escape a duty owing by him under the law. Where fraud is charged, the court looks behind all forms, and at the substance of the transaction, and in such cases no one can shield himself under the parol evidence rule. We think the testimony was admissible under at least two exceptions to the parol evidence rule. The conclusion finds abundant support in Bonewell v. Jacobson, 130 Iowa, 170, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436, 106 N. W. 614; Rorebeck v. Van Eaton, 90 Iowa, 82, 57 N. W. 694; Sutton v. Griebel, 118 Iowa, 78, 91 N. W. 825; McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Morlan, 121 Iowa, 451, 96 N. W. 976; Esterly v. Eppelsheimer, 73 Iowa, 260, 34 N. W. 846; Dowagiac Mfg. Co. v. Gibson, 73 Iowa, 525, 5 Am. St. Rep. 697, 35 N. W. 603.

In Humbert v. Larson, 99 Iowa, 275, 68 N. W. 703, we said: "Appellant further argues that the court erred in allowing certain evidence, over his objections, tending to contradict the written bill of sale. The record shows that the court below did admit evidence to prove the representations and statements made by plaintiff as an inducement to the sale. Under the issues in the case, this evidence was properly received. The defendants did not rely upon their bill of sale. Their defense was independent of it, and was based upon fraud. It is elementary that the rule excluding evidence contradictory of a written instrument does not apply when fraud is the gravamen of the action or gist of the defense. It is clear that there was no error here."

In Stanhope v. Swafford, 80 Iowa, 45, 45 N. W. 403, the court said: "It will be observed that the action is to recover for false representations inducing plaintiff to make the trade. Now, if it be assumed that all the terms of the contract are embodied in the writing, and the false representations are not expressed therein, plaintiff may recover thereon, for the reason that the action is not upon the contract, but for false representations,—a cause of action other and independent of the contract. If one should be inveigled or induced by false representations to enter into contract of a sale of property, he could maintain his action on the false representations, and would not be required to sue on the contract of sale, in order to recover his damages therefor." See also Nixon v. Carson, 38 Iowa, 338; Mann v. Taylor, 78 Iowa, 355, 43 N. W. 220; Rohrabacher v. Ware, 37 Iowa, 85.

None of the cases cited or relied upon by appellee seem to be in point. Counsel for appellee throughout the discussion seem to overlook the fact that fraud is the gravamen of plaintiffs' action, and that in such cases the parol evidence rule does not obtain.

For the reasons pointed out, the judgment must be, and it is, reversed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

LILLIE ATKINSON et al., Plffs. in Err.
v.
J. R. CROWE COAL & MINING COMPANY.

Right to jury — settling title to land.

1. In an action commenced for the purpose of settling disputed questions of title to real estate, and to recover the possession thereof, either party is entitled to a jury as matter of right, regardless of the form in which the action may be brought.

Same — equitable action.

2. While a person was in the actual, exclusive, and peaceable possession of real estate, claiming to be the owner thereof, another person claiming to be the owner of the coal and mineral in such land, and to have a right to use the surface for mining purposes, attempted to enter thereon for such purpose, but was forcibly prevented by the person in possession, who denied such claimed ownership of the coal. The person out of possession then commenced a suit to obtain a perpetual injunction to restrain the person in possession from interfering with the mining and removal of the coal. In that suit the defendant was, upon demand, denied a trial by jury. Held error.

Note. — Right to preliminary injunction which would have effect of transferring possession of property from defendant to plaintiff.

General rule.

Cases involving the right to the appointment of a receiver of property, and a preliminary injunction restraining interference with the receiver's possession of the property, are not included herein. Neither are cases included wherein the question is considered as to the right by permanent injunction to require one party to the suit to surrender possession of the property to another; nor are cases included which pass upon the power of a court to make effectual prior orders or executions, by a mandatory injunction requiring the surrender of the possession of property in accordance with the previous order or execution.

In general, the function of a preliminary injunction is to afford preventive relief and preserve the status quo until the rights of the contending parties may be judicially investigated and determined. Ordinarily, it cannot be used to take the possession of the property from one party to a suit and transfer it to another, where the title or right of possession is in dispute. There are some exceptions to this rule, which will be hereafter referred to.

ERROR to the District Court for Cherokee County to review a judgment permanently enjoining defendants from interfering with the mining and removing coal from certain lands. Reversed.

Statement by Graves, J.:

This suit was commenced by the J. R. Crowe Coal & Mining Company in the district court of Cherokee county, to obtain a perpetual injunction against Lillie and Ed. Atkinson. The defendants insisted that the remedy sought by the plaintiff could be obtained only in an action of ejectment. They therefore demurred to the plaintiff's petition, the demurrer being overruled, they filed an answer, and demanded a jury, which was refused, and the case was then tried to the court upon the facts. A permanent injunction was allowed, from which judgment of the court the defendants prosecute error. To avoid the production of the entire petition, which is of great length, the material facts will be stated: The dispute arose over the ownership of real estate. It is conceded that the Kansas City, Ft. Scott, & Gulf Railroad Company was the former owner of the land in controversy, and each party claims title from this source. The plaintiff claims that the railroad company sold the land to Jeremiah Hogan, reserving to itself the coal and mineral therein, together with the right to use the surface for the purposes of exploring for such coal and mineral, and for mining and removing the same from the land, and

A person in the actual possession of land at the time an injunction is issued, enjoining him from in any way interfering or meddling with the possession of the complainant, and from entering upon the premises, cannot be punished for contempt of court for thereafter retaining his possession even by the exercise of force, since the court is without power by preliminary ex parte order to turn even a wrongdoer out of possession of property. *People ex rel. —injunction as violative of guaranty of trial by jury.

Such an order depriving, as it does, a person in possession of property under a claim of right thereto of the possession thereof on an ex parte hearing, violates the constitutional guaranty against taking property except by due process of law on a judgment of the peers of the person affected. Bodwell v. Crawford, 26 Kan. 292, 40 Am. Rep. 306.

that Hogan had no other or further right or title in said land. It is further claimed that the only right in the premises possessed by the defendants is the right of Hogan, which was obtained by a sheriff's deed issued upon the sale of the land, in proceedings to foreclose a mortgage given by Hogan. The plaintiff claims to have succeeded to the rights of the railroad company under its reservation in the deed to Hogan, by a lease from it granting the right to enter upon the land, and mine and remove coal and mineral therefrom. The defendants deny that the deed to Hogan contained any reservation, but insist that he acquired the entire estate in the land from the railroad company, and that they succeeded to such estate through the sheriff's deed. At the time this suit was commenced, and for about two years prior thereto, the defendants were in the actual possession of the land in controversy, claiming the entire estate therein and title thereto. Before this suit was commenced, the plaintiff attempted to enter upon the land for the purpose of mining coal under its lease. The defendants, by force, denied it that privilege, and have ever since, by force, excluded it from the premises. This suit was commenced to enjoin such interference. The original deed to Hogan is lost, and the record thereof is mutilated so as to render its contents uncertain. The plaintiff has never been in the actual possession of the land, or asserted its rights as lessee.

Such an injunction is a clear invasion of the constitutional right to a trial by jury by due process of law, before a person shall be deprived of his property. Crossland v. Crossland, 53 W. Va. 108, 44 S. E. 424.

—form of injunction as affecting question.

A preliminary injunction will not issue where the effect of it is to put the plaintiff in possession of the disputed premises, although in form it is preventive, merely being to restrain the defendant from interfering with the plaintiff in taking possession. Lowenthal v. New Music Hall Co. 100 Ill. App. 274.

A person out of possession of land cannot regain possession by means of an interlocutory injunction restraining those in possession from interfering with the possession of the plaintiff or from molesting him on the land, and this is true although he claims to have been ousted from possession by a suit in the state court which acted in the matter without jurisdiction. Lacastagne v. Chapuis, 144 U. S. 119, 36 L. ed. 368, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 659.

Equity will not by preliminary injunction restrain the interference with complainant's possession of land where the effect would be to reinstate him in possession, where the right of possession is disputed and depends upon the construction of a contract. Akrill v. Selden, 1 Barb. 316.

Nor will it evict a person from the actual possession of land the title to which is in dispute, although in form the order merely restrains him from further interfering with the land or the house and crops thereon. Laughn v. Yawn, 103 Ga. 567, 29 S. E. 159; Beacham v. Wrightsville & T. R. Co. 125 Ga. 362, 54 S. E. 157.

Cases illustrating general rule—contesting factions.

A preliminary injunction should not issue in favor of contending church factions, the result of which would be to take the church property from possession of one faction and turn it over to the other. Fredericks v. Huber, 180 Pa. 572, 37 Atl. 90.
2 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Nor will it issue for the purpose of ousting from possession the trustees appointed by the court, and place in control trustees appointed by an organization owning the property. Harris v. Pounds, 64 Ga. 121.

In a contest between different societies for the possession of a room or hall wherein their meetings are held, equity will not by preliminary injunction deprive an innocent third party of the actual, and the defendants of the constructive, possession of the room or hall. Stout v. Williams, 203 Pa. 161, 52 Atl. 169.

Where there is a bona fide dispute as to the title to a strip of ground occupied by a side track, a court of equity will not by preliminary injunction require a railroad company in possession of the strip of land to surrender it to another company asserting title and right of possession thereto. Wilkinson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 13 Montg. Co. L. Rep. 93.

Equity is without power to restrain a railroad company in possession of land from interfering with the act of another company in constructing upon such land another railway. Calvert v. State, 34 Neb. 616, 52 N. W. 687.

A preliminary injunction will not issue in behalf of a railroad company out of possession of land, but claiming title and the right of possession, restraining another company in possession from enjoying the use thereof, or interfering with its use by the plaintiff. Farmers' R. Co. v. Reno, O. C. & P. R. Co. 53 Pa. 224.

Graves, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff freely admits that the defendants own the land in controversy, subject only to its rights as lessee to mine and remove coal and mineral therefrom. It merely claims an easement in the surface, such as will enable it to exercise fully its rights as lessee, and does not wish to disturb the defendants in the enjoyment of the possession and use of the surface further than is reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of its own rights under its lease. It therefore insists that ejectment is neither an adequate nor an appropriate remedy under the facts of this case, and that injunction is both appropriate and adequate, and the only proper remedy. The defendants urge that the coal which the plaintiff claims to own is a part of the land which they occupy, and of which they have exclusive, actual, peaceable possession, peaceable even against the plaintiff; that they claim to be the owners of the entire estate in the land, including the coal and mineral, and the only contention between them and the plaintiff is as to the ownership of the coal; that an injunction would deprive them of their title to, and possession of, the coal, as completely and effectually

Equity will not by a preliminary injunction restrain a person in possession of land under claim of title thereto, from removing or attempting to remove crops then on the land, or from disposing of the same, or in any manner interfering with the possession of the property by the complainant, who also claims title thereto. *State ex rel. But trustees appointed by an assignment for the benefit of creditors of a bank are entitled to the aid of a court of equity as against the directors of a bank to have the trust established, and by preliminary injunction to prevent the directors from interfering with the trustees in obtaining possession of the assets of the bank, although such assets are then in the possession of the director, and the effect of the injunction is to transfer the possession of the estate and the assets of the bank from the directors to the trustees. Ex parte Conway, 4 Ark. 302. This case recognizes the general rule that equity will not by preliminary injunction transfer the possession of property from one party to the suit to the other, but holds that the rule does not apply where the purpose is to enforce a trust like the one mentioned.

Contest between entrymen under homestead laws.

The general rule that a person out of possession of land cannot by a preliminary injunction be restored to possession does not apply where the person in possession is a mere trespasser, although claiming as an entryman, where the plaintiff's right in the property is that of a prior entryman. In cases of this character an injunction will issue (Sproat v. Darling, 2 Okla. 24, 35 Pac. 682, 886; Procter v. Stuart, 4 Okla. 679, 46 Pac. 501; Glover v. Swartz, 8 Okla. 642, 58 Pac. 943); or where the person in possession is retaining possession after his claim as entryman has been decided adversely to him by the land office. (Barnes v. Newton, 5 Okla. 428, 48 Pac. 190, 49 Pac. 1074; Calhoun v. McCormack, 7 Okla. 347, 54 Pac. 493; Barnett v. Ruyle, 9 Okla. 635, 60 Pac. 243.)

But the United States Supreme Court, as could be done by an action of ejectment, and therefore they are entitled to have the issue tried by a jury as matter of right.

Attention has been called to § 5 of the Bill of Rights, which reads, "The right of trial by jury shall be inviolate." Attention has also been called to § 4713, Gen. Stat. 1901, which reads: ". . . Issues of fact arising in actions for the recovery of money, or of specific real or personal property, shall be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived, or a reference be ordered, as hereinafter provided." It is everywhere held that this constitutional provision preserves whatever rights of trial by jury existed at common law when the provision was adopted. We are inclined to agree with the view of the defendants. It is apparent that the real contention of the parties involves the ownership of the coal in question. If the plaintiff has an easement in the surface of the land, it is because of, and incident to, its ownership of the coal. Before a court can enjoin the defendants from interfering with the plaintiff in the use of the surface of the land for the purpose of mining coal, it must determine that the plaintiff is the owner of the coal. The defendants being in the actual possession of the coal as nearly as such possession is possible, the granting of such an injunction would be the same, in effect, as a judgment in ejectment, as it would determine both the title and possession of the real estate in contro-reversing an Oklahoma case, holds that an entryman out of possession, although having a decision by the land office in his favor, is not entitled to a preliminary injunction in effect giving to him the possession of the land as against the adverse claimant thereof then in possession, since he has a complete remedy by an action of forcible detainer. Black v. Jackson, 177 U. S. 349, 44 L. ed. 801, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648. The question of the right of possession is a proper matter for a jury trial. Potts v. Hollen, 177 U. S. 365, 44 L. ed. 808, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 654, reversing 6 Okla. 699, 52 Pac. 917.

And it has been held that a preliminary injunction will not issue to adjust possessory rights under the homestead laws to a tract of land, after the equitable title has passed from the United States and become vested in the individual, unless in a case which presents some recognized special ground therefor; and it is not sufficient that one party claims that he is the owner entitled to the immediate possession of the land, and that the other party unlawfully and without any right holds and retains possession. Laughlin v. Fariss, 7 Okla. 1, 50 Pac. 254.

And the general rule is asserted that a court of equity is without authority by preliminary injunction to dispossess one bona fide claimant of the land under the homestead laws, and turn the land over to another claimant. Brown v. Donnelly, 10 Okla. 296, 91 Pac. 859.

As between adverse claimants to land under the homestead laws, each of whom are in possession of different parcels of the same tract, equity will not interfere with the possession of either by a preliminary injunction restraining the one from interfering with the possession by the other of the whole. Littlefield v. Todd, 3 Okla. 1, 42 Pac. 10.

When suit between landlord and tenant.

no ground for equitable interference by injunction, where the effect will be to transfer the premises under lease from the one party to the other. Thus, it has been held that equity has no power upon a bill to set aside a lease of land on the ground that it was procured through fraud, by preliminary injunction, to turn the lessee out of possession of the land, and give the same to the lessor. Arnold v. Bright, 41 Mich. 207, 2 N. W. 16. And a court of equity will not by preliminary injunction deprive a tenant in possession of land, of the right secured to him by statute, of a notice to quit, as a condition precedent to proceedings to oust him from the possession. Hall v. Henninger, 145 Iowa, 230, 139 Am. St. Rep. 412, 121 N. W. 6. Nor restore to a landlord the possession of premises, the right to which is denied by the tenant. Hubbard v. Mobray, 20 Md. 165. Neither will it interfere in behalf of the owner of land against a person claiming as tenant under a lease with the owner's agent, whose authority the owner denies. Bodwell v. Crawford, 26 Kan. 292, 40 Am. Rep. 306. Nor in favor of a landlord as against the assignee of his tenant, although the landlord asserts the assignment is in violation of the lease and hence a forfeiture of all rights thereunder. Doige v. Bruce, 141 Iowa, 210, 119 N. W. 624.

In Pokegama Sugar-Pine Lumber Co. v. Klamath River Lumber & Improv. Co. 86 Fed. 528, however, a preliminary injunction mandatory in form was issued requiring a landlord to surrender to the tenant the possession of the leased premises, which the landlord had forcibly and unlawfully obtained. In this case the possession had continued for a period of two or three weeks at the time the application for the injunction was made, but, notwithstanding this fact, the relief was given, on the theories, first, that the nature of defendant's possession, together with his relation of landlord, was such as to require equitable interference in behalf of the tenant, and, second, that the case came within the rule that the defendant's possession was but an interruption of the prior possession of the comversy. The plaintiff has never been in the possession and enjoyment of the so-called easement, and its right thereto is now being asserted for the first time. It may be conceded that injunction is a proper and ordinary remedy for the protection of owners in the enjoyment of their rights in real estate, but here this remedy is invoked for a very different purpose. Its object is not to protect a right which the plaintiff has in real estate, but its purpose is to obtain thereby a title to real estate from others who are already in possession and claiming to be the owners thereof. It is true, as has been suggested, that courts of equity often examine into questions of title not for the mere purpose of determining the question of ownership between the parties, but for the purpose of administering equitable relief concerning the use or occupancy of the land. Upon this point Chancellor Kent, in the case of Abbott v. Allen, 2 Johns. Ch. 519, 7 Am. Dec. 554, said: "This court may perhaps try title to land when it arises incidentally; but it is understood not to be within its province when the case depends on a single legal title, and is brought up directly by the bill. The power is only to be exercised in difficult and complicated cases affording peculiar grounds for equitable interference." In 24 Cyc. 109, it is said: "While courts of equity have jurisdiction to protect and enforce equitable titles, and may in certain plaintain, and hence the complainant might be restored to possession without first establishing his title or right to possession. The form of the injunction was negative, and restrained the defendant from interfering with complainant's control of the property. And see as to proceedings for contempt for violation of an injunction issued as above stated, 86 Fed 538. And see also same case on final hearing, 96 Fed. 34, reaffirming the jurisdiction of equity under such circumstances to interpose by way of an injunction.

But it has been held that equity will not, at the instance of a lessee of mining property, restrain the lessor from taking or keeping possession of the property, where he is in fact in possession, although such possession was forcibly taken, and had been continued but a few days at the time of the application for a preliminary injunction. Black Point Syndicate v. Eastern Concessions, 79 L. T. N. S. 658.

Lowenthal v. New Music Hall Co. 100 Ill. App. 274, also, holds that where a landlord has forcibly repossessed himself of a leased property, and placed in possession another tenant, the original tenant is not entitled to a preliminary injunction in effect restoring him to possession.

Character of possession.

In People ex rel. Massler v. Simonson, 10 Mich. 335, it is asserted that a court of equity is without power by preliminary ex parte order, to turn even a wrongdoer out of possession of land.

Hence, although a person is forcibly ousted from the possession of land, he is not entitled to a preliminary injunction restoring such possession, where the other party for some days has been in the exclusive possession. Catholicon Hot Springs Co. v. Ferguson, 7 S. D. 503, 64 N. W. 539. In reaching this conclusion in the foregoing case, it is said that the allegations in the complaint that the defendants, without right or title, by fraud and stealth, entered into possession, ousted and ejected the complainant therefrom, and ever since have withheld by force and violence, and still 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) withhold in like manner, the premises, came very far short of stating facts entitling the plaintiff to an injunction, and the court adds: "The facts so alleged, in connection with the other facts alleged in the complaint, constitute a good cause of action at law for the recovery of the possession of the premises from the defendant, but they show no right in the plaintiff to equitable relief by way of injunction."

And although the plaintiff has been interfered with and deprived of the use of a shaft or well by the defendants, who have forcibly taken possession thereof, the former is not entitled to an injunction restraining the latter from further interfering with his use of the well, the injunction being in effect a writ of restitution. San Antonio Water Co. v. Bodenhamer, 133 Cal. 248, 65 Pac. 471.

See also Laughlin v. Fariss, 7 Okla. 1, 50 Pac. 254, and Lowenthal v. New Music Hall Co. 100 Ill. App. 274, supra.

And it has been held that equity would not by preliminary injunction oust a water company from the possession of the tow-path of a canal company, although possession was forcibly taken, and the rule is stated that the mere taking possession of lands, and holding them vi et armis, would not form the basis for arresting the commission of the wrongful act, although it is recognized that equity will protect an easement from violation if the existence of the easement and its character and extent are plain. Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. New York & N. J. Water Co. 76 N. J. Eq. 504, 74 Atl. 970.

Where a person has taken forcible possession of property, and commences legal proceedings to have a void contract relating thereto avoided, the defendant in the proceeding is not entitled to equitable aid to have restored to him the possession of the property pending the proceedings, especially where such possession would be of no real advantage to him; and this is true although plaintiff in obtaining possession ousted defendant. Central Branch Union P. R. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 1 McCrary, 551, 3 Fed. 417.

In some jurisdictions an exception is cases try suits to quiet title or remove cloud without the intervention of a jury, questions as to the legal title to land are of right triable by jury, and this right cannot be abrogated by statute, or avoided by bringing an action which is, in effect, an action of ejectment in the form of a suit in equity."

The rule that actions for the trial of title to real estate shall be tried to a jury has always been favored, and with practical unanimity has been upheld by the courts. The difficulty encountered in the enforcement of this rule consists chiefly in determining whether or not the action under consideration comes within the rule. The test upon this question which has been generally followed is that, where the real object of the action, whatever its form, appears to be to settle a disputed question of title, then either party may demand a jury as matter of right. If, on the other hand, the purpose is to obtain proper equitable relief, then the chancellor may administer it, even though it involves an examination of title. In the case of Martin v. Martin, 118 Ind. 228, 20 N. E. 783, it was said: "It is not every cause of action which the pleader styles an action of ejectment or to quiet title, that entitles the parties to a trial by jury; nor will the prayer for relief have any controlling influence in determining whether or not a jury may be called. The court will look made to the general rule, of cases where the defendant obtained possession of the premises through force and without any apparent right, and his possession had continued for a comparatively short period of time. Such possession is regarded merely as an interruption of the complainant's possession, and as not such a possession as entitled the defendant to insist that the complainant be relegated to his remedy at law before being restored to possession. This doctrine was applied in Pokegama Sugar-Pine Lumber Co. v. Klamath River Lumber & Improv. Co. 86 Fed. 528, an action by a tenant for injunction to be restored to the possession of the leased premises, from which he had been wrongfully ousted by the landlord.

And in Jeff Chaison Townsite Co. v. McFaddin, W. & K. Land Co. 56 Tex. Civ. App. 611, 121 S. W. 716, where an injunction was granted restraining the defendants from further interfering with the complainant's possession of a canal running through defendants' property, and requiring them to remove all obstructions placed by them upon the canal, it was issued on the theory that, the complainant having opened a canal through the land in question, with the consent or acquiescence of the then owners, and having been in the quiet and undisturbed use and enjoyment of the easement for some period of time when the defendants forcibly took possession of the same, and fenced the land including the canal, hence the effect of the injunction was merely to restore the possession thus forcibly invaded, and preserve the status until the question of plaintiff's right is determined; and the rule is here asserted that, in determining whether or not to issue a preliminary injunction, the effect of which will be to take possession of property from one person and give it to another, a court will look not only to the fact that the defendant is in possession of the property, but will also consider the nature of his possession and the manner in which he acquired it.

In Hadfield v. Bartlett, 66 Wis. 634, 29 N. W. 639, the granting of a preliminary injunction was said to be within the sound discretion of the trial court, although it is 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

run against a person in possession of land and buildings thereon, and enjoined such person from taking possession of the premises or certain of the buildings, which had formerly been in possession of the plaintiff, holding under a contract of purchase from the vendor of the defendant, the plaintiff having been forcibly ousted from his possession after he had commenced a suit for the specific performance of his contract of purchase. The question here under consideration was not alluded to by the court in reaching its conclusion, and it apparently regarded the injunction as in effect preserving the property in the condition in which it was in at the time of the commencement of the suit for specific performance. The purpose of the injunction suit was not only in effect to have restored to the plaintiff the possession of the property, but also to restrain the prosecution of suits at law brought against him by the defendant for trespass, the trespass being based on acts of plaintiff in his attempts to regain possession of the property, and in addition to enjoin the defendant from taking possession of the property. The further prosecution of these trespass suits was also enjoined until the final determination of the suit for specific performance.

Sproat v. Durland, 2 Okla. 24, 35 Pac. 682, 880, has frequently been cited as supporting the doctrine that the court, in determining the right to a preliminary injunction transferring the possession of property from the defendant to the plaintiff, will consider the manner in which the defendant obtained the possession, as well as the period of time he has held it, and if he is a mere trespasser, and his possession amounts merely to an interruption of the possession of the plaintiff, a preliminary injunction will issue restoring possession to the plaintiff. The case, however, does not give full support to this theory; indeed it is doubtful if it gives any support to the doctrine, since the right to an injunction is confined to cases where the plaintiff is an entryman of land under the homestead laws, and hence, according to the laws of Oklahoma, has no adequate remedy at law. A. G. S.

to the substantial averments of the complaint or cross complaint, as the case may be, and from the facts so averred determine whether the action is one of equitable or common-law jurisdiction, and, if the former, refuse a trial by jury." In the case of Spencer v. Robbins, 106 Ind. 580, 5 N. E. 726, it was said: "Where the purpose of the action is primarily to establish an equitable right to land, and acquire a legal title through such right by the decree of a court, as by the specific enforcement of an agreement, the reformation of a deed, or the establishment of a trust, etc., the case is of equitable cognizance." In the case of Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 64 Pac. 1091, it was said: "Courts, however, in guarding the constitutional rights to a jury trial, have repeatedly held that, where the suit should have been, and in substance is, an action for the recovery of the possession of land, the right of a defendant to a jury cannot be defeated by the mere device of bringing the action in an equitable form. And so it has been held that the right to a jury is not defeated where, at the commencement of the action, the defendant, and not the plaintiff, was in the actual possession of the premises involved; and it has also been held that where the defendant had been for a long time in the actual possession, and the plaintiff had ousted him, the plaintiff, by first bringing his action to quiet title, could not, by such inversion of parties, avoid the defendant's right to a jury, but that the action should be treated as substantially an action to recover possession." See also Newman v. Duane, 89 Cal. 597, 27 Pac. 66. For other cases on this subject generally, see 3 Ann. Cas. 245-250, where they are collected in a note.

The petition in this case is full and complete in its statement of fact. It is not difficult to ascertain from it what the plaintiff wants. It wants the coal. Its right to take the coal depends upon ownership. The ownership is strenuously denied; indeed the denial is asserted by force and arms. The defendants are in the actual possession of the land, and claim to have full title thereto. They are in a position to protect the coal by preventing the plaintiff from removing it. The important question, as it seems to us, is, Who owns the coal? If this question is answered, then the whole controversy will be settled; but nothing can be settled until it is answered. The coal is specific real property as much as the surface. Together they constitute the entire estate in the land. The plaintiff wants to try out the question of title to the coal without a jury, and then take possession of it under the protection of an injunction, which will prevent the opposition of the defendants. This avoids the real merits of the controversy. It gives undue prominence to the question of whether or not the plaintiff has an easement under which it may mine coal, and treats the ownership of the coal as a minor and comparatively unimportant inquiry. By such a proceeding the defendants are deprived of a right given to them both by the Constitution and the statute. This cannot be sustained.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, with direction to proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Graves, J., on June 12, 1909, handed down the following additional opinion:

A petition for rehearing has been filed in this case, wherein it is urged that the opinion herein does not contain an order dissolving the temporary injunction granted by the probate judge when the action was commenced. It is also suggested that because of this omission the plaintiff is continuing to operate the coal mines upon the premises in controversy, to the great loss and injury of the defendants. It is further stated that the plaintiff is acting in this respect under the assumption that the temporary order furnishes complete protection for such conduct.

It was the view of the court when the opinion was formulated that the order therein made would vacate and set aside all the injunction orders which had been made in the action, and the intention was that it should have that effect. The final decree contains the following language: "It is therefore by the court considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the temporary injunction heretofore issued herein be, and it is hereby made, permanent and perpetual, that is to say," etc., indicating an intention to adopt and make the temporary order a part of the final judgment. If the temporary injunction continued to be operative until the final decree was entered, then it became a part of such decree, and was annulled by the order of reversal. No further order, therefore, seems to be necessary.

With this explanation, the petition is denied.

PHILADELPHIA TRUST, SAFE DEPOSIT, & INSURANCE COMPANY et al.

Incompetent person — consent to sale of real estate.

1. One under guardianship as an habitual drunkard is not capable of giving his valid consent to the conveyance of property which has been placed in trust for him, and which may be conveyed by the trustee with his consent.

Consent by guardian — authority of court.

2. Note. — Power of court or guardian of incompetent or habitual drunkard to consent to conveyance by trustee under a trust requiring consent by cestui que trust.

The decision in PHILADELPHIA TRUST, S. D. & INS. CO. v. ALLISON, holding that a court having jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for an habitual drunkard may, if it also has full equity powers, authorize the guardian to consent to the conveyance of certain real estate, situated in another state, which had been placed in trust for the ward prior to his becoming incompetent, with authority in the trustee to convey it with the consent of the beneficiary, appears to be a pioneer.

Where it is provided that the trust property may be sold with the consent of the cestui que trust, it is held where the cestui que trust is competent to give consent, that it must be obtained before a valid transfer of the property can be made. Thus, where a provision to this effect existed in O'Connor v. Waldo, 83 Hun, 480, 31 N. Y. Supp. 1105, the court said: "It seems to be apparent, upon a consideration of this trust deed, that the trustee had no power to make any conveyance of this trust property except upon the consent of his cestui que trust. In the case at bar it is not claimed that any such consent was obtained. All that the record discloses is a simple assignment executed by the trustee. The rule has been too well established to need the citation of authorities here that a trustee has no general power of disposition of a trust estate, but must derive such power from the instrument creating the trust; or, in special convey it with the consent of the beneficiary.

(August 3, 1911.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Hancock County for the determination of the Law Court of a bill in equity praying for the specific performance of the agreement of the defendant's testator to purchase and take a conveyance of certain real estate. Decree for plaintiffs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Symonds, Snow, Cook, & Hutchinson for plaintiffs.

Messrs. E. B. Mears and Deasy & Lyman for defendant.

Savage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Bill in equity praying for the specific performance of the agreement of William C. Allison to purchase and take a conveyance of certain real estate situated in Bar Harbor, in this state. The case is reported to the law court on bill, answer, and proofs for its determination and final judgment.

circumstances, it has been held that such power might be implied. But where there is a designation of the method in which the trust estate is to be sold, if at all, there can be no question but that the trustee cannot convey any title except in the manner provided for by the trust deed. The provision in the deed necessarily excludes all other powers."

Where, as in PHILADELPHIA TRUST, S. D. & INS. CO. v. ALLISON, the cestui que trust was sui juris at the time the trust was created, but became incompetent thereafter, a situation arises which the creator of the trust did not anticipate; and it would seem proper in such a case that the court should have power to authorize the guardian to consent to a conveyance of the property in behalf of the cestui que trust. It would seem that the result might be different in a case where the trust was created after the cestui que trust was under a disability, should such a case arise.

Under an act passed in Pennsylvania in 1853, the orphans' court was authorized to decree a sale where property was held in trust, and one or more persons required to consent to its conveyance unreasonably withheld their consent, and it has been held under this act that an objection by the owners of a one-sixth interest to the making of an improvement lease of the trust property which was advantageous was unreasonable, and that a decree should be made. Freeman's Estate, 181 Pa. 405, 59 Am. St. Rep. 659, 37 Atl. 591.

As to who may elect against will in behalf of insane widow, see notes to Andrews v. Bassett, 17 L.R.A. 297, and Hardy v. Richards, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1210. J. T. W.

The present defendant is the executrix of the will of William C. Allison.

Omitting unimportant allegations, the bill shows, and it is admitted or proved, that on November 3, 1905, William C. Allison, of Philadelphia, in accordance with a previous written agreement between himself and his wife, Lenore M. Allison, dated October 24, 1905, executed and delivered to the Philadelphia Trust, Safe Deposit, & Insurance Company a deed of trust for the benefit of Lenore M. Allison, for life, with remainder over to such person or persons as Mrs. Allison should appoint by will or other written instrument, or, in default of such appointment, to her next of kin. In that trust deed it was stipulated that the trustee should have full power "to sell in fee simple or otherwise the real estate thereafter to be conveyed to it, under and in accordance with the provisions of the agreement of October 24, 1905," and reinvest the proceeds, but it was "provided that the said cottage at Bar Harbor, Maine, should be subject to sale or rent by the said trustee only with the consent of the said Lenore M. Allison, and should be sold or rented by said trustee at any time upon her request, and for a price or sum acceptable to her." The agreement of October 24, 1905, between Mr. and Mrs. Allison, contained a similar stipulation. The "cottage at Bar Harbor" is the subject of the present controversy.

It appears that afterwards, on December 9, 1905, and in accordance with their previous agreement of October 24, 1905, referred to in the trust deed, Mr. and Mrs. Allison conveyed the Bar Harbor property to the plaintiff trust company in trust, for the purposes and uses set forth in the deed of trust, for the benefit of Mrs. Allison, for life, with remainder over, as already stated.

It appears that Mrs. Allison was divorced from her husband in 1907. It also appears that afterwards, in the same year, by virtue of proceedings instituted in the court of common pleas for the county of Philadelphia, in which county Mrs. Allison resided, she was "duly declared" by that court to be an habitual drunkard, and the court appointed George F. Pettinos a committee of her person and estate. Mr. Pettinos joins in this bill as a party plaintiff.

Afterwards, on May 27, 1909, the plaintiff trust company, as trustee, and Mr. Pettinos, as committee of the person and estate of Mrs. Allison, entered into a written agreement with the defendant's testator for the sale and conveyance to him by the trust company, with the consent of the committee, of the Bar Harbor property. The agreement contained the stipulation 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that "the title is to be good and marketable."

Subsequently, on petition of Mr. Pettinos, the committee, the court of common pleas of Philadelphia, which had appointed him, made an order approving the sale, and authorizing Mr. Pettinos, as committee, "to formally consent thereto on behalf of the said Lenore M. Allison, and to join therein." Mrs. Allison joined in the prayer of the petition, and consented, so far as she had legal capacity to do so, to the making of the order. Under this order, Mr. Pettinos, as committee, and for and in behalf of Mrs. Allison, formally consented to the sale and conveyance, as a compliance with the provisions relating to the consent of Mrs. Allison, contained in the agreement of October 24, 1905, and in the trust deed.

A deed executed by the trust company and consented to by Mr. Pettinos, as committee, was seasonably tendered to the defendant's testator, who refused to accept it and pay according to the terms of the agreement. And this bill is brought to compel specific performance of his agreement to purchase.

The defense relied upon may be stated in these words:

(1) That, as appears by the bill and exhibits, the title tendered by the plaintiffs to the defendant was not good and marketable, as required by the contract set forth.

(2) That the Philadelphia Trust, Safe Deposit, & Insurance Company, trustee, was authorized to make sale of the property described in the bill only with the consent of Lenore M. Allison, and that it is not shown that Lenore M. Allison has consented to the sale of the described premises.

(3) That the personal consent of Lenore M. Allison is necessary, and that no other person can be authorized by any court to exercise this consent for her.

(4) That the giving of such consent is a necessary step in the transfer of title to land in Maine, and that, if any person can be authorized to consent in behalf of Mrs. Allison, such authority must come from the courts of Maine, which have exclusive jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

The pivotal question is whether Mrs. Allison's committee could, under the decree of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia, give consent to the sale, with the same effect as if it had been given by Mrs. Allison personally, when not under guardianship. The fact that Mrs. Allison personally gave her consent to the decree may be disregarded, for it is practically conceded, and such is the law, that, while Mrs. Allison is under guardianship as an habitual drunkard, she is incapable of giving consent, the same as if she had been adjudged insane. She is conclusively presumed to be incapable of conducting her affairs. She cannot transact any business. She cannot make a valid deed or bond. She cannot waive the notice of protest on a bill. She cannot waive the provisions of her husband's will, and elect to take dower. She cannot do anything which involves the exercise of discrimination and judgment. Cockrill v. Cockrill, 79 Fed. 143; L'Amoureux v. Crosby, 2 Paige, 422, 22 Am. Dec. 655; Imhoff v. Witmer, 31 Pa. 244; Wadsworth v. Sharpsteen, 8 N. Y. 338, 59 Am. Dec. 499; Penhallow v. Kimball, 61 N. H. 596; Ashby v. Palmer, 1 Meriv. 296, 15 Revised Rep. 116, 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 38; Re Wharton, 5 De. G. M. & G. 33, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 522, 18 Jur. 289, 22 L. J. N. S. 298, 2 Week. Rep. 248. So here the right to consent implies the right not to consent. The exercise of the right is an election, and involves the exercise of judgment, to do which Mrs. Allison is incapable.

So, too, we may dismiss the question whether the committee, irrespective of the decree of the court, had authority to consent for Mrs. Allison. The right to consent was personal to her. She might exercise it or not, according to her fancy or her judgment. No one else could exercise it for her, in the absence of statute authority, except under the decree of a court having jurisdiction to authorize its exercise. Penhallow v. Kimball, 61 N. H. 596; Heavenridge v. Nelson, 56 Ind. 90; Merrill v. Emery, 10 Pick. 507; Sherman v. Newton, 6 Gray, 307; Kennedy v. Johnston, 65 Pa. 451, 3 Am. Rep. 650; Griswold v. Butler, 3 Conn. 227; Pinkerton v. Sargent, 102 Mass. 568. We know of no case where the facts are like those in the case at bar. But the cases we have cited, all involving the right of personal election, are so closely analogous in principle to this one that they may be regarded as authorities on the question. And, too, this case must be distinguished from the class of cases, some of which are cited by the plaintiff, in which it is held that a guardian may avoid or confirm the deed or other contract of his own ward, or may indorse a note payable to him, or may take an appeal for him, or may do many other things which are proper for the collection or conservation of the estate which has been committed to his management and control. These matters relate to the administration of the estate, and do not involve the exercise of a right of personal election given to the ward by statute or contract. In this case Mr. Pettinos, the committee, had nothing to do with the management or control of the trust estate.

It remains to inquire as to the effect of the decree of the court in Philadelphia. It is not disputed that the court of common pleas of Philadelphia had jurisdiction to appoint a committee or guardian of Mrs. Allison. And it is clearly shown by the Constitution and statutes of Pennsylvania, which are made a part of the record, that that court did have such jurisdiction. The extent of the power of that court under the Constitution and statutes is stated in Kennedy v. Johnston, 65 Pa. 451, 3 Am. Rep. 650, as follows: "In this state the fifth article of the Constitution, § 6, confers on the court of common pleas the power of a court of chancery, so far as relates (inter alia) to the persons and estates of those who are non compos mentis. The act of 13th June, 1836, relating to lunatics and habitual drunkards, Phamph. L. 592, was passed to carry out this provision of the Constitution." And again, in McGinnis v. Com. 74 Pa. 245, [Tarr's Estate, 10 Pa. Super. Ct. 577]: "Under our statutes, an habitual drunkard is classed with a lunatic, and all such are special subjects in relation to whom the courts of common pleas are expressly invested with the jurisdiction and powers of a court of chancery. In effect, the lunatic is the ward of the court, and his estate is in custodia legis." Thus it is seen that the court of common pleas of Philadelphia not only has jurisdiction over the persons and estates of lunatics and habitual drunkards, such as is commonly exercised by probate courts in this state, but also, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, it possesses broad chancery powers. It is a court of equity as to matters within its jurisdiction. Such is the effect of the Constitution and statutes of Pennsylvania, as interpreted by the highest court in that state.

So the question now is, Can a court having jurisdiction of the person and estate of a lunatic or drunkard, and being also possessed of chancery powers, authorize the committee or guardian to consent to a conveyance by the trustee, when the ward is no longer competent to consent? We think it can. It is true, as we have already said, that the right to consent was personal to Mrs. Allison. So long as she was sui juris, no one else could exercise it for her. But suppose the title to the property had been in her instead of in the trustee, the right to convey it would have been personal to her. The one right was no more personal than the other. It is not doubted that the court, after she was adjudged incompetent, might authorize, or even in some cases order, her committee to convey her estate. If it is competent for a court of equity to authorize or order a sale when the title is in her, why may it not authorize her committee to consent to a sale for her, if consent is a necessary prerequisite, when the title is in a trustee for her benefit? We perceive no valid distinction. In each case, it is in reality the court acting for the ward, doing what she can no longer do, consenting when she can no longer consent.

The underlying reason for the existence of such a power is, we think, because the good of the ward requires it. It seems to us to be a proper chancery power. It may be indispensable for the protection or conservation of the ward's interests. And it must be assumed that it will not be exercised except it be for the advantage of the ward.

No case precisely in point has been cited by counsel, nor have we found any. But there are cases which in principle are closely analogous. The right to elect between a testamentary provision and dower is personal to the widow. If she dies, it cannot be exercised by her heirs. Sherman v. Newton, 6 Gray, 307. If she is insane, her guardian, as such, cannot exercise it. Pinkerton v. Sargent, 102 Mass. 568. Nevertheless, the almost unbroken current of authority is that, where the person entitled or bound to elect is a lunatic, the court having jurisdiction of the matter will make the election in her behalf. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 510; State ex rel. Martin v. Ueland, 30 Minn. 277, 15 N. W. 245; Washburn v. Van Steenwyck, 32 Minn. 336, 20 N. W. 324; Van Steenwyck v. Washburn, 59 Wis. 483, 48 Am. Rep. 532, 17 N. W. 289; Penhallow v. Kimball, 61 N. H. 596; Kennedy v. Johnston, 65 Pa. 451, 3 Am. Rep. 650. So, in Wilder v. Pigott, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 203, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 141, 48 L. T. N. S. 112, 31 Week. Rep. 377, it was held that the court could confirm a marriage settlement for an insane wife, though the right to confirm was personal to her.

We conclude that the court of common pleas of Philadelphia had the power to authorize Mrs. Allison's committee to consent to the conveyance in her behalf.

The defendant contends next that the decree of the Philadelphia court could not have any effect, no matter what authority or jurisdiction may have been conferred upon that court by statute in Pennsylvania, because the land to be affected lay not in Pennsylvania, but in Maine, and because questions involving titles to land in a state are exclusively cognizable by the courts of that state.

It is true, as claimed, that the laws of the state in which land is situated control exclusively its descent, devise, alienation, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) and transfer, and the effect and construction of instruments intended to convey it, and that the disposition of immovable property, in whatever manner, is exclusively subject to the government within whose jurisdiction the property is situated. United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 315, 24 L. ed. 192; Hutchinson Invest. Co. v. Caldwell, 152 U. S. 65, 38 L. ed. 356, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504. It is true, also, that while a court having jurisdiction over the owner of land in another state may compel him to transfer, by proceedings in personam, it cannot empower its master, or committee, guardian, administrator, or other officer to transfer the land. And the deed of the officer of the court of land outside the jurisdiction of the court is ineffectual. Watts v. Waddle, 6 Pet. 389, 8 L. ed. 437; Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25, 10 L. ed. 873; Hotchkiss v. Middlekauf, 96 Va. 649, 43 L.R.A. 806, 32 S. E. 36; Davis v. Headley, 22 N. J. Eq. 115.

But this is a different case. The Philadelphia court is not undertaking to transfer the title to land in this state, nor to make any decree which affects the title, or the mode of its conveyance. The trust company has the title in fee. It wishes to convey it, but its power to do so is limited, not by the laws of the state, but by the terms of the trust deed. The court creates neither the power nor the limitation. The giving consent does not transfer the title. It merely affects the exercise of the power. It removes an obstacle to the exercise of the power. The court did not attempt to act upon the land, but upon one of the parties. It did not assume jurisdiction over lands in Maine. It merely exercised jurisdiction to do what its ward, if sane, might have done. It consented that the trustee, having title, might convey it. See Washburn v. Van Steenwyck, 32 Minn. 336, 20 N. W. 324. If a court with appropriate jurisdiction over the parties may compel a transfer of land in another state by in personam proceedings, it is difficult to see why it may not permit a transfer, which is this case, by similar proceedings. And we are unable to perceive how the decree of the Philadelphia court, having jurisdiction of the parties, was in any sense an infringement of the exclusive jurisdiction of this state over the land.

The court are of opinion accordingly that the deed tendered by the plaintiffs to William C. Allison, as set forth in the bill, conformed to the agreement of sale of May 27, 1909, which we have referred to, and conveyed a good and marketable title to the real estate described in the agreement, subject, of course, to encumbrances mentioned therein, and that specific performance should be decreed as prayed for.

Bill sustained, with costs. Decree for specific performance, to be entered by a single justice.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. WILLIAM MORRIS, Appt.,
v.

BERT CLARK, Town Treasurer, Respnt.

(116 Minn. 500, 134 N. W. 129.)

Mandamus — payment of town orders.

1. Mandamus is a proper remedy to compel the treasurer of a town to pay valid orders issued by the board of supervisors, and the validity of such orders may be determined in such proceeding.

Municipal corporation — contract for labor — absence of bond — allowance of claim.

2. Conceding that a contract made with a town is invalid for the failure to give the bond provided by Rev. Laws 1905, § 4535, after the contract has been fully performed, and the work has been approved and accepted by the town board, the contractor has a valid claim against the town for the reasonable value of the services

Headnotes by BUNN, J.

Note. — Liability of municipality upon implied contract for labor performed or services accepted by it.

This note is supplemental to a note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1125.

As to the general question of the liability of a municipality or other public corporation on an implied contract, see note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1117, and note appended to Perry Water, Light, & Ice Co. v. Perry, post, 72.

The general rule has been stated that counties are governmental agencies of the state, and hence are chargeable with and liable only for those claims or demands which the law imposes upon them or empowers them to contract, and no officer can charge the county with the payment of any claim due him, however meritorious, or whatever benefit the county may derive therefrom, unless expressly or by necessary implication authorized by law. Mobile County v. State, — Ala. —, 54 So. 995.

But where general authority exists in a county to make a contract for services to be performed in the preparation of the delinquent tax record, the reasonable value of services rendered in this regard may be recovered, although the county cannot be held upon the express contract. Stringer v. Franklin County, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 123 S. W. 1168.

And a county may be liable on an implied contract for labor or material furnished 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

rendered, and the board may audit and allow such claim, and draw orders in payment thereof. Such orders are valid, and the treasurer is not justified in refusing to pay the same on the ground that no bond was given.

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the District Court for Hubbard County in respondent's favor in a mandamus proceeding brought to compel respondent, as town treasurer, to pay to relator two several orders or warrants issued to him by the board of supervisors in part payment for work and services performed under a contract with the town board. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Spooner, Laybourn, & Lucas for appellant.

Mr. G. W. Campbell for respondent.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a mandamus proceeding, brought to compel the respondent, as treasurer of the town of Rockwood, in Hubbard county, to pay to the relator two several orders or warrants issued to him by the board of supervisors, of the town, in part of benefit to and officially accepted by it, where the subject-matter of the contract was within the range of the contractual powers of the county. Montgomery County v. Pruett, — Ala. —, 57 So. 823.

A recovery cannot be had on an implied contract for services rendered a city in paving streets under a written agreement invalid because it did not comply with the charter provisions designed to secure competition in such contracts, although the work described in the contract is completed and has been accepted by the city. Cawker v. Central Bitulithic Paving Co. 140 Wis. 25, 121 N. W. 888.

But where a municipality has general authority in that regard, although no written contract exists between the parties, if the proper official directs a person to proceed with certain work, and permits him to continue for some time before notifying him to quit, the municipality is liable to him for the reasonable value of the services thus performed. Stivers v. Cherryvale, 86 Kan. 270, 120 Pac. 361.

So, a school district is liable for the reasonable value of services performed in its behalf by an officer of the district, the contract, for this reason, being invalid. Smith v. Dandridge, 98 Ark. 38, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 129, 135 S. W. 800; and see note in 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 129, as to the liability of a municipality on implied contract for benefits received under an express contract, invalid because of interest therein by an officer of the municipality. A. G. S.

payment for work done under a contract made by relator with the board for grubbing, clearing, and preparing for grading certain public roads in the town. Respondent answered, setting up a large number of defenses, including fraud and failure to complete the work, and, further, that the relator failed to give the bond required by § 4535, Rev. Laws 1905. The trial court found in substance that the warrants were presented to respondent as treasurer of the town, and payment thereof refused; that relator, at the time the warrants were issued, had fully performed his contract, and that the supervisors of the town had duly approved and accepted the services; that at the time the orders were presented there was sufficient money in the hands of respondent belonging to the road and bridge fund to pay the same; that none of the defenses set up in the answer were proven, except that no bond was ever given by relator, or filed with or approved by the treasurer of the town, as required by the provisions of §§ 4535 and 4536, Rev. Laws 1905. The court held that the failure to give this bond rendered the contract void, and that the treasurer, therefore, legally refused payment of the orders. Judgment in favor of respondent was entered, and relator appealed.

1. Respondent contends that mandamus is not the proper remedy. But, if the orders were valid, it was the duty of the respondent to pay them. The matter did not involve the judgment or discretion of the treasurer, within the meaning of the rule that mandamus lies only to compel the performance of ministerial duties. We hold that there was no speedy and adequate remedy at law, and that mandamus was the proper remedy to compel the performance by respondent of an act which the law enjoined as a duty resulting from his office. State ex rel. Minneapolis Tribune Co. v. Ames, 31 Minn. 440, 18 N. W. 277; State ex rel. Young v. Holgate, 107 Minn. 71, 119 N. W. 792. Nor does it affect this question that it was the duty of the treasurer to refuse payment of warrants when he had knowledge of facts which made them illegal. Such duty did not make the payment of legal warrants other than a ministerial duty. The question of their legality could be, as it in fact was, tried out in the mandamus proceeding, just as fully as in an action against the town on the warrants or on a quantum valebat.

2. Was the filing and approval of the bond required by statute absolutely essential to a recovery in this proceeding? That is, was the action of the board of supervisors in issuing to relator the warrants or orders referred to void, because the bond was not given, notwithstanding the contract has been fully completed and the work accepted? Section 4535, Rev. Laws 1905, provides that no contract with a municipal corporation, for the doing of any public work, shall be valid for any purpose, unless the contractor shall give a bond to the municipal corporation for the use of the obligee and all persons doing work or furnishing materials or machinery under the contract, conditioned to save the obligee harmless from all claims that may accrue on account of the doing of the work specified. Section 4536, as amended by Laws 1907, chap. 379, p. 535 (Rev. Laws Supp. 1909, § 4536), provides that the bond shall be approved by and filed with the treasurer of the obligee, and that, if such bond be not taken, the corporation or body for which the work is done under the contract shall be liable to all persons furnishing labor or material to the contractor for any loss resulting to them from the failure to take the bond.

As said in Wilcox Lumber Co. v. School Dist. No. 268, 103 Minn. 43, 114 N. W. 262, the purpose of this statute was the protection of laborers and materialmen performing labor or furnishing materials for the execution of a public work to which the mechanics' lien statute does not apply. The bond stands as security for the payment of all obligations incurred by the contractor. If he fails, and is unable to pay such obligations, the corporation becomes liable for losses sustained by such failure and inability of the contractor to pay the debts incurred by him. The statute provides that the contract shall not be valid for any purpose if the bond is not given and approved. But conceding that the contract is void, and that it cannot be validated or vitalized, nevertheless it is clear that relator, on full performance of his work and the acceptance thereof by the town, had a moral and legal claim against the town for the reasonable value of his labor and the materials furnished. This is practically conceded by respondent, and is clearly correct under numerous decisions of this court. The supervisors of the town recognized this claim, and issued the orders in question in part payment thereof. They must be presumed to have known that relator had not given the bond, as it was their duty to see that the bond was given, so as to protect the town from liability. They have charge of all the affairs of the town not by law committed to other officers. Rev. Laws 1905, § 651. But they knew that relator had completed the work he agreed to do, that his services had been duly approved and accepted, and that the town was morally and legally liable for such services. We perceive no statutory prohibition against the issuance of orders to pay such a claim, notwithstanding that the contract under which the work was done may have been invalid. The question here is as to the validity of the orders issued to relator, and their validity depends not on the validity of the contract, but on the validity of relator's claim in payment of which the orders were issued.

The invalidity of the contract, if it was invalid, was not because of fraud, or for any reasons that would defeat recovery of a claim for part performance. There was simply the failure to give security for the benefit of laborers and materialmen,—an omission that may have rendered the contract invalid, but which could not and did not affect the right of the contractor to receive payment for his services after they were rendered and accepted. It was the duty of the supervisors to audit and allow proper accounts and claims against the town, and to draw orders on the treasurer in payment of such accounts and claims when allowed. They audited and allowed relator's claim, and drew the orders in question in part payment thereof. It was a legal and valid claim for services actually rendered and accepted, and we hold that the orders issued to relator were valid, even though the contract may have been invalid. There being funds in his hands applicable to their payment, it was the duty of the treasurer to pay the orders. It is immaterial whether this conclusion be based upon the doctrine that a contract that is ultra vires, but which has been fully performed by both parties, is no longer assailable by either, or upon the rule that one who renders services that are accepted by the corporation can recover on a quantum meruit. Either rule leads to the same result,—the conclusion that the orders were valid. The following authorities support the conclusions here reached: Schmidt v. Stearns County, 34 Minn. 112, 24 N. W. 358; Andrews v. School Dist. No. 4, 37 Minn. 96, 33 N. W. 217; Swenson v. Bird Island, 93 Minn. 336, 101 N. W. 495; Currie v. School Dist. No. 26, 35 Minn. 163, 27 N. W. 922; Wilcox Lumber Co. v. School Dist. No. 268, 103 Minn. 43, 114 N. W. 262; Bell v. Kirkland, 102 Minn. 213, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 793, 120 Am. St. Rep. 621, 113 N. W. 271; Moore v. Ramsey County, 104 Minn. 32, 115 N. W. 750.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to amend its conclusions of law in accordance with this opinion, and to grant the writ as prayed for in the petition.

A. CROSBY KENNETT.

Jury — trover — complicated action.

In trover by the holder of a chattel mortgage to recover possession of the chattels from one denying his title because of subsequent conveyances, the court cannot deny defendant a jury trial because the matters are so complicated and involved that they cannot be clearly understood by a jury, where no accounting, marshaling, or other equitable relief is necessary.

I. Introductory.

The correctness of the decision in DALEY v. KENNETT, that a case could not be withdrawn from the jury because it was "so complicated, and involved so many details, that the jury could not clearly comprehend it," admits of no question.

The complication of facts has never been a reason for withdrawing issues from a jury, except in matters of account.

Where civil cases involving matters of account have been held triable without a jury, in jurisdictions where the Constitution preserves the right of trial by jury in civil cases, it has been in general on the ground that the case was one in which a jury trial was not a matter of right at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the state, the constitutional provisions upholding the right of trial by jury usually being construed to mean that it was the right as then exercised which was intended.

This would exclude from such right in general (1) cases at law involving accounts where a compulsory reference was allowable at the time of the adoption of the EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Carroll County denying him a jury trial in an action for the conversion of certain machinery and appliances. Sustained.

This is an action for the conversion of certain machinery and appliances upon which mortgages were held by both plaintiff and defendant. Defendant holds also a vendors' lien and bill of sale. There was a trial by the court, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiff. Before bringing suit, the amount due upon the vendors' lien held by defendant was tendered by plaintiff and the property demanded, which the defendant refused to deliver, claiming title under his mortgage and bill of sale. Defendant excepted to the denial of a jury trial.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. W. D. H. Hill, for defendant:

A jury trial may be demanded in all ordinary actions at law where issues of fact arise upon the pleadings, and where the action is to recover money, and equitable relief is not asked or necessary.

Constitution, and (2) matters of account cognizable in equity.

It is the purpose of this note to confine the discussion of the subject to the question of complexity or complication of accounts as a reason for dispensing with a jury. Cases relating to the appointment of an auditor whose report is to be used at a jury trial are excluded.

For cases on the constitutional right to trial by jury, see the note to Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Sparrow, 1 L.R.A. 480.

For compulsory reference as a denial of the constitutional right to trial by jury, see the note to Steck v. Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. 25 L.R.A. 67.

II. Compulsory reference of actions at law involving accounts.

As heretofore stated, the usual test of the constitutionality of a statute allowing compulsory references in actions at law involving an account is whether a jury was required in cases involving such an account at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the state.

It will be observed that it has been held in jurisdictions where the act permitting compulsory references was passed under the territorial government that the provisions of the Constitution of the later-born state, preserving the right of trial by jury, will not be construed to give such right where such statute had denied it. This produces a curious result. While the Constitution of the United States, preserving the right of trial by jury, does not apply to the states, it is generally held that in the United States courts, under the United States Constitution, the mere fact that the trial will require the examination of a long account on either side will not justify a compulsory reference (though that be the law of the forum). (See infra, "Federal courts.") Yet it was held in Wisconsin when it was still a territory (see infra) that such a statute was not contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and since becoming a state, its decisions have been based on the ground that the right of trial by jury at the time of the adoption of the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Constitution did not exist in cases covered by such statute. The same question is involved in the North Dakota and Oregon cases, infra.

Statute preceding Constitution.

At the time of the adoption of the New York Constitution in 1777, there was in force a statute allowing a compulsory reference in a case where the trial would require the examination of a long account, either on one side or the other. Steck v. Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. 142 N. Y. 236, 25 L.R.A. 67, 37 N. E. 1 (per Earl, J.), where, however, it was held that the case could not be sent to a referee, as it was not within the statute in force at the adoption of the Constitution.

So, in Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 337, 35 Am. Dec. 624, it was said that references as broad as that in the case then pending, which was a case obviously requiring the examination of a long account, were sanctioned by statute and sanctioned by the court long before the adoption of the state Constitution, but in that case the reference was by consent.

In Smith v. Kunert, 17 N. D. 120, 115 N. W. 76, it was held that as, at the time of the adoption of the North Dakota Constitution, there was in force a territorial statute authorizing a compulsory reference in actions the trial of which involved the examination of a long account on either side, such compulsory references were not against the constitutional provision that "the right to trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate." Cited in Dreveskracht v. First State Bank, 16 N. D. 555, 113 N. W. 1032.

Similarly, in Tribou v. Strowbridge, 7 Or. 156, where a statute of the territory of Oregon permitting a compulsory reference where the trial of an issue of fact required an examination of a long account on either side was in force at the time of the adoption of the Oregon Constitution, providing that in civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, it was held that the statute did not abridge the right of trial by jury as it existed at the time of the adoption of the Oregon Constitution. And this decision was followed in McDonald v. American Mortg. Co. 17 Or. 626, 21 Pac. 883; Trummer v. Konrad, 32 Or. 54, 51 Pac. 447; Salem Traction Co. v. Anson, 41 Or. 562, 67 Pac. 1015, 69 Pac. 675.

In Hall v. Armstrong, 65 Vt. 421, 20 L.R.A. 366, 26 Atl. 592, it was held that whereas, under the Vermont statute in force at the time of the adoption of its Constitution, the parties in an action of "book account" were not entitled to a trial by jury, they were not entitled to a trial by jury in such an action after the adoption of the Constitution.

In Norton v. Rooker, 1 Jinney (Wis.) 195, it was held in the territory of Wisconsin that the statute of the territory authorizing a reference to three referees in cases which might require the examination of a long account on either side was not contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

In Mead v. Walker, 17 Wis. 189, it was held that as before the adoption of the Wisconsin Constitution, compulsory references were allowed in all actions involving the examination of a long account, a statute permitting them would not conflict with the constitutional provision that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," but that, under the terms of the statute in force when the action arose, the consent of both parties was necessary.

In Dane County v. Dunning, 20 Wis. 210, after the statute had been changed so as to eliminate the consent of the parties, it was held that a compulsory reference in case of a long account was allowable. This case was approved in Cairns v. O'Brien, 40 Wis. 469, and in Monitor Iron Works Co. v. Ketchum, 47 Wis. 177, 2 N. W. 90, and has continued to be cited in Wisconsin. See Brillion Lumber Co. v. Barnard, 131 Wis. 284, 111 N. W. 483.

—Missouri.

In Edwardson v. Garnhart, 56 Mo. 81, the court said: "It is contended that the Constitution provides that the right of trial by jury shall forever remain inviolate, and that this action being an action at law, the defendant had the right to have the question of fact involved therein tried by a jury; that if our statute providing for the reference of cases is to be construed to include actions at law, the statute itself would be unconstitutional and void. Our statute provides that the court in which a cause is pending may, on the application of either party, direct a reference where the trial of an issue of fact shall require the examination of a long account on either side, etc. Wagner, Stat. 1041, § 18. This statute has been in force in this state for at least thirty years,—twenty years before the adoption of our present Constitution [of 1865]. It is not to be presumed that the provision of the Constitution relied on was intended to change the law as it then existed and had been practised on in the state for a quarter of a century; the object of the framers of the Constitution must have been to preserve the right of trial by jury, as it then existed and had been practised in the state, and not to establish a new rule of practice on that subject."

Peaslee, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The trial of this case involved a question of what property was covered by the descriptions in the plaintiff's mortgages, and a large number of items of damage. It was taken from the jury and tried by the court, because the presiding justice found it was "so complicated, and involved so many details, that the jury could not clearly understand and comprehend it." To this procedure the defendant excepted. The finding of fact involved in the ruling is conclusive here. Low v. Independent Christian Soc. 67 N. H. 488, 32 Atl. 762; Dole v. Pike, 64 N. H. 22, 3 Atl. 743. The question presented by the by jury shall forever remain inviolate, and that this action being an action at law, the defendant had the right to have the question of fact involved therein tried by a jury; that if our statute providing for the reference of cases is to be construed to include actions at law, the statute itself would be unconstitutional and void. Our statute provides that the court in which a cause is pending may, on the application of either party, direct a reference where the trial of an issue of fact shall require the examination of a long account on either side, etc. Wagner, Stat. 1041, § 18. This statute has been in force in this state for at least thirty years,—twenty years before the adoption of our present Constitution [of 1865]. It is not to be presumed that the provision of the Constitution relied on was intended to change the law as it then existed and had been practised on in the state for a quarter of a century; the object of the framers of the Constitution must have been to preserve the right of trial by jury, as it then existed and had been practised in the state, and not to establish a new rule of practice on that subject."

This authority was followed in cases arising under the Constitution of 1875. Crève Cœur Lake Ice Co. v. Tamm, 138 Mo. 385, 39 S. W. 701; Wentzville Tobacco Co. v. Walker, 123 Mo. 662, 27 S. W. 639; Tinsley v. Kemery, 170 Mo. 310, 70 S. W. 601.

But it had already been held in Missouri that a similar statute was valid, though passed subsequent to the adoption of the first Constitution of the state. Shepard v. Bank of State, 15 Mo. 143, where the customer of a bank, having brought an action for an alleged balance, the court referred the case to a referee, and said, upon affirming the report: "The petition claims that there is no account to be settled, but a single issue of payment to be proved. This payment, however, is founded on a long list of items, extending through several years, and requires as much care and knowledge of keeping and making entries in books as is necessary in keeping accounts between merchants and others. Nor do we consider the statute, thus authorizing the exception, therefore, is whether, in a case like this, the defendant can claim a jury trial as of right, even when the matters to be tried are so complicated and involved that they cannot be clearly understood by the jury. The logical answer to this isolated inquiry is not necessarily the legal one. The people having reserved to themselves the right of jury trial, except "in cases in which it has been heretofore otherwise used and practised" (Bill of Rights, art. 20), the scope of the exception is shown "by common-law principles and by history." Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 193, 203.

What was the practice in cases of this class in 1784? With some exceptions which do not bear upon the present controversy, the right to trial by jury in suits at law was absolute. The books will be searched in vain for a precedent for taking a common-law action from the jury upon the ground that the particular case was beyond their comprehension. And so the practice continued to be in England. The situation is thus described as late as 1847: "The facts of the case, as stated by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, very clearly show that it would be mere mockery to bring such an action before a jury. What would be done if such an action were brought at nisi prius? I know that within five minutes from the opening of the case by the leading counsel for the plaintiffs the judge would say: 'If we sit here for a fortnight we cannot try this court to appoint referees, unconstitutional, as trenching upon the trial by jury. It has even been the practice of the courts, in somewhat kindred cases, to appoint auditors or referees to settle accounts; nor has the power ever been seriously disputed before. Without going into a labored defense of this power of the court, under the present statute, to appoint referees, in cases like the one before us, we will state it as our opinion that this power is vested in our courts, and that it is not inconsistent with the provisions of our Constitution, in trenching upon the right of trial by jury. Its practice often tends to the elucidation of accounts and transactions between man and man, and mainly contributes to the ends of truth and justice. We are not willing, therefore, to put a stop to its exercise by throwing out doubts of its constitutionality. This settles the case, so far as regards the errors in respect to referees and trial by jury. We rule these points against the petitioner."

Statute succeeding Constitution.

In Grim v. Norris, 19 Cal. 140, 79 Am. Dec. 206, it was held that the California statute as to the referring of a long account should be construed as applying only to equity causes; and that in an action at law the court had no power of reference in an action or matter containing a long account, without the consent of the parties,—that it would be contrary to the Constitution.

In St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. v. Gardner, 19 Minn. 132, Gil. 99, 18 Am. Rep. 334, the court said: "The Gen. Stat. (chap. 66, § 228) provides that when the parties to a civil action, or a proceeding of a civil nature, do not consent, the court may, upon the application of either, or of its own motion, direct a reference when the trial of an issue of fact requires the examination of a long account on either side. . . . This is a case at law, strictly and properly so called, in contradistinction to a case in equity, or a special proceeding. It is undeniable that the statute above cited, in 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

terms, authorizes a compulsory reference in actions at law. Gen. Stat. chap. 66, § 1. It is equally clear, in our judgment, that in so far as it does, it conflicts with the constitutional provision (art. 1, § 4) that 'the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, and shall extend to all cases at law, without regard to the amount in controversy.'" The court distinguishes the New York rule inasmuch as, at the time of the adoption of the Minnesota Constitution, the law of the United States was the law of the territory.

So, in Norden v. Buck, 79 Minn. 352, 82 N. W. 644, the court said: "We have no doubt the trial court was right in refusing to withdraw the cause from the jury. The action was somewhat complicated, with quite a number of disputed claims for labor and material, all issues of fact to be determined, although none of them matters of an equitable character, but purely of such a nature as would, under the common-law practice, have been submitted to a jury."

Federal courts.

Where the question arises in the United States courts, it is the provision of the United States Constitution which controls in such cases, irrespective of the law of the forum.

In Howe Mach. Co. v. Edwards, 15 Blatchf. 402, Fed. Cas. No. 6,784, it was held that the circuit court of the United States had no right to order a reference without the consent of one of the parties, under the New York statute providing that the court may, on the application of either party, without the consent of the other direct a trial of the issues of fact by a referee, where the trial will require an examination of a long account on either side, and will not require the decision of difficult questions of law.

The same was held as to the district court of the United States with reference to a similar earlier New York statute United States v. Rathbone, 2 Paine, 578, Fed. Cas. No. 16,121.

In Sulzer v. Watson, 39 Fed. 414, it was sort of case, and therefore it is indispensably necessary for the sake of justice—not to save us from the trouble of trying the case, which we are perfectly willing to take, but for the sake of justice—that there should be a reference to an arbitrator, who will take accounts between the parties.' My lords, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred that recommendation would at once be acceded to. Sometimes there is a wrong-headed client who is fool enough to resist such a recommendation, and to whom, according to a well-known saying we have in Westminster Hall, it is necessary to use 'strong language' to induce him to listen to the recommendation of my lord, the judge." Taff Vale R. Co. v. Nixon, 1 H. L. Cas. 111, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 406.

held that a Vermont action of book account, being an action at law, though not in any form known to the common law, could not be tried in the usual manner in the United States circuit court, as that would deprive the parties of the right of trial by jury, required by the laws of the United States, and an auditor could not be appointed therefor in such action.

In Davis v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 25 Fed. 786, the court considered that the local statute (of Kansas) was to be disregarded if it did not extend to references such as the one in question, and the court there ordered a reference (in a case which seemed to be simply a claim against a railway company for many overcharges) on the ground of necessity. The court took the view that such references were allowable at common law,—an idea which might have been corrected by the reading of Lord Campbell's opinion in Taff Vale R. Co. v. Nixon, quoted in DALEY v. KENNETT.

While this note does not include the subject of what is an "account" under such statutes, the reader is reminded that the expression does not embrace every aggregation of items of damage.

III. Equitable cognizance of accounts as complicated.

a. In general.

In general, in matters cognizable in equity, there is no right to a jury trial.

While the contrary was held at one time in New Hampshire (Marston v. Brackett, 9 N. H. 346, and Hoitt v. Bureleigh, 18 N. H. 391), these decisions have since been overruled (Bellows v. Bellows, 58 N. H. 60; Davis v. Dyer, 62 N. H. 231; State ex rel. Rhodes v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 18 L.R.A. 646, 25 Atl. 588).

It was held, however, in Lamaster v. Scofield, 5 Neb. 148, that some of the jurisdiction of equity had been lost by the statutory creation of a remedy at law where formerly there was none save in equity. In that case the court said, in ruling that a reference in an action at law was wrong—

But if the obdurate litigant still persisted in his course, the judge could go no further. "I may remind your lordships that the inadequacy of a jury to try such a case was felt so strongly by the common-law commissioners appointed some years ago, that to meet the case of an obstinate party who stood out against the recommendation of a reference they recommended that an act of Parliament should be passed, giving the judge power to force a reference, and such a bill was brought in, but it was opposed by high authority" and failed of enactment. Ibid. In this state of the law, and with the distinction between law and equity strictly and technically observed, it is manifestly useless to search for precedents in the common-law reports.

fully ordered, under the statute permitting it in case of mutual accounts or where the account is on one side only, and it is necessary that the party on the other side be examined as a witness to prove the account: "Under the Code, discovery has ceased to be one of the objects sought in a court of equity; jurisdiction, therefore, in cases involving the examination of mutual accounts, cannot be maintained on that ground. The parties to the suit may be examined as witnesses in the case; and a court of law has authority, equal to that possessed by a court of equity, to compel the production of books, vouchers, or other documentary evidence. The jurisdiction of courts of equity is therefore restricted to those cases which have their origin in intimate or confidential relations of the parties, and does not extend to ordinary actions involving mutual accounts between creditor and debtor. In all such cases either party has a right to demand a jury; and a court cannot refer such a cause except by consent of the parties. This right is guaranteed by the Constitution, and its application should not be restricted by the courts."

And something of the same nature is suggested in the opinion of Finch, J., in Marvin v. Brooks, infra, subd. III. c. 4.

This note is here concerned with the question whether equity has cognizance of a matter of account simply on account of its complications or complexity; that is to say, where the account is only on one side, and no discovery is required, and there is no fiduciary relation or other matter of equitable cognizance.

It is frequently difficult to separate the cases; often the court does not state whether, in its opinion, the accounts are "mutual" or not, and thus the grounds of its decision are uncertain; particularly as the cases as reported often do not show what the accounts were. A refusal of jurisdiction on the ground of lack of complexity may mean that the court is simply holding that there should be complexity even in cases of mutuality of accounts.

In England it was laid down by Lord Eldon as late as Dinwiddie v. Bailey, 6 Ves.

The power now invoked was unknown to the common law.

"But these courts [of law] possess no authority to stop the progress of such suits for the purpose of subjecting the matter in dispute to the investigation of a more convenient tribunal. Unless the parties voluntarily adopt an arrangement for that purpose, the case proceeds to trial with a certainty in many instances that it will not be tried. A reference is proposed by the judge and is recommended by the counsel; but the parties, having made expensive preparation for the trial, are unwilling to forego the right of an immediate decision, and, as the judge has no power to enforce compliance with his proposal, the cause is suffered to go on till it becomes at length manifest that no satisfactory verdict can be given by the jury, and a consent to arbitration is extorted rather than given." Second Report to His Majesty by the Commissioners Appointed to Inquire into the Practice and Procedure of the Superior Courts of Law (1830), p. 26.

In equity, however, there was no jury trial as of right (State ex rel. Rhodes v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 18 L.R.A. 646, 25 Atl. 588), and in matters involving accounts the jury trial was avoided by proceeding on the chancery side of the court. "It is not improbable that originally, in cases of account which might be cognizable at law, courts of equity interfered upon the special ground of accident, mistake, or fraud. If so, the ground was very soon

And the very broad terms in which Kent, Ch. J., in Ludlow v. Simond, 2 Cai. Cas. 1, 2 Am. Dec. 291, and in Post v. Kimberly, 9 Johns. 470, referred to the jurisdiction of equity in matters of account must be read with the same judge's judgment as chancellor in Porter v. Spencer, 2 Johns. Ch. 169, where he said, in granting a ne exeat: "In the present case I have some doubts whether the bill states a matter of account on which the jurisdiction of the court can attach. To sustain a bill for an account there must be mutual demands, and not merely payments by way of set-off. A single matter cannot be the subject of an account. There must be a series of transactions on one side, and of payments on the other. Dinwiddie v. Bailey, 6 Ves. Jr. 136, and Wells v. Cooper, there cited. I place my interference on the necessity of the case. From the facts charged and sworn to, it appears to me that the remedy in the suit pending at law would be absolutely defeated without the interposition of this court."

That complexity alone will not give jurisdiction was also the opinion of Mr. Justice Story in his Equity Jurisprudence, where he says, §§ 458, 459: "Courts of equity will also entertain jurisdiction in matters of account not only when there are mutual accounts, but also when the accounts to be examined are on one side only, and a discovery is wanted in aid of the account and is obtained. But in such a case, if no discovery is asked or required by the frame of the bill, the jurisdiction will not be maintainable. . . . So that, on the whole, it may be laid down as a general doctrine that in matters of account growing out of privity of contract, courts of equity have a general jurisdiction where there are mutual accounts (and a fortiori where these accounts are complicated), and also where the accounts are on one side, but a discovery is sought and is material to the relief. And on the other hand, where the accounts are all on one side and no discovery is sought or required, and also where there is a single matter on the side of the plaintiff seeking relief, and mere set-offs on the other side, and no discovery is sought or required,—in all such cases courts of equity will decline taking jurisdiction of the cause."

Notwithstanding the clearness of this statement, in many of the American cases Story's Equity Jurisprudence is given as authority to the contrary.

b. English cases.

The later English cases hold complexity or complication a sufficient ground of jurisdiction. Such was the view of Lord Redesdale in O'Connor v. Spaight, 1 Sch. & Lef. 305, which was approved in Kennington v. Houghton, 2 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 620.

And in Taff Vale R. Co. v. Nixon, 1 H. L. Cas. 111, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 406, Cottenham, L. Ch., said: "Now I think the rule is very well laid down by Lord Redesdale in the case of O'Connor v. Spaight, in which he says (1 Sch. & Lef. 309): 'The ground on which I think that this is a proper case for equity is, that the account has become so complicated that a court of law would be incompetent to examine it, upon a trial at nisi prius, with all necessary accuracy, and it could appear only from the result of the account that the rent was not due. This is a principle on which courts of equity constantly act, by taking cognizance of matters which, though cognizable at law, are yet so involved with a complex account that it cannot properly be taken at law, and until the result of the account, the justice of the case cannot appear. Matter of account may indeed be made the subject of an action; but an account of this sort is not a proper subject for this mode of proceeding. The old mode of proceeding upon the writ of account shows it. The only judgment was that the party 'should account,' and then the account was taken by the auditor. The court never went into it.'" In the same case Lord Campbell said: "I proceed upon this ground, that here is a complicated account and could not by possibility be taken by a jury." And after enlarged, and embraced mixed cases not governed by these matters. The courts soon arrived at the conclusion that the true principle upon which they should entertain suits for an account in matters cognizable at law was that either a court of law could not give any remedy at all, or not so complete a remedy as courts of equity. And the moment this principle was adopted, in its just extent, the concurrent jurisdiction became almost universal, and reached almost instantaneously its present boundaries." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 452; Davis v. Dyer, 62 N. H. 231.

This jurisdiction was limited to causes involving some sort of an account, as that term is popularly understood. It could be invoked only in cases founded on contracts, making the statement quoted in DALEY v. KENNETT, he continued: "But, my Lords, it is quite clear that trial by jury never was meant for such a case, and it is wholly incapable of doing justice in such a case. Although a demand may resolve itself into a legal demand, still if there is such a complication of accounts that it is not a fit case for a trial at law, then, according to the rule laid down by that most eminent judge, Lord Redesdale, a bill in equity is the remedy."

So, in Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 28, which was a case between a customer and a banker, and the accounts were very simple and probably not mutual, Lord Campbell said, in concurring in the view that the case was not one for equity: "The time when the jurisdiction of equity attaches is when, at law, there is not a satisfactory remedy, or when, from the complexity of the accounts, it is not a fit case to be referred to a jury. I most heartily concur in the case of Taff Vale R. Co. v. Nixon, supra, in it, I think, most salutary doctrine, that where there are complex accounts, it is a much better thing, though all rests upon a legal demand, to file a bill, and at once to go to the master's office, and have the accounts taken there, than to bring an action at law, and have that investigation before a jury, for which a jury is clearly inadequate."

And this view of the jurisdiction was maintained in Curllish v. Wilson, 13 Ves. Jr. 276; Cooke v. Betham, 4 Jur. 957; and in Hill v. South Staffordshire R. Co. 12 L. T. N. S. 63, 11 Jur. N. S. 192.

But the doctrine of the O'Connor and Taff Vale Cases was adopted with reluctance.

In Phillips v. Phillips, 9 Hare, 471, the court said: "I have no doubt that this bill cannot be maintained. I take the rule to be that a bill of this nature will only lie where it relates to that which is the subject of a mutual account; and I understand a mutual account to mean, nor merely where one of two parties has received money and paid it on account of the other, but where each of two parties has received and paid or implied trusts, or when a remedy at law was lacking. It may be that it could with consistency have been extended generally to cases arising ex delicto, but this was not done. While, as Judge Story suggests, it is "difficult to trace out a distinct line where the legal remedy ends and the equitable jurisdiction begins" (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 460), it quite plainly appears that when there was an action for trover, equity would not interfere unless there was some special ground of jurisdiction. Bacon, Abr. Acompt. In 1745, a bill was brought against a former tenant for an accounting for timber cut from the freehold during the tenancy. Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said: "This is the most extraordinary bill that ever was brought in this court, on the other's account. I take the reason of that distinction to be that, in the case of proceedings at law, where each of two parties has received and paid on account of the other, what would be to be recovered would be the balance of the two accounts; and the party plaintiff would be required to prove, not merely that the other party had received money on his account, but also to enter into evidence of his own receipts and payments,—a position of the case which, to say the least, would be difficult to be dealt with at law. Where one party has merely received and paid moneys on account of the other, it becomes a simple case. The party plaintiff has to prove that the moneys have been received, and the other party has to prove his payments. The question is only as to the receipts on one side and the payments on the other, and it is a mere question of set-off; but it is otherwise where each party has received and paid. Mr. Baggallay says, and says truly, that there are cases of the first description which may still come to a court of equity. It is true that a case of mere receipts and payments may become so complicated, as Lord Cottenham said in the case of the Taff Vale R. Co., that the account cannot be taken at law, and may become properly the subject of the jurisdiction of a court of equity. But where the account is on one side only, I think a strong case must be shown before this court will exercise its jurisdiction."

In North-Eastern R. Co. v. Martin, 2 Phill. Ch. 758, Lord Chancellor Cottenham, in denying an injunction to restrain an action at law, said: "I am of opinion that this is not a proper case for an injunction. It is applied for upon the ground that, under the circumstances disclosed in the pleadings, justice cannot be done, or not so effectually done, by a trial of the action, as by an account taken before the master. That may be; but it does not of necessity follow that the trial of the action ought to be restrained. The observations of two noble Lords in the House of Lords, in the case of Taff Vale R. Co. v. Nixon, supra, have been referred to as expressing opinions and I hope never to see one of the like nature again. . . . Waste is a loss for which there is a proper remedy by action. In a court of law the party is not necessitated to bring an action of waste, but he may bring trover. Those are the remedies, and therefore there is no ground of equity to come into this court." Jesus College v. Bloom, 1 Ambl. 54. To the same effect are later English cases. Pulteney v. Warren, 6 Ves. Jr. 73, 89; Gent v. Harrison, 5 Jur. N. S. 1285, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 517, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 68, 1 L. T. N. S. 128, 8 Week. Rep. 57; 1 Maddock, Ch. Pr. 119.

Historically, if not logically, there was ground for this distinction. When the cumbersome action of account came into use in courts of law, the mathematical features of the case went to an auditor, while the ordinary issues of fact were separated out and tried by jury. "The old mode of proceeding upon the writ of account shows it. The only judgment was that the party 'should account,' and then the account was taken by the auditor; the court never went into it." O'Connor v. Spaight, 1 Sch. & Lef. 305; Carlisle v. Wilson, 13 Ves. Jr. 276. As accounts (in the technical sense) had never been tried by jury, there was no fundamental objection to the assumption of jurisdiction in equity.

This was the state of the law in 1784. At common law and in ordinary actions, the right to a jury trial was absolute. In equity there was jurisdiction in matters of that accounts ought to be decreed in all cases in which references would be pressed at nisi pruis: I apprehend that those observations were not intended to intimate any such rule or opinion, but were intended only to exemplify the great difficulty in dealing with such cases at law. But, be that as it may, I cannot accept any such ground or measure for exercising the equitable jurisdiction of this court in matters of account. It has rules and principles of its own, although the practical difficulty experienced in proceeding at law does form an important consideration in the exercise of the discretion of this court. The jurisdiction in matters of account is not exercised, as it is in many other cases, to prevent injustice which would arise from the exercise of a purely legal right, or to enforce justice in cases in which courts of law cannot afford it; but the jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the courts of law, and is adopted because, in certain cases, it has better means of ascertaining the rights of parties. It is therefore impossible with precision to lay down rules or establish definitions as to the cases in which it may be proper for this court to exercise this jurisdiction. The infinitely varied transactions of mankind would be found continually to baffle such rules, and to escape from such definitions. It is therefore necessary for this court to reserve to itself a large discretion, in the exercise of which due regard must be had, not only to the nature of the case, but to the conduct of the parties. In the present case, both concur in satisfying me that the trial of the action at law ought not to be stayed; it is not a case of mutual accounts, the only items on the one side being certain payments by the company to the plaintiffs at law which are not in dispute."

In Padwick v. Hurst, 18 Beav. 575, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 657, 18 Jur. 763, 2 Week. Rep. 501, the jurisdiction was refused where the accounts were not mutual, but the court seemed to consider that great complication would be a good ground for retaining the case in equity.

So, in Smith v. Leveaux, 2 De G. J. & S. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1, 9 Jur. N. S. 1140, 9 L. T. N. S. 313, 3 New Reports, 18, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 167, 12 Week. Rep. 31, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 419, the jurisdiction was denied where the acts were not mutual and there was no complication.

And in Bliss v. Smith, 34 Beav. 508, a building contract, Romilly, M. R., said: "Courts of equity interfere in two cases; one, where there is collusive dealing and concert between the employer and the person whom he has appointed architect, overseer, or agent, for the purpose of injuring the contractor or defeating his claim; then equity will interfere to prevent it. The other instance in which this court will interfere is a matter of discretion, when there are very long and complicated mutual accounts, which cannot be conveniently taken at law. Where neither of these circumstances occur, the case is simply one for the determination of a court of law."

It may be noted that in Dabbs v. Nugent, 11 Jur. N. S. 943, 13 L. T. N. S. 396, 14 Week. Rep. 94, the court criticizes the Taff Vale Case (as holding equity better than law) for the reason that in the final result of that case it afforded no relief.

c. American cases.

1. In general.

In the American cases there has been a drift in the direction of admitting the jurisdiction of equity in cases of accounts upon the ground of complexity alone; and the later writers in general seem to take this view, while the earlier writers, such as Story and Willard, are to the contrary.

In Fowle v. Lawrason, 5 Pet. 495, 8 L. ed. 204 Marshall, Ch. J., perhaps intended to admit the jurisdiction of equity upon the ground of complexity alone where he said: "In all cases in which an action of account would be the proper remedy at law, and in all cases where a trustee is a party, the jurisdiction of a court of equity is undoubted. It is the appropriate tribunal. But in transactions not of this peculiar character, great complexity ought to exist accounts if it appeared that the case could not be intelligently tried by jury. But there was no such equitable jurisdiction in actions sounding in tort, where the sole complaint was that the defendant had converted chattels, and damages alone were asked as a remedy. Logical or illogical, this was the line of demarcation. This was the use and practice which the people made the constitutional measure of their rights. This measure is not varied by modern methods of procedure, wherein forms of action are treated as largely immaterial. Its application is not abolished by the rule that the same suit may be at once an action at law and a bill in equity. Tasker v. Lord, 64 N. H. 279, 8 Atl. 823. "Constitutional construction . . . is not to be dealt with like unimportant forms of procedure, or English rules of law that are not adapted to the situation and circumstances of this country. On questions concerning the foundations of society, where a system of government has lasted more than a century, the ancient landmarks cannot be removed by judicial decisions." Unreported opinion by Doe, Ch. J. "The formal distinctions in the pleadings and modes of procedure are abolished; but the essential distinction between law and equity is not changed. The relief which the law affords must still be administered through the intervention of a jury, unless a jury be waived." Basey v. Gallagher, 20 Wall. 670, 680, 22 L. ed. 452, 453; State ex rel. Rhodes v. Sanders, 66 N. H. 39, 18 L.R.A. 646, 77, in the accounts, or some difficulty at law should interpose, some discovery should be required, in order to induce a court of chancery to exercise jurisdiction."

And such may have been the meaning of Harlan, J., where he says in Kirby v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 120 U. S. 130, 30 L. ed. 569, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 430 (though the point was not indispensable to the decision): "The complicated nature of the accounts between the parties constitutes itself a sufficient ground for going into equity."

2. Doctrine that complexity alone sufficient.

The view that complexity of accounts alone is sufficient to sustain equity jurisdiction was taken in Fenno v. Primrose, 116 Fed. 49; McMullen Lumber Co. v. Strother, 60 C. C. A. 433, 136 Fed. 295; Balfour v. San Joaquin Valley Bank, 156 Fed. 500; London Guarantee & Acci. Co. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 171 Fed. 278; Gleason & B. Mfg. Co. v. Hoffman, 168 Ill. 25, 48 N. E. 143; Crown Coal & Tow Co. v. Thomas, infra; O'Connor v. Henderson Bridge Co. 95 Ky. 633, 27 S. W. 251, 983; Sallee v. Fades, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 109, 50 S. W. 1102; Blodgett v. Foster, 114 Mich. 688, 68 Am. St. Rep. 504, 72 N. W. 1000; Sargent v. Putnam, 58 N. H. 182 (possibly obiter); Davis v. Dyer, 62 N. H. 231 (obiter); Low v. Independent Christian Society, 67 N. H. 48, 32 Atl. 762; DALEY v. KENNETT (obiter); McCulla v. Beadleston, 17 R. I. 20, 20 Atl. 11 (obiter); *Kerr v. Camden S. E. Co. The same view was apparently taken in Down v. Johnson, 12 Ga. 9; Printup v. Mitchell, 17 Ga. 558, 63 Am. Dec. 258; Covington v. Limerick, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 330, 40 S. W. 254; *Fair v. in 37 N. J. Eq. 564); State ex rel. Klutta v. McKenzie, 6 N. C. 102. See also Wilson v. Granger, 134 Ga. 680, 68 S. E. 514, where, however, there may have been mutual accounts.

In Fenno v. Primrose, 116 Fed. 49, the court said: "The only ground on which jurisdiction is asserted is the complicated nature of the accounts, rendering it, as we have shown, impracticable to take them by the ordinary common-law proceedings. In Mr. Bigelow's note to the section in Story's Equity Jurisprudence to which we have referred, he states three grounds of equity jurisdiction, among which is where dealings are so complicated that they cannot be properly adjusted in a court of law. That under such circumstances the chancellor has jurisdiction is apparently thoroughly settled in England, and, as is well known, the Federal courts act on the rules and principles which have long been recognized by the English equity courts, notwithstanding the general enactment in the statutes of the United States, barring the exercise of equitable jurisdiction where there is ample remedy at law."

In McMullen Lumber Co. v. Strother, 60 C. C. A. 433, 136 Fed. 295, where there were other matters of equitable cognizance, the court said: "The very condition on which a court of equity takes jurisdiction for the adjustment of mutual accounts is the presence of the fact of their intricacy and complications. It should therefore logically follow, where the intricacy and complication exist, the mere singleness of the accounting should not be controlling. . . . Moreover, the want of mutuality can present no barrier where a discovery lies and relief is asked thereon. . . . Nor should it present any obstacle to a resort to equity where, from the peculiarly complicated transactions, a trial to a jury at law would, in all reasonable probability, fall far short of the remedial adequacy of a proceeding in equity. While judges of state courts have expressed reluctance to entertain equity jurisdiction in such conditions of an accounting, it will generally be found that they parry the force of the 25 Atl. 588. The fact that the present suit is called an action in trover is not determinative of the issue presented by the exception. The nature of the case and of the relief sought must be looked to for the settlement of the constitutional question.

If this were in effect a suit for an accounting, the authorities cited by the plaintiff would be applicable and his claim well founded. But it is not such a suit. The vendors' lien held by the defendant is not of importance in the litigation. The amount due upon it is unquestioned, and the defendant refused to accept it because he denied the plaintiff's title to the property and claimed to hold the same under conveyances other than the lien memorandum. The case is the ordinary one of the holder of a chattel mortgage whose title is denied by one in possession under subsequent conveyances. With this case in hand, the plaintiff chose his remedy. If he might have proceeded in chancery for an equitable adjustment of conflicting claims, he did not do so, but elected to treat the conduct of the defendant as a conversion and to bring suit in trover. Having sought to avail himself of this remedy, he cannot now complain of the consequences which follow. The law applicable to the case is the same as it would be if a single chattel owned by the plaintiff had been converted by the defendant. There is nothing in the nature of an accounting involved in this controversy. The mere fact that the chattels are numerous does not make such a case. Un-argument of the practical unfitness of the average jury to deal with such matters by recourse to the provision of the state Code, which, in an action at law, authorizes the court, in its discretion, to send the matter to a referee."

In Alabama, while in Avery v. Ware, 58 Ala. 475, the court said that equity will not take jurisdiction when the accounts are all on one side, the court seems now to be in favor of the equity jurisdiction from its opinion in Beggs v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 96 Ala. 295, 38 Am. St. Rep. 94, 11 So. 381, where, while sustaining a demurrer to a bill on the ground that the complaint did not show the complication of accounts with sufficient particularity, it was nevertheless said: "Where the accounts are mutual and founded in privity, the jurisdiction of equity is undoubted. But where the accounts to be examined and stated are on one side only, the allegations of the bill must show the existence of certain conditions which are prerequisites to the exercise of equitable jurisdiction. There must either be so great a complication in the matters of account that a common-law court is unable to ferret them out, or there must be the allegations of such facts as show the necessity for a discovery, and this discovery must be prayed for."

In Arkansas, while the cases are obscure, they are probably to be understood as favoring the complexity of accounts as sufficient ground for equity jurisdiction.

In Trapnall v. Hill, 31 Ark. 345, the court, in sustaining the jurisdiction of equity in a case where it would seem that the account was only on one side, said: "In the case of Post v. Kimberly, 9 Johns. 493, it was held that, even admitting that the remedy was complete at law, that in matters of account, chancery courts exercised a very broad jurisdiction; their course of proceeding was considered peculiarly well calculated for the settlement of accounts, if they are in any degree long and complicated. . . . It is well to bear in mind that a single transaction will not amount to an account; the items must be mutual, the account a running one, or present some complications to distinguish it from a debt on one side, and a set-off on the other."

In State v. Churchill, 48 Ark. 426, 3 S. W. 352, 880, the court said that the treasurer of a state, keeping her accounts against him and his own against her, may be said to have kept "mutual accounts," because there were upon his books almost innumerable items of debt and credit, many of which were matters of contention and dispute between himself and the state, and that "it is safe to say that in all cases where 'mutuality of accounts' is claimed to be the basis of equity jurisdiction, 'mutuality' is only an essential element in this,—that it indicates intricacy and complication."

In Charlesworth v. Whitlow, 74 Ark. 277, 85 S. W. 423, where the jurisdiction was possibly sustainable by reason of the transactions being complicated by the acts and interests of a third person, the court, in sustaining equity jurisdiction, cites the Trapnall and Churchill Cases, but does not state the particular grounds of its decision.

In Printup v. Mitchell, 17 Ga. 558, 63 Am. Dec. 258, the court, in dismissing a bill to enjoin an action at law, said, among other things: "Again, it is contended that the bill should not be dismissed, as it will serve to adjust the unsettled accounts between the parties. To make this ground tenable, it should further appear that the accounts cannot, owing to their complexity or some other special cause, be arranged in a court of law. Nothing of this sort is pretended."

In Crown Coal & Tow Co. v. Thomas, 177 Ill. 534, 52 N. E. 1042, the court said: "Where the state of accounts between the parties is complicated and intricate, where the state of accounts between the parties is involved with third parties, where to do justice requires the employment of methods of investigation peculiar to courts of equity, and where it would be very difficult for a jury to unravel the numerous transactions, are conditions usually held to be sufficient to give a court of equity jurisdiction. The jurisdiction in equity does not, in such cases, depend upon the absence of a remedy at law, but upon its adequacy termyer v. Beinhauer, 105 N. Y. 521, 11 N. E. 847; Johnson v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 139 N. Y. 449, 34 N. E. 925. "Mere inconvenience is not a reason for refusing a jury trial in cases where the right is guaranteed by the Constitution." Davis v. Dyer, 62 N. H. 231, 239.

The encumbrances are not interwoven. There is no occasion to marshal assets or make an equitable application of the proceeds of the chattels. The plaintiff's two mortgages are admittedly prior to the defendant's mortgage and bill of sale. The issue is not of priority, but of title and value. In such a case the defendant is entitled to a jury trial. "In all actions for injury to property, the trial by jury included the assessment of the plaintiff's damages, when the verdict was for him. This we regard as an essential part of the trial by jury intended to be secured by the Constitution." East Kingston v. Towle, 48 N. H. 57, 64, 97 Am. Dec. 575, 2 Am. Rep. 174.

The suit is not one to redeem or foreclose. The plaintiff seeks to defeat the defendant's mortgage by showing a superior title. There is no suggestion in the case that he desires to redeem. Nor does he seek a foreclosure of his own mortgage by this proceeding. His sole claim here is to recover damages for a wrongful withholding of the mortgaged chattels.

The plaintiff errs in his assumption that the claim he asserts is an equitable one. He stands upon a strict legal right. It is or practicability, and upon the discretion of the court." Approved in Billboard Pub. Co. v. McCarahan, 151 Ill. App. 227.

In New Hampshire it is seen in DALEY v. KENNETT, that the court is committed to the doctrine that complexity alone is sufficient, as it says: "In equity there was jurisdiction in matters of accounts if it appeared that the case could not be intelligently tried by jury."

In Davis v. Dyer, 62 N. H. 231, where the court stated that the accounts were both mutual and complicated, it was said: "The leading ground on which the defendants claim the privilege of a jury trial for the purpose of changing the auditor's report is the right of trial by jury, given by the Constitution. Art. 20 of the Bill of Rights provides 'that in all controversies concerning property, and in all suits between two or more persons, except in cases in which it has been heretofore otherwise used and practised, the parties have a right to trial by jury, and this method shall be held sacred.' . . . Cases involving the investigation of accounts, particularly where the accounts are mutual or complicated, are within the equity jurisdiction of the court. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 441, 442, 442a, and notes. Although such cases are made the subjects of suits at law, in the trial equitable principles are applied, and equity jurisdiction is not lost. Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 511. It is the inconvenience and difficulty of properly and accurately adjusting and settling accounts of a complex nature in suits at law that have brought them within the equity jurisdiction of the court. . . . And the subject-matter of this suit requiring an investigation of accounts, both mutual and complicated, to which must be applied equitable principles, and lying within the equity jurisdiction of the court, the defendants have no absolute right to such a jury trial as is guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. . . . It was found that the case was too complicated to be intelligently understood by a jury, and for this reason the defendants were not entitled to any form of jury trial. Mere inconvenience is not a reason for refusing a jury trial in cases where the right is guaranteed by the Constitution. Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 206, 20 Am. Rep. 194. When, as in this case, there is no right of trial under the Constitution, and the fact exists, not of inconvenience, length of time, and increased expense of trial, but of the intrinsic impracticability of bringing the case to the intelligent comprehension of a jury, a trial would be a mockery of justice, and could not reasonably be insisted upon. It would not be claimed that a trial could be conducted in the presence of a musical concert or of a theatrical performance. The confusion arising from disturbing sounds and motions could be avoided by adjournment to another time and place. But a confusion arising from complications too intricate and difficult for the intelligence of jurymen to unfold cannot be controlled by time and place, nor avoided by postponement or change of location of the trial."

In Lindley v. McGlauffin, 57 Wash. 581, 107 Pac. 355, where the court stated that there was in the case a fiduciary relation, but that that was not necessary to give equity jurisdiction over accountings, it was also said: "In this state it is especially provided by statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 370) that a compulsory order of reference may be made when the trial of an issue of fact shall require the examination of a long account on either side; this, on the principle, of course, that the proceeding was formerly cognizable in chancery, and not subject to trial as an action at law. . . . If the action involves a long and complicated account, as it did in this instance, the court has jurisdiction to try it in that manner which will do justice between the parties, regardless of the character of the legal relationship between them."

And in Poultry Producers' Union v. Williams, 58 Wash. 64, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1041, 107 Pac. 1040, the court said: "We have only recently held that, where a case involves the examination of a long or complicated account, the case may be sent to a referee to return the facts. Under the statute, it is a matter of discretion with the trial judge. Lindley v. McGlauffin, supra."

true that he demanded a delivery of the chattels in order that he might foreclose his mortgages upon them; but the demand, whether complied with or not, was no part of a foreclosure. He was entitled to the demanded possession whether his purpose was at once to commence a foreclosure, or merely to hold the property. Leach v. Kimball, 34 N. H. 568. He had a right to the possession by virtue of the title he held. That right did not depend upon some action which he purposed to undertake after he obtained possession. Under these circumstances, the defendant was entitled to a trial by jury.

Exception sustained.

All concur.

3. Doctrine that complexity alone is sufficient.

But in some of the American cases it is held that mere complexity of accounts is not a sufficient ground of equity jurisdiction.

In Norwich & W. R. Co. v. Storey, 17 Conn. 364, the court said, in dismissing a bill: "It is a provision of our statute, as well as a rule of equity, that courts of equity shall take cognizance of those matters only in which adequate relief cannot be had in the ordinary course of law. Have the plaintiffs, then, adequate remedy at law? If so, they cannot have the interference of a court of chancery. . . . It is said the accounts are numerous and complicated. That circumstance alone will not be sufficient to oust a court of law of its jurisdiction."

In Field v. Brown, 146 Ind. 293, 45 N. E. 464, the court said: "It has never, in this state, been deemed a cause for equitable relief that one may set forth an account of numerous items. As early as Cummins v. White, 4 Blackf. 356, it was held that 'equity has no jurisdiction over accounts, however numerous and important the charges, where there is no mutuality of dealing, and discovery is not required; but law has.' That there should appear affirmatively some cause for equitable relief, independently of the presentation of numerous items of account, before the equity side of the court will be opened to entertain the question, is manifest."

This is, perhaps, more clear than the opinion in Cummins v. White, supra, where the court said: "It is certain that over multifarious and complicated mutual dealings, a court of equity has jurisdiction, and that it has none over accounts consisting of but one item on a side; while the power of the law court embraces both extremes. So, equity has no jurisdiction over accounts, however numerous and important the charges, where there is no mutuality of dealing, and discovery is not required; but law has. At what point between single mutual items, and dealings swelled to great complexity, the right of a court of equity to take cognizance of the matter begins or ends, has not been denoted with certainty, and, from the nature of the subject, can never be very clearly defined. As we recede from the two extremes and approach the line of commencing or terminating jurisdiction, much must necessarily be left to the discretion of the chancellor; he must decide each case upon its own peculiar features. It may, however, be safely stated, that in matters of account which are mutual and complicated, or where a discovery is required, or a multiplicity of suits will be avoided, or the remedy at law is not full and adequate, or fraud, accident, or mistake is connected with the subject, equity has jurisdiction; on the contrary, where none of these characteristics are present, the mutual dealings of parties result in causes of action or matters of set-off, or other defense, cognizable only at law."

In Iowa, where the statute authorizes compulsory references in actions requiring the examination of mutual accounts, or when the account is on one side only, and it appears that "it is necessary that the party on the other side should be examined as a witness to prove the account,"—it is held that compulsory references are limited to cases of equitable cognizance. McMartin v. Bingham, 27 Iowa, 234, 1 Am. Rep. 265; Grant v. Bulles, 69 Iowa, 525, 29 N. W. 439; Tufts v. Norris, 115 Iowa, 250, 88 N. W. 367; Frick v. Kabaker, 113 Iowa, 494, 90 N. W. 498; Faville v. Lloyd, 140 Iowa, 501, 118 N. W. 871.

In McMartin v. Bingham, 27 Iowa, 234, 1 Am. Rep. 265, the court, in reversing a judgment denying the right to a jury trial under the Iowa statute, said: "Courts of equity have a general jurisdiction where there are mutual accounts, and also where the accounts are on one side, but a discovery is sought and is material to the relief. But where the accounts are all on one side, or where there is a single matter on the one side and mere set-offs on the other, and no discovery is sought or required, courts of equity have not jurisdiction. . . . In this case there are fourteen items under eight different dates, and two credits. The account is all on one side, and no discovery sought. The defenses are denial, payment, and the statute of limitations. This would not afford a basis for an action of account at the common law, nor for a bill in equity under the former chancery practice. The defendant has a right to a jury trial, of which he cannot be deprived without his consent." Followed in Grant v. Bulles, 69 Iowa, 525, 29 N. W. 439.

And in Galusha v. Wendt, 114 Iowa, 597, 87 N. W. 512, the court said: "Mere intricacy of the calculations necessary to the determination of the amount of plaintiffs recovery will not justify the trial court in treating the case as one of equitable cognizance. Grant v. Bulles and McMartin v. Bingham, supra."

In view of these authorities, anything to the contrary in Blair Town Lot & Land Co. v. Walker, 50 Iowa, 376, and Burt v. Harrah, 65 Iowa, 643, 22 N. W. 910, may be disregarded.

So, in Pennsylvania it is held that where the accounts are on one side and no discovery is sought, equity will decline to take jurisdiction without other equitable reasons for it. Gloninger v. Hazard, 42 Pa. 389; Passyunk Bldg. Assn.'s Appeal, 83 Pa. 441; Grubb's Appeal, 90 Pa. 228; Pittsburgh & C. R. Co's Appeal, 99 Pa. 177; Paton v. Clark, 156 Pa. 49, 27 Atl. 116; Graham v. Cummings, 208 Pa. 516, 57 Atl. 943; Holland v. Hallahan, 211 Pa. 223, 60 Atl. 735 (where discovery was merely incidental).

The same has been held in Tennessee (Pearl v. Nashville, 10 Yerg. 179); and in West Virginia (Grafton v. Reed, 26 W. Va. 437.)

In Lafever v. Billmyer, 5 W. Va. 33, the court, after referring to the authorities, says: "It seems to me that the views, thus given at length, of such eminent jurists, cannot be ignored, and that they conclusively settle the doctrine that courts of equity have jurisdiction of matters of account (1) where there are mutual demands, and a fortiori when complicated; (2) where the accounts are on one side and a discovery is sought that is material to the relief; and (3) equity, having taken jurisdiction for discovery, will, to avoid multiplicity of suits, administer suitable relief. The reason for the doctrine is not that the law affords no remedy, but that it is more complete and adequate in equity. By virtue of this general jurisdiction, and as incident to accounts, courts of equity take a concurrent cognizance, among many other things, not only of the administration of personal assets, and distribution of the residue, but also of the conduct of executors and administrators. 3 Bl. Com. 437, cited in 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 453. But it is equally as well settled that courts of equity decline jurisdiction in matters of accounts (1) where the demands are all on one side, and no discovery is claimed or necessary; (2) where on one side there are demands, and on the other mere payments or set-offs, and no discovery is sought or required. The reason is, that the peculiar remedial process or functions of a court of equity are not necessary in such cases (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 450), there being an ample remedy at law." The reader will see that the court in this case has read Story's Eq. Jur. correctly, in distinction from the misreading of it shown in several cases where it is cited on this subject.

In Smith v. Marks, 2 Rand. (Va.) 449, it was held that to give equity jurisdiction in matters of account, there must be mutual demands, citing Kent, Chancellor, in Porter v. Spencer, 2 Johns. Ch. 169.

But it is possible that the court meant to go further in Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 263, where it said: "The jurisdiction of courts of equity in matters of account involving the transactions and dealings of trustees and agents is now well established. Not that the bare relation of principal and agent justifies the interference of the court in every case; but whenever it appears that a discovery is necessary, or there are mutual accounts between the parties, or the remedy at law is not plain, simple, and free from difficulty, the equitable jurisdiction attaches."

4. Indecisive or doubtful cases.

In Farmers' & M. Bank v. Polk, 1 Del. Ch. 167, where the account seems to have been only on one side, the chancellor said: "Is this such a case that the parties should be decreed to account? Upon that point I have no doubt. These transactions are so complicated, so long and intricate, that it is impossible for a jury to examine them with accuracy. They will require time, assiduous attention, and minute investigation, and are involved in so much confusion and difficulty that no other tribunal, by reason of the forms of proceeding of the courts of law, can afford the plaintiff a remedy." His decree, however, was reversed on page 176, on the ground that, as the defendants had been absolved by the laches of the complainant, there was no necessity for an accounting.

In Kansas, where compulsory references under the statute have been several times sustained on the ground that there were mutual accounts (Williams v. Elliott, 17 Kan. 523; Galbraith v. McCormick, 23 Kan. 706; Smith v. Scully, 66 Kan. 139, 71 Pac. 249), it was held, in Weakley v. Cherry Twp. 62 Kan. 867, 63 Pac. 433, that an action by a township against its treasurer and his bondsmen was properly referred, the court giving no reason but that of voluminous book accounts.

In Watt v. Conger, 13 Smedes & M. 412, when the account seems to have been only on one side, the court said: "Equity has concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law, in reference to numerous and complicated matters of account. The fact that there may be a remedy at law less convenient, and less subservient to the ends of justice, does not deprive the court of chancery of its right to interpose. In matters of account extending over a variety of transactions, the remedy in equity is deemed more ample and complete, and tends to prevent a multiplicity of suits. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 439."

In New York, we have the statement above referred to of Chancellor Kent in Porter v. Spencer, supra, that there must be mutual demands.

Whether any different view was intended by Finch, J. in his opinion in Marvin v. Brooks, 94 N. Y. 71, seems not clear. He there said, in sustaining the jurisdiction where there was the fiduciary relation of a quasi trustee: "The basis and extent of the equitable jurisdiction over matters of account appears to have been seldom considered in our courts, but often discussed in the English authorities. We have been referred to many of these, but they seem to us not harmonious, and occasionally difficult to reconcile. . . . The best considered review of the authorities puts the equitable jurisdiction upon three grounds, viz.: The complicated character of the accounts; the need of a discovery; and the existence of a fiduciary or trust relation. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 459, and note 5. The necessity for a resort to equity for the first two reasons is now very slight, if it can be said to exist at all, since a court of law can send to a referee a long account, too complicated for the handling of a jury, and furnishes by an examination of the adverse party before trial, and the production and deposit of books and papers, almost as complete a means of discovery as could be furnished by a court of equity. But the jurisdiction of the latter court over trusts and those fiduciary relations which partake of that character remains, and in such cases the right to an accounting seems well established. But the existence of a bare agency is not sufficient."

In Uhlman v. New York L. Ins. Co. 109 N. Y. 421, 4 Am. St. Rep. 482, 17 N. E. 363, the court, while not deciding that complexity alone would give jurisdiction, stated that considering the fact as stated by Finch, J., in Marvin v. Brooks, that the plaintiff had now all the facilities for examining a complicated account at law that he would have in equity, in case of oppression or great inconvenience to the defendant, equity would not take jurisdiction.

d. Danger of unlimited jurisdiction.

There being no logical difference between jurisdiction of mutual accounts and of those on one side, it is an easy thing to make a general broad principle that equity will take cognizance of all accounts of every kind which are complicated. Those English cases in which reluctance is shown to follow a broad rule in the matter indicate the doubts and difficulties felt by judges especially experienced in chancery courts, lest the rights of the plaintiff-at-law are to be summarily cut off by the interposition of equity in all sorts of common-law cases. It would seem that a jurisdiction in equity over all complicated accounts can only be safely intrusted to judges whose great experience will enable them to exercise a wise discretion in refusing to take cognizance in equity of matters which ought to be determined at law.

IV. Miscellaneous.

In Huston v. Wadsworth, 5 Colo. 213, where there was no provision in the Constitution of the state as to the trial by jury in civil cases, it was held that there was nothing unlawful in a statute permitting a compulsory reference of a case requiring the examination of a long account on either side, as there was no constitutional provision against it.

In McMillan v. Wiley, 45 Fla. 487, 33 So. 993, it was held that a statute author- 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

izing the court of chancery to enjoin trespasses on timber land and to award an account for damages, so far as such statute concerned the "awarding an account for damages for a mere trespass cognizable at law, and in respect to which the court of equity had no jurisdiction independent of statute, it impairs the right of trial by jury according to the course of the common law and secured by the Constitution."

Where the statute provided for compulsory references in cases where the trial of an issue of fact requires the examination of mutual accounts, or when the account is on one side only, and it shall be made to appear that it is necessary that the party on the other side shall be examined as a witness to prove the account, it was held that these two matters were, in any event, cognizable in equity, and therefore the parties were not entitled as a matter of right to a trial by jury. Van Trees v. Territory, 7 Okla. 353, 54 Pac. 495; Grant County v. McKinley, 8 Okla. 128, 56 Pac. 1044; Brewer v. Asher, 8 Okla. 231, 56 Pac. 714.

So, in Mills v. Miller, 3 Neb. 87, the court, after quoting a similar statute, said, in approving a reference in partition to take the account: "A purely legal action cannot be referred except by consent of parties, as neither party can be deprived of the right to a trial by a jury in such cases; and in actions involving an account between the parties, it is only in cases of a purely equitable nature that a reference can be ordered without consent of the parties."

In Johnson v. Wallace, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 62, where no statute is referred to, the court, in holding that there was no power to order a compulsory reference in an action of assumpsit, although the account involved was very long on both sides, said that the difficulty might be avoided by a resort to a court of equity. NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO

v.

JOSE REFUGIO LUCERO, Appt.

(16 N. M. 652, 120 Pac. 304.)

Evidence — criminal law — flight — presumption of guilt.

No presumption of guilt arises from flight after the commission of a crime.

Note. — Flight as creating presumption of guilt.

This note is confined strictly to the question whether flight creates a presumption of guilt, and does not include cases merely bearing on the question whether flight is admissible as a circumstance tending to prove guilt, unless there is a discussion of APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Taos County, convicting him of murder in the second degree. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. B. Renehan, for appellant:

Flight does not create a presumption of guilt.

Mr. Frank W. Clancy, Attorney General, for the Territory:

Flight raises the presumption of guilt.

State v. Seymour, 94 Iowa, 699, 63 N. W. 661; State v. Williams, 54 Mo. 170; State v. Brooks, 92 Mo. 542, 5 S. W. 257, 330; State v. Jackson, 95 Mo. 623, 8 S. W. 749; State v. Walker, 98 Mo. 95, 9 S. W. 646, 11 S. W. 1133; State v. Potter, 108 or at least decision on, the question whether it creates a presumption of guilt; though it should be stated that the courts sometimes fail to observe the distinction.

An innocent person, though conscious of his innocence, may fear the effect of an unfortunate combination of circumstances, or of an unfounded popular prejudice against him; consciousness of guilt, and fear of deserved punishment, are not the only motives that will lead a person to attempt to escape. Accordingly, such attempts are not infrequently made by the innocent as well as by the guilty.

Though the weight of reason may be with this view, yet there is a conflict of opinion, and there are jurisdictions that still follow the ancient rule. And then, also, there are courts that distinguish between "flight as prima facie evidence of guilt," and as "presumptive evidence of guilt." But it would seem that such a distinction is too fine for the average jury, and that the better rule is, that flight is a circumstance from which, taken into consideration with the other evidence in the case, a jury may or may not infer guilt, as the case may be.

The flight or concealment of the accused raises no presumption of law that he is guilty, but it is a fact which may be considered by the jury, and from which they may draw an inference, in connection with other circumstances, and in the absence of an explanation of the reasons or motives which prompted it, that he is guilty; and evidence of flight or concealment is admissible, whether the other evidence of guilt be direct or circumstantial. 12 Cyc. 395.

That flight does not raise a legal presumption of guilt has been held in United States v. Greene, 146 Fed. 803; Hickory v. United States, 160 U. S. 408, 40 L. ed. 474, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327; People v. Wong Ah Ngow, 54 Cal. 151, 35 Am. Rep. 69; Smith v. State, 106 Ga. 673, 71 Am. St. Rep. 286, 32 S. E. 851, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 474; Barnett v. State, 136 Ga. 65, 70 S. E. 868; Fox v. People, 95 Ill. 71; State v. Arthur, 23 Iowa, 430; State v. Williams, 118 Iowa, 494, 92 N. W. 652, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 570; State v. Poe, 123 Iowa, 118, 101 Am. St. Rep. 307, 98 N. W. 587; Madison v. Com. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

13 Ky. L. Rep. 313, 17 S. W. 164; State v. Moncla, 39 La. Ann. 871, 2 So. 814; State v. Ah Kung, 17 Nev. 361, 30 Pac. 995; State v. Osborne, 54 Or. 289, 103 Pac. 62, 20 Ann. Cas. 627.

And so, flight or concealment of one accused of manslaughter is not conclusive evidence of his guilt. Waybright v. State, 56 Ind. 122.

But in Wooldridge v. State, 49 Fla. 137, 38 So. 3, in the prosecution of a school officer for forgery, it was said that defendant's own testimony that he guessed "the reason he assumed (a fictitious name) was to prevent anyone from locating him" warranted the inference that he fled for the purpose of concealment, knowing that his books were being examined.

Presumption of guilt from flight applies only where the crime has been secret, and the connection of accused with it is to be established by circumstantial evidence; and so, where a killing has taken place in a public fight, in the presence of witnesses, when there is no dispute as to who did the act, but the only question is whether the circumstances establish self-defense or a mitigation of the crime to the grade of manslaughter, the flight will have no weight as a presumption of guilt. State v. Melton, 37 La. Ann. 77. And this principle and deduction were approved in State v. Middleton, 104 La. 233, 28 So. 914.

In Alberty v. United States, 162 U. S. 499, 40 L. ed. 1051, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 864, an instruction that "flight is a silent admission by the defendant that he is unwilling or unable to face the case against him. It is, in some sense, feeble or strong, as the case may be, a confession," was held erroneous, as laying too much stress upon the fact of flight, and allowing the jury to infer that this fact alone is sufficient to create a presumption of guilt. The court said: "Innocent men sometimes hesitate to confront a jury, not necessarily because they fear that the jury will not protect them, but because they do not wish their names to appear in connection with criminal acts, are humiliated at being obliged to incur the popular odium of an arrest and trial, or because they do not wish to be put to the annoyance or expense of defending themselves."

Mo. 424, 22 S. W. 83; State v. Milligan, 170 Mo. 215, 70 S. W. 473; State v. Hottman, 196 Mo. 110, 94 S. W. 237.

Roberts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, José Refugio Lucero, was convicted in the district court of Taos county, of murder in the second degree, and was sentenced to serve a term of not less than twenty-five nor more than thirty years in the New Mexico Penitentiary. Appeal was prayed and granted to this court.

Seven grounds of error have been urged by the appellant, but, as we are compelled to reverse the case, because of an erroneous instruction given the jury by the lower court, we shall discuss only the questions essential to the consideration of the erroneous instruction.

By instruction 16, the court charged the jury as follows: "You are instructed that flight raises the presumption of guilt, and if the jury believe and find from the evidence that after the shooting of the deceased by the defendant, if you find that he did shoot him, that the defendant fled from the territory and tried to avoid arrest, then the jury may take this fact into consideration in determining his guilt or innocence; that is, if you believe that at the time he knew that he had shot and killed the deceased if you find that he did so shoot and kill him." The objection

And an identical instruction was held erroneous in Starr v. United States, 164 U. S. 627, 41 L. ed. 577, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 223.

In State v. Baptiste, 105 La. 661, 37 So. 147, it was said that the following charge, while not incorrect, should have been more full, as the acts from which criminality is sought to be deduced were committed openly: "The legal presumption from flight is against the prisoner, but is not sufficient of itself to authorize a conviction, and it lies upon the defendant to explain or rebut it." The court said it "should have explained that the fact of accused having fled, if proven, was merely a fact in the case, to be taken into consideration by the jury in connection with all the other facts in the case in determining the probabilities for or against the guilt of the accused."

And in State v. Swindall, — La. —, 56 So. 702, a prosecution for incest, a charge that flight was to be considered a consciousness of guilt was held objectionable, citing State v. Baptiste.

An instruction that flight is a circumstance which, prima facie, is indicative of guilt, was upheld in State v. Matheson, 130 Iowa. 440, 114 Am. St. Rep. 427, 103 N. W. 137, 8 Ann. Cas. 430; State v. Ralston, 139 Iowa, 44, 116 N. W. 1058; and in State v. Leonard, 135 Iowa, 371, 112 N. W. 784; State v. Richards, 126 Iowa, 497, 102 N. W. 430, it was said that such an instruction was not erroneous as in effect telling the jury that it was presumptive evidence of guilt.

And so, an instruction that "if you find from the evidence that the defendant, upon being informed that he was suspected of taking the life of . . . [deceased], fled to avoid arrest, and remained away, going under an assumed name, such fact is a circumstance which, prima facie, is indicative of guilt, was held proper in State v. Seymour, 94 Iowa, 699, 63 N. W. 661, as there was evidence in the case to establish the facts upon which it was predicated.

But an instruction in a trial of assault with a deadly weapon, that the fact that defendant "saw fit to flee from the state makes a prima facie case which indicates 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

guilt on his part," was held to constitute reversible error. State v. Papa, 32 R. I. 453, 80 Atl. 12.

In People v. Davis, 14 Cal. App. 117, 111 Pac. 268, the court had granted an instruction that flight "is not strong presumptive evidence of guilt, as no such presumption could arise from such fact as a matter of law." To this instruction the court added: "But the flight of a person immediately after the commission of an offense with which he is charged is a circumstance to be weighed by the jury as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt;" and it was said that though such added instruction is justly subject to criticism, it is not sufficient cause for reversal.

And in People v. Giancoli, 74 Cal. 642, 16 Pac. 510, an instruction that "the flight of a person suspected or charged with a crime is a circumstance to be weighed by the jury as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt" was held proper; and an instruction in effect that a flight is by no means an inference of guilt, that many men are naturally of weak nerve and timid, and under certain circumstances the innocent person might seek safety in flight, was properly refused, as apparently drawn rather as an argument in defendant's favor than as a statement of the law upon the matter in hand.

As was said, there are jurisdictions that still follow the ancient rule; and so that flight raises a presumption of guilt was held in Lewis v. State, 96 Ala. 6, 38 Am. St. Rep. 75, 11 So. 259; State v. Williams, 54 Mo. 170; State v. King, 78 Mo. 555; State v. Barham, 82 Mo. 67; State v. Gee, 85 Mo. 647; State v. Griffin, 87 Mo. 608; State v. Brooks, 92 Mo. 542, 5 S. W. 257, 330; State v. Walker, 98 Mo. 95, 9 S. W. 646, 11 S. W. 1133; State v. Moore, 101 Mo. 316, 14 S. W. 182; State v. Potter, 108 Mo. 424, 22 S. W. 89; State v. Hunt, 141 Mo. 626, 43 S. W. 389; State v. Adler, 146 Mo. 18, 47 S. W. 794; State v. Garison, 147 Mo. 548, 49 S. W. 508; State v. McLaughlin, 149 Mo. 19, 50 S. W. 315; State v. Knowles, 185 Mo. 141, 83 S. W. 1083; State v. Jagers, 71 N. J. L. 281, 103 Am. St. Rep. 746, 58 Atl. 101 (dictum); urged against this instruction is that flight does not raise a presumption of guilt, and by the instruction the jury may have reasonably understood that they could convict on proof of flight alone, on the part of the defendant. The fact that the defendant fled from the vicinity where the crime was committed, having knowledge that he was likely to be arrested for the crime, or charged with its commission, or suspected of guilt in connection therewith, may be shown as a circumstance tending to indicate guilt, and may be considered by the jury, with other circumstances tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, to authorize the inference of the guilt of defendant, the corpus delicti being proven.

There is general assent to this proposition among the authorities, and it is well settled that evidence of flight is admissible. 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 1250; Abbott, Trial Brief, 458. There is a broad distinction, however, between an "inference" and a "presumption," and this distinction is clearly pointed out in the case of Cogdell v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 132 N. C. 852, 44 S. E. 618, where the court says: "An 'inference' is nothing more than a permissible deduction from the evidence, while a 'presumption' is compulsory, and cannot be disregarded by the jury."

The only cases which we have been able to find, approving instructions to the jury that flight raises the presumption of guilt,

State v. Kent (State v. Pancoast) 5 N. D. 516, 35 L.R.A. 518, 67 N. W. 1052.

But flight from a mob raises no presumption of guilt. People v. Easton, 148 Cal. 50, 82 Pac. 840; State v. Ma Foo, 110 Mo. 7, 33 Am. St. Rep. 414, 19 S. W. 222.

And though the rule in Missouri seems to be that flight raises a presumption of guilt, it was held in State v. Evans, 138 Mo. 116, 60 Am. St. Rep. 549, 39 S. W. 462, that the mere fact that defendant was arrested in another state was not sufficient of itself to be the basis of an instruction that flight raises a presumption of guilt.

And also that the mere fact that defendant fled from the place where the homicide was committed, immediately thereafter, and went home, not more than one-half mile distant, did not authorize such an instruction. State v. Hopper, 142 Mo. 478, 44 S. W. 272.

Nor does every going away from the place of a homicide raise a presumption of guilt; an instruction should be so framed as to include all circumstances, that accused may have the benefit of such explanatory facts. State v. Fairlamb, 121 Mo. 137, 25 S. W. 895.

Escape from custody and from a pending indictment raises a conclusive presumption of guilt. Howgate v. United States, 7 App. D. C. 217.

A strong presumption of guilt arises whenever one accused of an offense attempts to escape or evade justice. Benavides v. State, 31 Tex. 579.

But in Sheffield v. State, 43 Tex. 378, a charge that flight is to be regarded as a presumption of guilt is held to be objectionable.

And in Huey v. State, 7 Ga. App. 398, 66 S. E. 1023, in a trial under an indictment for assault with intent to commit rape, it was said that flight may be a slight circumstance tending to show conscious guilt of some offense, but it is not sufficient proof of the particular crime charged.

Flight of one accused of crime is strong evidence of guilt, but not conclusive. State v. Seymour, 7 Idaho. 257, 61 Pac. 1033.

But in State v. Baird, 13 Idaho, 29, 88 Pac. 233, it was said that it would not be presumed that defendant fled from a consciousness of guilt, where a reasonable deduction and inference from the fact of flight is that he was alarmed by the remarks of the judge, and, on consultation with his attorney, believed that he would not be given time to prepare his defense, and was afraid that he would be convicted because of not having time to present his defense.

Flight of one accused of crime raises a presumption of guilt, though it is not conclusive; and the application of this rule is not affected by the fact that accused is a slave, and is subject to the orders of his master. State v. Nat, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 114.

And in McCann v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 471, where defendant, after the discovery of the murder, had fled before he was accused, the court said that a consciousness of innocence would have led him to abide the issue and see whether time would not disclose the real perpetrator.

In Murrell v. State, 46 Ala. 89, 7 Am. Rep. 592, on the question of the admissibility on the second trial, of evidence of escape from custody during a former trial of one accused of murder, the court said: "The escape was an attempt to flee, and it had reference to the charge in this case. Flight in a criminal prosecution is one of the most common grounds for the presumption of guilt; and when the flight is connected with the offense charged, and for which the accused is on trial, it is an act which indicates fear, and this fear points to guilt."

But in Elmore v. State, 98 Ala. 12, 13 So. 427, it was said that, of itself, evidence of a breaking out and escape from jail of one under an indictment for larceny would not warrant conviction of that crime.

And flight, to raise a presumption of guilt, must be actual, not inferential or constructive,—flight from the crime and its surroundings, to avoid arrest and prosecution, and not a mere absence from particular places; for a designing officer might select only those places to visit where he knew accused might not be. Com. v. Roland, 8 Phila. 606.

are those in Missouri. Such an instruction is sanctioned by the following, among many cases, in that state: State v. Walker, 98 Mo. 95, 9 S. W. 646, 11 S. W. 1133; State v. MaFoo, 110 Mo. 7, 33 Am. St. Rep. 414, 19 S. W. 222; State v. Hunt, 141 Mo. 626, 43 S. W. 389. The supreme court of Iowa, in the case of State v. Poe, 123 Iowa, 118, 101 Am. St. Rep. 307, 98 N. W. 587, in a well-considered case in which all the authorities are reviewed, in speaking of the Missouri rule, says: "The rule in Missouri seems to be peculiar, and we are not inclined to follow it."

In the case of State v. Poe, supra, the lower court gave to the jury this instruction: "It is claimed by the state that the defendants Decker and Poe at once fled, and endeavored to escape arrest by such flight. If you find said defendants at once, after the alleged offense, fled to Missouri, and endeavored to avoid arrest and prosecution by such flight, such fact would be presumptive evidence of guilt; and if such fact is unexplained, the jury would be justified in considering such flight as evidence of guilt." In speaking of this instruction, the court says: "On principle and authority, the instruction as to the presumption to be drawn from proof of flight is erroneous, and should not be sustained, unless it is so far sanctioned in the cases in our own state that we are precluded from following the dictates of reason, as illustrated by the weight of authority." After reviewing the various decisions of the Iowa court, the instruction was disapproved, and the cause reversed.

In Hickory v. United States, 160 U. S. 408, 40 L. ed. 474, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327, the subject is fully considered, and an instruction is condemned which is characterized as "tantamount to saying to the jury that flight created a legal presumption of guilt so strong and so conclusive that it was the duty of the jury to act on it as an axiomatic truth;" and the court continues as follows: "On this subject, also, it is true, the charge thus given was apparently afterwards qualified by the statement that the jury had a right to take the fact of flight into consideration, but these words did not correct the illegal charge already given. Indeed, taking the instruction that flight created a legal presumption of guilt, with the qualifying words subsequently used, they were both equivalent to saying to the jury that they were, in considering the facts, to give them the weight which, as a matter of law, the court declared they were entitled to have; that is, as creating a legal presumption so well settled as to amount, virtually, to a conclusive proof of guilt."

court approves what was said in the case from which we have just quoted, and with reference to a similar charge says: "The criticism to be made upon this charge is that it lays too much stress upon the fact of flight, and allows the jury to infer that this fact alone is sufficient to create a presumption of guilt. It certainly would not be contended, as a universal rule, that the fact that a person who chanced to be present on the scene of a murder, shortly thereafter left the city would, in the absence of other testimony, be sufficient in itself to justify his conviction of the murder." See also Starr v. United States, 164 U. S. 627, 41 L. ed. 577, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 223.

It follows that the court erred in giving the instruction above referred to, and a new trial must be ordered.

This cause is therefore reversed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

W. G. HALL

v.

W. W. PRESNELL et al.

and

(157 N. C. 290, 72 S. E. 985.)

Bills and notes — extension by attorney for collection — effect on surety.

A slight indulgence by an attorney charged with the collection of a note to the maker, not authorized or ratified by the holder, will not release the sureties on the instrument, if no security for the payment of the note is thereby lost or impaired.

Note. — Extension of time by attorney as discharging surety.

Two questions arise in connection with the discharge of a surety on account of an extension of time by an attorney; the one, whether an attorney, by virtue of his employment, has authority to enter into a contract extending the time for the performance of an obligation in favor of his client; the other, whether the contract entered into is a valid contract for such extension of time. If either of these questions is answered in the negative, the surety is not discharged. It is assumed that the attorney has no express authority to enter into such a contract.

In Roberts v. Smith, 3 La. Ann. 205, an attorney in whose hands a note had been placed for collection was held to be without power to give an extension of time by an agreement made out of court with the principal obligor, when the immediate legal APP^EAL by defendant Lovell from a judgment of the Superior Court for Watauga County, in plaintiff's favor, in an action on a note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

No appearance for plaintiff.

Mr. Edmund Jones for defendant.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is but one question in this case. On November 5, 1906, G. W. Presnell made his note to W. G. Hall for $135.96, payable May 1, 1907, and indorsed by W. W. Presnell and E. F. Lovell as sureties. This note was deposited by Hall with the Bank of Blowing Rock as collateral security for a debt he owed the bank. Presnell, at the request of Lovell, gave a mortgage to Hall for $120.70 on a pair of horses to secure the debt and indemnify his sureties, and it was duly registered. The note and mortgage were placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, and he immediately pressed the defendants for payment. Lovell requested the attorney to take immediate steps to secure possession of the horses, for the purpose of selling them, we assume, under the power contained in the mortgage, and gave him $5 to pay his expenses. The attorney demanded the horses of Presnell, the debtor, who asked indulgence for several days, so that he might dispose of the horses and pay the debt, which was granted, and Presnell paid the attorney $5 for his expenses. The attorney afterwards sold the horses, but did not realize enough to pay the debt, and meanwhile Presnell left the state. W. G. Hall had no knowledge of the transactions between the attorney and the bank, and, of course, did not authorize the extension of time, nor did the bank. It was simply a slight accommodation given by the attorney to Presnell on his own responsibility, and without any express authority for any ratification afterwards of his act. It does not appear whether or not Presnell was solvent at the time the attorney granted the slight indulgence to him, and has remained so to this time, nor does it appear distinctly that the attorney extended the time for paying the debt, but it rather appears that the short extension was restricted to the time of seizing and selling the horses under the mortgage. Upon the facts admitted by the parties, the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant Lovell appealed.

We think the decision of the court below was right. It is not clear to us how the appellant was injured by the transaction of which he complains, but assuming that it was such an extension of the time for paying the note as would have discharged him, as surety, if it had been given by the plaintiff, we are of the opinion that the attorney had no express or implied authority to bind his client, the bank, or Hall, the payee, by the agreement. He was retained to collect the debt, and not to release it or any party liable to Hall or the bank for its payment; and anyone dealing with him was fixed in law with notice of this lack of authority. As said in Bank of Morganton v. Hay, 143 N. C. 326, 55 S. E. 811: "There is a general rule that, when one deals with an agent, it behooves him to ascertain correctly the scope and extent of his authority to contract for and in behalf of his alleged principal, for, under any other rule, it is said every principal would be at the mercy of his agent, however carefully he might limit his authority. The power of an agent is not unlimited unless in some way it either expressly or impliedly appears to be so; and the person who proposes to contract with him as agent for his principal should first inform himself where his authority stops or how far his commission goes before he closes the bar consequences of such extension would be a release of the sureties from all liability on their obligation.

So, in Varnum v. Bellamy, 4 McLean, 87, Fed. Cas. No. 16,886, an attorney was held to have no authority to make an agreement with a debtor on a note sent him for collection, to accept accounts to apply in payment of the note, and to withhold suit thereon. It was further held in this case that there was no binding agreement for the extension of time.

In Givens v. Briscoe, 3 J. J. Marsh. 529, an attorney at law was held not to have authority, by virtue of his office, to extend the time for levying an execution, so as to release the sureties of the execution debtor. A similar holding appears in Savings Inst. v. Chinn, 7 Bush. 539, where an attorney ordered the return of an execution.

In Union Bank v. Govan, 10 Smedes & M. 333, where an attorney had directed the sheriff to stay an execution, the sureties were held not released, because no binding agreement had been entered into.

Likewise, in Jerauld v. Trippett, 62 Ind. 122, where the attorney had ordered the sheriff not to levy an execution, the sureties were held not discharged, because there was no agreement, but a mere indulgence, as to the time for issuing the execution.

In Phillips v. Rounds, 33 Me. 357, a case not precisely in point, an attorney retained to manage a proceeding to procure a disclosure of a debtor on execution was held to have authority to apply for a continuance of the same, although the effect was to release a surety on the debtor's relief bond, because of its extension beyond the time prescribed in such bond. W. A. E.

gain with him. Briggs v. North Carolina Home Ins. Co. 88 N. C. 141; Ferguson v. Davis & R. Mfg. Co. 118 N. C. 946, 24 S. E. 710." No one could reasonably suppose that it was within the scope of an attorney's authority to release a debt or any party to a note, or to do anything which would have that effect, when his commission extended only to the collection of the debt. It is stated in the books that an attorney has no implied authority to work any discharge of a debtor, but upon actual payment of the full amount of the debt, and that in money. He cannot release sureties or indorsers, nor enter a retraxit, when it is a final bar (Lambert v. Sandford, 2 Blackf. 137, 18 Am. Dec. 149), nor release a witness (Wood v. Hopkins, 3 N. J. L. 689; Campbell v. Kincaid, 3 T. B. Mon. 68), nor a party in interest (Weigel's Succession, 18 La. Ann. 49). It is a general rule that an attorney, who is in many respects considered as a mere agent, cannot waive any of the substantial rights of his client without the latter's consent, and in such a case he is not barred thereby without ratification, or something which amounts to an estoppel, to deny his attorney's authority. These principles will be found to be sustained by the following authorities: Weeks, Attorneys at Law, § 219, and cases cited in the notes; Savings Inst. v. Chinn, 7 Bush. 539; Ireland v. Todd, 36 Me. 149; Givens v. Briscoe, 3 J. J. Marsh. 529; Union Bank v. Govan, 10 Smedes & M. 333, and cases cited; Tankersley v. Anderson, 4 Desauss. Eq. 44; Terhune v. Colton, 10 N. J. Eq. 21.

It was directly held in Roberts v. Smith, 3 La. Ann. 205, that an attorney at law in whose hands a note has been placed for collection has no power by an agreement made out of court, without authority of his client, to give an extension of time to the principal obligor, which would have the legal effect, if the act were valid, to relieve or discharge a surety on the note. Of like effect is Varnum v. Bellamy, 4 McLean, 87, Fed. Cas. No. 16,886. In Savings Inst. v. Chinn, 7 Bush, 539, it was held to be well settled that an attorney at law employed to collect a debt has not authority to release the sureties upon his client's claim, either directly or indirectly, nor to do any act with reference thereto, prejudicial to his interest. "No implied power [of an attorney] exists, under a general retainer, to grant additional time to a client's debtor" (4 Cyc. 945), nor has an attorney the implied power to release his client's claim; and where there is security for the demand, he cannot surrender it to his client's detriment, nor has he implied authority to release sureties on an obligation to his client. 4 Cyc. 949, and the numerous cases cited. In Kellogg v. Gilbert, 10 Johns. 220, 6 Am. Dec. 335, the sheriff, upon the request of the plaintiff's attorney, permitted the defendant in custody on a ca. sa. to go at large for the purpose of securing money with which to pay the debt. It was held that the attorney had no authority to order the release of the defendant without the plaintiff's consent or a previous satisfaction of the debt, and that the sheriff was therefore liable for an escape. See also Lewis v. Gamage, 1 Pick. 347, and cases cited; Simonton v. Barrell, 21 Wend. 362; Jackson ex dem. M'Crea v. Bartlett, 8 Johns. 361. Justice Patteson said, in Savory v. Chapman, 11 Ad. & El. 829: "It is clear that the attorney could not, of his own authority, without payment, discharge the defendant out of custody as a matter of indulgence; nor, indeed, is it contended that he could. Either the money must have been actually paid, or the plaintiff [himself] must have chosen to show favor; that would be his act. The plea does not allege either fact. It is true that, if the attorney has power to receive the money, he may, having received it, order a discharge; but then, in pleading the discharge, it should be shown that the money was paid. So, if the plaintiff chose to dispense with the further detention, it should have been alleged that he authorized the attorney to discharge." And Justice Coleridge, in the same case, said: The party "is bound to know the legal qualifications of persons filling certain employments. The question, therefore, turns on the authority of the attorney; and there is nothing here to show that he had any, either in his general character, or with reference to the circumstances of the suit. He could, as it appears here, be only an agent de facto; and there is nothing shown to make him one for the present purpose." It seems, therefore, to be the generally accepted doctrine that an attorney charged with the collection of a debt has no power in virtue of his general authority to do any act which will either release his client's debtor, or his surety, or substantially jeopardize his interests in any way.

The cases cited by the learned counsel of the appellant are not in point. There the question was as to the authority of an attorney in the actual conduct of a suit in court, whether in prosecution or defense, and in matters of practice and procedure, as in Beck v. Bellamy, 93 N. C. 129, the case cited by appellant's counsel. Chief Justice Smith thus refers to the subject: "The conduct of the case by caveators' counsel would, in the absence of connivance, be binding upon their clients, and it would be a dangerous innovation in judicial proceedings to hold otherwise. In the words of Nash, J., in reference to the authority of counsel retained in a case: 'By his acts and agreement made in the management of the cause the plaintiff was bound.' Greenlee v. McDowell, 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 485. Not less explicit is the language of Merrimon, J., in Branch v. Walker, 92 N. C. 89, where he says of an attorney that, 'as soon as he is duly retained in an action or proceeding, he has, by virtue of his office, authority to manage and control the conduct of the action, on the part of his client, during its progress, and subject to the supervision of the court,' etc. 'As between the client and opposite party, the former is bound by every act which the attorney does in the regular course of practice, and without fraud or collusion, however injudicious the act may be.' Weeks, Attorneys at Law, § 222, and cases cited." We add Pierce v. Perkins, 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 250. But this is far from saying that he can release a debt or any part of it, or relinquish substantial or important rights, without the consent of his client. An attorney cannot compromise his client's case without special authority to do so (Moye v. Cogdell, 69 N. C. 93), and, this being so, how can he release it, or any part of it? "A power to collect," says this court, "does not authorize an assignment or any disposition other than full payment." Bradford v. Williams, 91 N. C.

Nor do we think the case of Kesler v. Linker, 82 N. C. 456, cited also by counsel, is pertinent to this case. There is no evidence that the plaintiff agreed to look after the security and see that it was applied to the debt. On the contrary, he did not know that the mortgage or lien on the horses had been taken, nor does it appear that the attorney, whether he had authority or not to act in that behalf for his client, made any agreement which bound the plaintiff to active diligence for the preservation of the security. Nor does it appear that the security or any part thereof has been lost or impaired. The horses were seized, sold, and the proceeds applied to the debt. What more could the surety ask to be done?

Our conclusion is that the defendant Lovell, as surety to the note, was not discharged by anything done by the attorney, nor did he latter intend to release him.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

WESTLEY SIGL, Respt.,

v.

GREEN BAY TRACTION COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Wis. —, 135 N. W. 506.)

Carrier — closed street car in motion — attempt to board — negligence.

One is negligent as matter of law in attempting to board a street car when the vestibule doors are closed and it is in motion, so that all that he can do is to stand on the step and maintain his position by clinging to the hand-holds.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brown County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Barnes, J.:

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for injuries sustained while attempting to board one of defendant's interurban cars in the city of Green Bay. The complaint alleged that the car in question was proceeding in a northerly direction on Webster avenue, after having stopped at the corner of Porlier street and Webster avenue; that plaintiff approached the car from the south, and at the same time signaled to the motorman to indicate that he desired to get on; that the car proceeded very slowly up to the point where plaintiff met it, and, as he was about to board the front end, started with a jerk, materially increasing its speed, and plaintiff was thrown to the ground and rolled against the trucks of the car. The answer put in issue the material allegations of the complaint. By its answers to questions submitted on a special verdict, the jury found that plaintiff was injured by falling from one of defendant's cars while attempting to get on; that his fall was caused by the car being jerked forward by a sudden increase of speed after plaintiff had gotten hold of the hand rails and had his foot on the lower step; that the motorman was negligent in so increasing the speed of the car; that a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence in the motorman's position should reasonably have foreseen that suddenly increasing the speed of the car would cause some injury to the plaintiff; that no want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff contributed proximately to his injury; and that plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $569. On such verdict judgment was entered. Defendant appeals.

Messrs. Greene, Fairchild, North, & Parker, for appellant:

No negligence proximately causing plaintiff's injury was shown.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following facts are undisputed: The car was in motion when plaintiff attempted to board it. It had stopped at a usual stopping place, and had just started. The signals which the plaintiff made to the motorman were made before the car started. It was evident to the plaintiff that the motorman either did not see the signals or that he did not intend to pay any attention to them. The attempt to board the car was made when it was being speeded up. The front vestibule door of the car was closed, so that plaintiff was notified to stay out, rather than invited to come in. It was not only closed, but was locked by means of the trapdoor being down, although the plaintiff did not know this fact. Still he had as much right to assume that it was locked as he did to assume that it was unlocked. The bottom of the door came close to the top of the platform. When the door was closed, it was nearly, if not quite, flush with the step leading to the platform. Or, stated in another way, the outer edge of the step was almost on a line drawn perpendicularly from the door to the step. There was a foothold on the step, but plaintiff could retain his position thereon only by hanging to the hand-holds, and he could not open the door, if it were unlocked, except by using one of his hands. Under these facts, we conclude that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Champane v. La Crosse City R. Co. 121 Wis. 554, 99 N. W. 334; Fosnes v. Duluth Street R. Co. 140 Wis. 455, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 270, 122 N. W. 1054; Paulson v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 13 Misc. 387, 34 N. Y. Supp. 244; Phillips v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 177.

Having reached this conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider any other errors that are assigned. There was no evidence of gross negligence to go to the jury. The evidence of ordinary negligence was, to say the least, slight. It may be that the accident would have happened if the vestibule door had been open; but it would not have happened if the plaintiff had not negligently attempted to board the car. It follows that the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to dismiss the complaint.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Dept. No. 1.)

DAVID M. HOFFMAN and Wife
v.

GEORGE L. DICKSON et al.

Covenant — to warrant and defend — liability for costs.

1. A grantor is not, under his covenant to warrant and defend title against all lawful claims, liable for costs of a successful defense against an attempt by a stranger to establish a lien on the property.

Damages — covenant against encumbrances — set-off of benefits.

2. A grantor is not, in a suit for breach of covenant against encumbrances, because of the enforcement against the property of a lien for a share of the cost of a party wall between the property conveyed and that adjoining it, entitled to set off the value to the property of the easement rights acquired by the grantee in the adjoining property because of the party-wall agreement.

Note. — Liability of covenantor in conveyance of real property for expenses of successful defense.

HOFFMAN v. DICKSON seems to be in accord with the weight of opinion that the covenantee who has successfully defended against a claim of adverse title cannot recover from the covenantor the costs and expenses of such defense.

And to the same effect were Rittmaster v. Richner, 14 Colo. App. 361, 60 Pac. 189 (covenants of title and to defend against claims), and Gleason v. Smith, 41 Vt. 293 (covenant to defend against claims).

And in Smith v. Parsons, 33 W. Va. 644, 11 S. E. 68, it was held that the sale of land with a covenant of general warranty did not bind the warrantor to stand good for expenses in the defense of assaults by inferior title, and so recovery for costs expended by the covenantee in a successful defense of a suit by an adverse claimant was denied.

So, in Thorne v. Clark, 112 Iowa, 548, 84 Am. St. Rep. 356, 84 N. W. 701 (covenant to defend title), where, in an action to quiet title, a claim of title was interposed by heirs of the widow of the grantor, in whom, so far as the records disclosed, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County, entered upon findings in favor of plaintiffs upon one cause of action, and dismissing another cause of action after a trial on the merits before the court, without a jury, in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of a covenant of warranty; plaintiffs appealing from so much of the judgment as sustained the demurrer to and dismissed their first cause of action; defendants appealing from so much as sustained the demurrer to and dismissed their affirmative defense. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Theo D. Powell, for plaintiffs:

The Hawkes agreement constituted a lien on the property.

The covenantee can recover from his covenantor for reasonable counsel fees and expenses incurred in defending the action.

Potwin v. Blasher, 9 Wash. 460, 37 Pac. 710; Taylor v. Holter, 1 Mont. 688, 3 Mor. Min. Rep. 322; Staats v. Ten Eyck, 3 Caines, 111, 2 Am. Dec. 254; Dalton v. Bowker, 8 Nev. 190; Hoffman v. Bosch, 18 Nev. 360, 4 Pac. 703; Bevan v. Muir, 53 Wash. 59, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 588, 101 Pac. 485.

her dower interest vested, it was held that the warrantor was not responsible for the costs and expenses of a successful defense against such claim, as a covenant of warranty does not run against appearances, but only against substantial defects.

And in Ex parte Lynch, 25 S. C. 193 (covenant to defend title), where, after a mortgagor had, upon advice of counsel, determined not to defend against claims of a third person, a mortgagee, with consent of court, defended against such claims, and succeeded in defeating them, it was held that the fees paid to the attorney by the mortgagee for defending the title could not be recovered from the mortgagor, and this though a benefit had accrued to the mortgagor.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs seek recovery of damages from the defendants for alleged breach of a covenant of warranty contained in a deed of conveyance from the defendants to the plaintiffs for lots 21 and 22, in block 1104, of New Tacoma, Washington territory, now a part of the city of Tacoma. The grounds upon which relief is sought are set forth in the plaintiffs' complaint in two separate causes of action. The first relates to the title to lot 21, and the second relates to the title to lot 22. The questions here presented arise upon the rulings of the trial court in sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiffs' first cause of action, and the sustaining of the plaintiffs' demurrer to the defendants' affirmative defense to the plaintiffs' second cause of action. The parties stood upon these pleadings and declined to plead further. The trial court thereupon dismissed the plaintiffs' first cause of action, and also dismissed the defendants' affirmative defense, and proceeded to the trial of the plaintiffs' second cause of action upon issues raised only by the denials made by the defendants. Findings and judgment followed in favor of plaintiffs upon their second cause of action. The plaintiffs have appealed from the rulings sustaining the demurrer to and dismissing their first cause of action. The defendants have appealed from the rulings sustaining the demurrer to and dismissing their affirmative defense. We will notice these appeals in this order.

The facts stated in the plaintiffs' first cause of action which are necessary for us to notice are, in substance, as follows: In April, 1906, the plaintiffs commenced an action in the superior court for Pierce county against the defendants, for specific performance of a contract, wherein they agreed to convey to the plaintiffs lots 21 and 22, in consideration of $75,000. In that action the plaintiffs prayed, among other things, that a just deduction from the purchase price be made on account of an encumbrance against lot 21, which they alleged was created by a certain party-wall agreement, and one of the questions at issue in that action was whether or not that agreement constituted a lien upon lot 21 to secure the payment of one half the cost of the party wall constructed in pursuance thereof upon the line between lots 21 and 20, to the north thereof. The defendants appeared in that action, and a trial thereof resulted in findings and judgment, determining that that agreement constituted a lien upon lot 21, as contended by the plaintiffs, which judgment, however, denied the deduction prayed for, though it decreed specific conveyance of the property. Thereafter both the plaintiffs and the defendants appealed from that judgment to this court (47 Wash. 431, 125 Am. St. Rep. 907, 92 Pac. 272, 93 Pac. 523, 15 Ann. Cas. 173), where it was determined that the party-wall agreement constituted a lien upon lot 21 for one half the cost of the wall, but that said encumbrance could not then be removed, and affirmed the judgment of the superior court. By that judgment, the defendants were required to specifically perform could be recovered (Robinson v. Bakewell, 25 Pa. 424); the court pointing out that the condition in the bond differed to a marked degree from the covenant of warranty in the deed.

In Meservey v. Snell, 94 Iowa, 222, 58 Am. St. Rep. 391, 62 N. W. 767, the facts were that land, title to which was derived from the United States, was conveyed to another by deed containing a covenant to warrant and defend said premises against the lawful claims of all persons whomsoever; such grantee thereafter, by warranty deed, conveyed the same land to another; subsequently the entry acquired by the first grantor was illegally set aside and the muniments of title were issued to a third person by the United States Land Office, and such outstanding title was purchased by such second grantee to prevent ejectment, who then commenced an action against his grantor, to recover damages for breach of warranty to him, which action such grantor successfully defended by establishing that the first grantor's entry had been wrongfully canceled; and it was held that such first grantee could recover the costs and expenses of defending such action. The court said: "We are of the opinion that they should be allowed in this case. They were absolutely necessary to protect the real against the apparent title. They were made necessary by a defect in the legal title which the defendant had warranted. Unless they are recoverable, the warranty of the grantee is of no practical value in such a case as this." And the court further said that this case is peculiar and distinguishable from most others by the fact that the general government, the source from which the title emanated, with power in the first instance to determine its grantees, had apparently set aside all acts and proceedings by which the first title was created, and had issued muniments of title to another grantee. Though that may be true, it seems to be rather a harsh rule to require an original grantor to pay the costs of defending against an illegal claim, even though resulting from the acts of the government, instead of a private individual.

This note is confined strictly to actions to recover upon a covenant contained in conveyances of land; and so, cases involving a breach of covenant contained in sales of personalty have been excluded.

J. H. B.

form their agreement, and to convey the property to the plaintiffs by deed containing general covenants of warranty. Thereafter, in January, 1903, the defendants, upon payment of the consideration of $75,000, conveyed to the plaintiffs the property, covenanting as follows: "That they are the owners in fee simple of said premises, and that they are free from all encumbrances, and that they will warrant and defend the title thereto against all lawful claims whatsoever." The party wall having been constructed some time previous to the making of the agreement to convey and the conveyance made in pursuance thereof, thereafter, in October, 1908, the one half of the cost of the wall secured to be paid to one Hawkes, the owner of lot 20, and the party to said agreement who constructed the wall, became due and payable under the terms of that agreement. Thereafter, in October, 1908, Hawkes commenced, in the superior court for Pierce county, against the plaintiffs, a suit to foreclose his lien on lot 21 for one half the cost of the wall. Thereupon the plaintiffs notified the defendants of the pendency of that action, and requested them to defend the same, which defendants neglected and refused to do. The plaintiffs employed counsel and defended the action, and upon trial in the superior court judgment of foreclosure was rendered, subjecting lot 21 and the plaintiffs' interest therein to the lien created by the party-wall agreement for one half the cost of the wall, amounting to $1,630.66, and interest, and sale thereof was decreed accordingly. The plaintiffs thereupon appealed from that judgment to this court (56 Wash. 120, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1038, 105 Pac. 156), and upon hearing thereof this court in all respects reversed that judgment. These plaintiffs necessarily paid out in the defense of that action in the superior court, and in prosecuting the appeal therefrom in this court, for attorneys' fees and other necessary expenses, the sum of $524.99, for which they pray judgment against the defendants.

No claim is made that the plaintiffs paid out any sum to extinguish the lien. Indeed, the facts pleaded show that the litigation in which they incurred this expense finally resulted in their favor, and adjudicated their title to be superior to and free from the lien of the party-wall agreement. Whether their title was so freed from this lien because of want of notice thereof to them or some grantee under mesne conveyance from Hawkes, or was so freed from the lien because of discharge thereof before the commencement of this action by someone other than the plaintiffs, does not appear by the facts stated in their first cause of action. This, however, we think is not material, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.)

since the application of some well-settled principles of law will show that it is enough to defeat the plaintiffs' recovery in this case to know that their title was superior to and not encumbered by the lien of the party-wall agreement at the time of the commencement of this action, and that they incurred no expense in removing such lien. The facts alleged clearly show that the plaintiffs are here attempting to recover upon the covenant of warranty, alleging damages consisting only of expenses incurred in successfully defending an unlawful claim made against their title to lot 21. Counsel for the plaintiffs has called our attention to several decisions in support of the general rule that expenses incurred by a grantee under covenants of warranty, in the defense of an action assailing his title, are an element of damage recoverable against the grantor, as well as damage resulting from loss or impairment of title. Such was the holding of this court in Potwin v. Blasher, 9 Wash. 460, 37 Pac. 710. That decision, however, as well as all others relied upon by counsel for the plaintiffs, involved encumbrances or titles superior to that of the grantor, which actually impaired the title of the grantee. We have seen that the defendants only agreed to warrant and defend the title "against all lawful claims." We have also seen that the claim of lien made against the plaintiffs in the suit in which they incurred these expenses was not a lawful claim against the plaintiffs' title. Under such circumstances, the rule seems to be well settled that no recovery can be had against the grantor upon his covenant of warranty. Indeed, it seems inconceivable that the unsuccessful assertion of an unlawful claim should constitute a breach of a covenant of warranty to defend against lawful claims. We find, in the case of Smith v. Parsons, 33 W. Va. 644, 11 S. E. 68, remarks of the court peculiarly applicable to this state of facts, as follows: "It is true that Smith, in his sale to Parsons, stipulated for a conveyance with general warranty, but the ejectionment resulted in favor of the title sold by Smith, and showed that it was the paramount title. A covenant of general warranty is not broken until there is an eviction under a paramount title, or what is equivalent. Rex v. Creel, 22 W. Va. 373; 2 Minor, Inst. 643; 2 Lomax, Dig. 355; 2 Rob. New Pr. 87; 2 Sutherland, Damages, 279; Rawle, Covenants, §§ 127, 131; Yancey v. Lewis, 4 Hen. & M. 390. Why, then, should Smith pay costs expended in defending this action? He sold a good and valid title as shown by the result of the action of ejectionment, and did no wrong in so doing, and by no reasonable view can it be claimed that he was to stand good for expenses in defense of assaults by inferior title. He did not warrant that no one should ever sue Parsons for the land, or in any manner bind himself to refund expenses incurred in defending the land against anyone who might think he had a valid claim to the land, and bring a suit for it. Had Parsons lost the land, then Smith, upon his covenant, would have been bound for the land lost, and costs expended in an unsuccessful defense of the title. Threlkeld v. Fitzhugh, 2 Leigh, 451; 2 Sutherland, Damages, 302; Rawle, Covenants, § 197. But the covenantee is clearly not entitled to demand of the covenantor expenses in defending a suit which sustains the title as valid, for the covenant does not bind for any outlays necessitated by the simple existence or assertion of an adverse claim. The covenant does not protect against any but lawful claims, which negate the title that the deed purports to convey." See also Norton v. Schmucker, 83 Tex. 212, 18 S. W. 720; West v. Masson, 67 Cal. 169, 7 Pac. 452; Rittmaster v. Richner, 14 Colo. App. 361, 60 Pac. 189. No decisions have come to our attention holding contrary to this view, and we think there are none such.

Counsel for appellants insist that the question of the party-wall agreement being a lien upon lot 21 was settled adversely to the defendants in the specific performance suit, and thereby became res judicata, estopping the defendants to now assert to the contrary. Conceding, for argument's sake, that the facts pleaded in the plaintiffs' first cause of action show an established lien upon lot 21 by the judgment in the specific performance suit, as against the defendants, it by no means follows that such lien existed or continued to exist as against the plaintiffs, or that the title they acquired from the defendants was not freed from the lien before the commencement of this action. That was the real question at issue, and determined finally in the plaintiffs' favor, in the suit in which they incurred the expense which they now seek to recover from the defendants upon their covenant of warranty. The question here concerning us is not the bald question of what kind of title the defendants possessed, or as to what extent it was burdened with liens. But the question now is, What kind of title did the plaintiffs acquire? Was it a good title? Was it free from this lien? It is easy to see how lot 21 might be subject to the lien as against the defendants or others holding mesne conveyances from Hawkes, who was the owner entering into the party-wall agreement, and still be free from any such lien that could in the least impair the title acquired by the plaintiffs. And, since it has been finally adjudicated that this lien did not exist as against the plaintiffs' title, and did not in the least impair the plaintiffs' title, it becomes quite immaterial as to what extent the title of the defendants and prior owners may have been burdened by such lien. We are of the opinion that the facts stated in the plaintiffs' first cause of action do not entitle them to any relief as against the defendants. It follows that the sustaining of the demurrer to that cause of action was not error, and, since they elected to stand thereon and not plead further, the order of dismissal was proper. That order is therefore affirmed.

The facts alleged in the plaintiffs' second cause of action need only be noticed sufficiently to render easily understood the defendants' affirmative defense thereto, since it is only the demurrer to that defense which is here involved. The allegations of this cause of action are of the same nature as the first cause of action, except they relate to the covenant of warranty of title to lot 22, contained in the same conveyance; to a party-wall agreement of the same nature, made by a prior owner of lot 22 with the owner of lot 23, adjoining upon the south, and a wall constructed upon the line of the lots in pursuance thereof; and to a judgment of foreclosure, by which the plaintiffs were compelled to pay the lien upon lot 22 created by that agreement for one half the cost of the wall. The following allegations of the defendants' affirmative defense will sufficiently show its nature: "That the said party walls were so constructed that they could be used as the side walls of a building to be erected upon the said lots, and plaintiffs purchased said lots with the intention of building, and did build, on said lots, a four-story brick building, and made use of the party wall situated upon lot twenty-one (21) to the full height of the four stories thereof, without constructing any additional wall or support in connection therewith, and made use of the wall standing in part upon lot twenty-two (22) the full height of three stories, without making any additional wall or support thereto, and erected on the top thereof a fourth story at an expense to them of $160. That these party walls, as they stood at the time of the said purchase and conveyance as aforesaid, were erections of a permanent nature, having, by the terms of the agreements under which they were constructed, mutual easements of support obligatory upon the owners of the adjoining lots on which they stood, and were of such a nature and character that they could not be removed from said lots by the defendants herein; said easements running with the land. That the plaintiffs, by the construction of the said four-story building and their use of the said walls in which to insert the joists of said building, voluntarily accepted the benefits of, and bound themselves to the burdens imposed by, the dominant and servient easements created by the said party-wall agreements, and the said benefits and burdens so imposed were mutually beneficial to the respective owners of said lands; the burdens being offset by the benefits conferred. That, should it be found by this court that the plaintiffs have paid the amount of the judgment mentioned and referred to in the plaintiffs' alleged second cause of action, and the costs connected therewith, and should the court further find that the plaintiffs have paid the amount of the judgment as set forth in paragraph 19 of their alleged cause of action, and the amount of attorney and counsel fees and other charges and expenses, as set forth in paragraph 20, and that the same constitute a reasonable charge against these answering defendants, defendants say that the existence of the said party walls and the existence of the said party-wall agreements, taken as a whole, and the rights accruing to plaintiffs thereunder, conferred upon the plaintiffs benefits greatly in excess of the payment which they have been compelled to make by reason of the allegations contained in their amended complaint herein, and that, notwithstanding the said payments so made by them (if the court should so find), there has not been any depreciation in value of the lands so purchased by the plaintiffs by reason of the said encumbrance, or by reason of the said alleged breach of covenant. That, by the existence of the said party walls and their right to make use of the same in the construction of their said four-story building upon the said lots in question, of the size and character required by the building ordinances of the city of Tacoma in force at the time of the construction of said building, and the other benefits conferred by the dominant servitudes vested in them by the said party-wall agreements, the plaintiffs were enabled to save, and did save, a large amount of money, greatly in excess of the amount of money which they allege they had paid out by reason of the things set forth in their amended complaint herein, and which may be more specifically set forth as follows, to wit:

"This is the substance of the defense which the defendants were precluded from making by the sustaining of the plaintiffs' demurrer thereto.

This branch of the controversy has to do only with the question of the measure of damages. The contention of counsel for the defendants is that they are entitled to have offset against that part of plaintiffs' damage consisting of the payment they were compelled to make to free lot 22 from the lien the benefits resulting to the plaintiffs by reason of the easement acquired by them in lot 23 for the support of the wall. This contention is rested upon the theory that when the breach of a covenant of warranty consists of an encumbrance in the nature of an easement, which impairs the grantee's title to the premises, and cannot be removed by him as a matter of right by the payment of money, his damages will be measured by the diminished value of the premises thereby occasioned; and that, if the easement be of such nature that the owner of the premises acquired some benefit therefrom as owner of the premises, although it may also impair his title, then that the value of such benefit, whatever it may be, is to be offset against the diminished value of the premises, resulting from the existence of the easement encumbrance, considered only as impairing his title to the premises. It is argued that the party wall constructed as here shown results in mutual concurrent easements in favor of the owner of each lot; that while the plaintiffs' lot is encumbered by this easement, there is indissolubly connected with such encumbrance a like easement upon the other lot for the support of the wall, resulting in a benefit which must be considered and allowed to the extent of its actual value as a set-off in measuring the damage resulting to the plaintiffs' lot by reason of the easement encumbrance upon it. It is not argued that the court can say, as a matter of law, that one equally balances the other, so as to result in nominal damages only to the plaintiffs; but that each shall be valued independently of the other, and the plaintiffs' damages diminished accordingly. In support of this view, our attention is directed to the following authorities: 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 179; Wetherbee v. Bennett, 2 Allen, 428; Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 335; Richmond v. Ames, 164 Mass. 467, 41 N. E. 671; Mitchell v. Stanley, 44 Conn. 312; Hubbard v. Norton, 10 Conn. 422. None of these cited cases involved mutual easements for support of a party wall; nor do they involve a lien arising out of a party-wall agreement, securing the payment of part of the cost of the wall. While their logic may lend support to the theory of counsel for defendants, if we should view the measure of damages entirely independent of the lien for the payment of one half the costs of the wall, we do not think it follows that the lien is so connected with the easements that it cannot be considered apart from the mutual burdens and benefits flowing from each of the owners to the other solely by reason of the mutual easements.

The only authority relied upon by counsel for the plaintiffs as being directly in point is Mackey v. Harmon, 34 Minn. 168, 24 N. W. 702. It may be conceded that that decision lends support to counsel's contention. The party-wall agreement there involved seems to have been substantially the same as the one before us, except that one half the cost of the wall was not secured by a lien upon the lot, as in this case; but the use of the wall could be had only upon payment of one half the cost thereof. In that case the trial court held that the easements being mutually beneficial and compensating to the respective owners, no such encumbrance was thereby created as would constitute a breach of the covenant against encumbrance. Upon appeal, the supreme court held that the easement upon the plaintiffs' lot did constitute an encumbrance amounting to a breach of the covenant, and granted a new trial for the purpose of ascertaining the plaintiffs' damages. Touching the measure of damages, the court said only the following: "This brings us to the question of damages. The encumbrance in this case, that is to say, the servitude to which plaintiffs' land is subjected, has not been removed, and it is not in the power of the plaintiffs to force its removal, as it would be if the encumbrance were a matured mortgage. Only by the consent of Hurlburt or his successors in interest can the servitude be purchased in, or in any way discharged. This case is, then, one in which the necessary measure of damages is compensation for the depreciation in value of plaintiffs' land, occasioned by the encumbrance. Fagan v. Cadmus, 46 N. J. L. 441. The agreement between Hurlburt and Harmon is to be read as a whole. So read, while it confers upon Hurlburt's land an easement in plaintiffs' land, it in the same breath confers upon plaintiffs' land a like and equal easement in Hurlburt's land. As respects actual damages, the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to such sum as will compensate them for the depreciation in the value of their land, occasioned by the agreement as a whole. The question is, When Harmon executed the deed to Mackey, how much less was plaintiffs' lot worth with the mutual easements or servitudes created by the agreement as a whole, than it would have been without them? The plaintiffs are, of course, entitled to nominal damages, at least, for the formal breach of the covenant against encumbrances."

Limiting these observations of that learned court as applicable only to the mutual easements in the respective lots for the support of the wall, apart from the obligation to pay one half the cost thereof from one lot owner to the other, we would have but little trouble in adopting this view of the law. But when we come to consider the obligation of one lot owner to pay to the other 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

one half of the cost of the wall upon making use thereof, whether such obligation be secured by the right to withhold the use of the wall until paid for, as in that case, or by a lien upon the lot, as in this case, we are constrained to entertain a different view. We cannot escape the conclusion that such an obligation becomes an encumbrance upon the lot of such a nature that it is to be considered entirely apart from the mutual easement rights of the respective lot owner; that is, it is in effect a separate encumbrance, to be discharged only by the payment of money. We think this is particularly true in this case, since the easement rights of the parties did not depend upon the payment of one half the cost of the wall; such payment being secured by a lien upon the lot, which was actually foreclosed as such. We are of the opinion that the defendants were not entitled to have the value of the party-wall easement rights acquired by the plaintiffs in lot 23 offset against the amount they were compelled to pay in the removal of this lien encumbrance, though they may have been entitled to have the value of such easement rights offset against the damage caused by the easement encumbrance upon their lot, which breached the defendants' covenant of warranty. It follows that the demurrer to the defendants' affirmative defense was properly sustained by the trial court. Other matters discussed by counsel need not be noticed by us, since they would in no event change the result.

The judgment is affirmed. Neither party will recover costs in this court.

PERRY WATER, LIGHT, & ICE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CITY OF PERRY.

Municipal corporation — indebtedness — limitation.

1. Section 538 of the Statutes of Okla.

Headnotes by WILLIAMS, J.

Note. — Liability of municipality or other public corporation on implied contract.

This note is supplemental to a note in 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1117.

As to the liability of a municipality on oma Territory of 1893 (Comp. Laws 1909, § 647) limits the power of a city council to contract for personalty at one purchase in excess of the sum of $500.

(a) A contract for one purchase of items of personalty aggregating a sum in excess of $500, without first being authorized by a majority vote of the qualified electors resident of said city, is void.

Appeal — changing position — right.

2. Where the aggregate value of such personalty received and accepted by the officers of a municipality under one transaction or purchase, or received with the consent of the owner of such personalty, and applied to its use, exceeds the sum of $500, the authority not being first had by the approval of a majority of the electors resident of such municipality, no liability therefor is created against such municipality.

(a) The case having been tried in the lower court upon the theory that the question as to the want of power of the municipality to make such contract was properly raised, plaintiff in error will not be permitted in this court to procure a reversal on the ground that it was not, when there is no contention that such authority by an approval of a majority of the electors was first had.

ERROR to the District Court for Noble County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain merchandise. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harris & Nowlin, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff was entitled to show and recover upon a quantum meruit, regardless an implied contract for labor performed or services accepted by it, see note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1125, and also note appended to State ex rel. Morris v. Clark, ante, 43.

It is well settled that a municipality may be liable upon an implied contract, as where services are performed or material furnished at the request of proper officers, although no express contract was ever entered into, the subject-matter of the contract being within the authority of such officers (Stivers v. Cherryvale, 86 Kan. 270, 120 Pac. 361), and a county may be liable on an implied contract, although no contract can be implied against it unless it is one which the county is by law empowered to make; hence, general assumpsit lies against a county within the range of its contractual powers, just as it does against an individual. Montgomery County v. Pruett, — Ala. —, 57 So. 823. And where a board of trustees of a city have the power to provide for such current expenses as those for coal to be used in operation of waterworks owned and operated by a municipality, coal furnished under a contract with the trustees may be recovered for although no provision has been made by the council for the payment thereof (Martin-Strelau Co. v. Dubuque, 149 Iowa, 1, 127 N. W. 1013); and this is true although there were irregularities in the making of the contract (Laird Norton Yards v. Rochester, — Minn. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 134 N. W. 644). So, a city may be liable upon an implied contract for property obtained under a contract void because not entered into as required by statute, if the city obtains and uses the property, and receives the avails and collects the value of it from property owners by means of an assessment. Mixer v. Adam, 66 Misc. 238, 121 N. Y. Supp. 31. And the value of material received under a contract with the officers of a school district, irregular merely because the officers, at the time of the execution of the contract, were not in session as a board, may nevertheless be recovered, although the contract itself is not enforceable. Watkins v. School Dist. No. 104, 85 Kan. 760, 118 Pac. 1069. But in North v. Huron County, 30 Ohio C. C. 145, 10 Ohio C. C. N. S. 462, it is held that no implied contract arises for the value of labor and material furnished in piking a highway under a contract with county commissioners, invalid because no record has been made of the commissioners' meeting, and no auditors' certificate filed or recorded, as required by law.

The late cases are conflicting as to whether a city may be held upon an implied contract for the benefits received under a contract invalid for failure to comply with statutory requirements designed to secure competition in bidding. It has been held that where a city has general power to repair its streets, it is liable on an implied contract for the hire of an asphalt plant used in making such repairs, although in making the contract for hiring the plant the municipality did not comply strictly with the provisions of the city charter by advertising for bids and contracting for the work with the lowest bidder, it being impossible for the city, at the time the repairs were made, strictly to comply in these respects with the requirements of the statute. Nebraska Bitulithic Co. v. Omaha, 84 Neb. 375, 121 N. W. 443: And see also Des Moines v. Welsbach Street Lighting Co. 110 C. C. A. 540, 188 Fed. 906, holding that a contract for street lighting which is within the scope of the power of the city to make, but is irregular because entered into in an irregular manner (without advertising for bids, as required by statute), when fully executed by one party, and the city has received and accepted the full benefit of the contract, and cannot restore what it has received, is enforceable, since the city is estopped to assert the irregular execution, and otherwise the ends of justice would be defeated.

But in most jurisdictions where the delegation of power to a municipality or other of a failure to show an express contract binding upon the city.

Defendant, having admitted the receipt of the property for the value of which plaintiff sued to recover, and having pleaded payment for such property by the performance of an alleged contract concerning same, admitted plaintiff's cause of action, and placed the burden of proof upon itself.

Plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant upon a quantum meruit the value of plaintiff's property taken and appropriated by defendant to its own use and benefit.

public corporation to contract contains provisions as to the manner of the exercise of this power, which especially are designed to secure competition in bidding, any contract must follow the essential requirements of the statute, otherwise no liability on the contract exists against the municipality, nor can it be held on an implied contract for benefits received thereunder. Thus, a contractor, after having entered into a contract in writing with the city, invalid because failing to comply with charter provisions designed to secure competition, after completing the work described in the contract (paving certain streets), and after the acceptance of such work by the city, cannot recover upon an implied assumption the reasonable value of the work done and materials placed in the street. Cawker v. Central Bitulithic Paving Co. 140 Wis. 25, 121 N. W. 888.

Or where by statute certain contracts of municipalities are forbidden, a contract entered into to evade these provisions of the statute, although for the purpose of lighting the streets of the city, creates against the city no express or implied obligation to pay for any benefits received thereunder. Edison Electric Co. v. Pasadena, 102 C. C. A. 401, 178 Fed. 425.

Mr. L. L. Cowley also for plaintiff in error.

Mr. A. N. Whiteside for defendant in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, as plaintiff, instituted its action in the lower court, against the defendant in error, as defendant, declaring in its petition in part as follows: "That on and prior to the 1st day of July, 1903, the said defendant was the owner of a waterworks system in said city. That on the said 1st day of July, 1903, for the purpose of conducting and supplying said waterworks system with coal for fuel, oil, etc., the said city purchased of this plaintiff a large amount of merchandise. That at said time the said city was the owner and operator of a light system for the purpose of furnishing light for the use of said city and its inhabitants. That on the said 1st day of July, 1903, the said city purchased of this plaintiff a large amount of merchandise, such as carbons, lamps, coal, oil, repairs, and supplies. That at the time of the purchase of said articles it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that the same should be listed, and a complete inventory made thereof, and the said goods inspected and delivered to said city, all of which was done by the agents of plaintiff and defendant. That a true and exact account and inventory of all the said property and merchandise so purchased by defendant

So, where the city is authorized to contract only in writing, stating the consideration, and contracts otherwise entered into are declared void, a city is not liable for the value of goods received as extras to a written contract, although pursuant to an oral agreement, or without any contract. W. W. Cook & Son v. Cameron, 144 Mo. App. 137, 128 S. W. 269.

And a claim against a county is invalid where based upon the right to recover for material furnished under a contract invalid because in amount in excess of the power of the county to contract. Garrison v. Perkins, 137 Ga. 744, 74 S. E. 541. Neither may money be recovered from the county where borrowed to pay for material thus purchased. Ibid.

Neither is there resting upon a municipality any implied obligation to pay for benefits received under a contract with some officer of the municipality not authorized to make the contract in question. Bartlett v. Lowell, 201 Mass. 151, 87 N. E. 195 (gravel furnished to repair streets); Floyd County v. Owego Bridge Co. 143 Ky. 693, 137 S. W. 237 (construction of bridges for county).

from plaintiff, and delivered in accordance with the agreement and arrangement between plaintiff and defendant, showing the description of each item and the price which the said defendant was to pay therefor, and which was the reasonable and actual value thereof at said time and place, is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part hereof. Plaintiff further says that said contract, agreement, and arrangement was verbal, and not in writing, but that the same was fully executed, and the property mentioned and described in said Exhibit A was then and there delivered by plaintiff to defendant, and the said defendant has used and consumed, and ever since retained and appropriated, said property to its exclusive use and benefit. Plaintiff further says that said defendant has often been requested to pay for said property, but that said payment has not been made, and defendant has positively refused and neglected to pay for the same, after a proper and formal bill and demands had been presented to said city and the officers thereof. That no part of said claim or demand has been paid. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against said defendant for the amount of said indebtedness in the sum of $206.21, with interest thereon from the 1st day of July, 1903, at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, for the costs of this action, and all other proper relief." On November 28, 1906, the defendant demurred to the petition, which was overruled, and exceptions saved. On December 11, 1906, the defendant answered by general denial, and, further, by averring that "all articles received of plaintiff and mentioned in plaintiff's petition were purchased by said city from said plaintiff under and by virtue of a written contract executed by plaintiff and defendant, bearing date of June 27, 1903," and that same had been paid for. On September 6, 1908, plaintiff filed its reply, denying each and every allegation of said answer, except admitting the execution of the written contract, but averred "that said contract was for the purchase and sale of the electric light, ice, and power plant therein referred to, and with the exceptions therein specified, and was not intended to include or cover the property and items set forth in the plaintiff's petition, such as supplies, coal, etc., not in use, or never having been in use, in connection with said light, water, and power plant, and at the time of executing and entering into the said written contract this plaintiff fully understood and believed that said written contract had nothing to do with the articles," etc. On October 12, 1908, the plaintiff filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings, which was denied. A jury being waived, said cause was tried to the court. The defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence under the petition, for the reason that the same failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which was overruled and exceptions saved. After the evidence was introduced on the part of the plaintiff, the defendant interposed a demurrer to the same, in part, in hæc verba: 'The city further demurs, for the reason that the evidence of the plaintiff shows that the goods purchased were personal property, and the contract price was more than $500, and fails to show that it was ever submitted to a vote of the people of the city of Perry.' The record then further recites:

Thereupon counsel for the respective parties argued the said demurrer to the court.

Mr. Harris: The plaintiff now, pending the consideration of the demurrer to the evidence, offers to remit all with the exception of $500 of the amount claimed, and demands judgment for $500 and costs.

Mr. Johnson: That don't help him as a matter of law.

Mr. Harris: With interest from the date of the taking of the property.

Mr. Whiteside: If any of it is void, it is all void.

The court: Yes; I think so.

Thereupon counsel for the respective parties continued to argue the said demurrer.

The court: Demurrer sustained.

Mr. Harris: Exception.

The court: Do you desire to stand on the demurrer, Judge Harris, and take time?

Mr. Harris: I think I better file a motion for a new trial. I will prepare it right away.

The undisputed evidence in this record on the part of the plaintiff in error shows that all of this property was received under a verbal contract by one purchase, and that not only the value, but also the agreed price, exceeded $500.

Section 2 (538), art. 1, chap. 14, Statutes of Oklahoma Territory 1893, provides: "All cities governed by the provisions of this act shall be bodies corporate and politic, and shall have power to sue and be sued, to purchase and hold real and personal property for the use of the city, to sell and convey any real or personal property owned by the city, and make such order respecting the same as may be conducive to the best interests of the city, to make all contracts and do all other acts in relation to the property and affairs of the city, necessary to the good government of the city, and to the exercise of its corporate and administrative powers, to have and use a corporate seal, and alter the same at pleasure, and to execute such other and further powers as are, or may be, conferred by law; Provided, however, that no real estate shall be bought or sold, nor shall any personal property, where the value of the personal property, contracted for at one purchase, exceeds $500, until the purchase or sale be authorized by a majority vote of the electors, resident of the city or village." This section was construed by the supreme court of Oklahoma territory in Fire Extinguisher Mfg. Co. v. Perry, 8 Okla. 429, 58 Pac. 635, wherein it was held that it limited the purchase of fire apparatus to $500; that a contract made for the purchase of apparatus in excess of $500 is void, and no recovery can be had thereon.

It is insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the question of such contract being void by virtue of said section, requiring all purchases of personal property in excess of $500 to be approved first by the electors of such municipality, was not raised in the lower court, but from the foregoing excerpt it would seem that the court below, as well as the parties thereto, treated this question as properly raised. Such being the case, the plaintiff in error will not be permitted to change front in this court, and insist that such question was neither properly raised nor properly before the trial court. Harris v. First Nat. Bank, 21 Okla. 189, 95 Pac. 781; Queen Ins. Co. v. Cotney, 25 Okla. 125, 105 Pac. 651; Wattenbarger v. Hall, 26 Okla. 815, 110 Pac. 911; Gann v. Ball, 26 Okla. 26, 110 Pac. 1067; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Key, 28 Okla. 769, 115 Pac. 875.

Counsel for plaintiff in error in their brief say: "Counsel doubtless had in mind, at the time of interposing this demurrer, the case of Fire Extinguisher Mfg. Co. v. Perry, supra, and, if the plaintiff's claim in this case was founded and proven solely upon the theory that the city was liable upon an express contract for the contract price of the property purchased, the statutory limitation upon the authority of the council to contract for personal property in excess of $500 without first submitting the question to a vote of the people of the city might be a material question in this case." Counsel thus assume, at least, if not concede, that the question was properly raised in the lower court. He pleads that the property was delivered to the city under a verbal contract. The evidence that he offers to sustain his petition tends to sustain that allegation. He seeks, however, in the face of his petition, to waive the express verbal contract and recover under quantum meruit, which is an action in assumpsit, or upon an implied contract.

Not only in the record, but also in the briefs, it appears to be conceded that the question as to the purchase of said personalty was not submitted to the electors of said municipality for their approval. Such being the case, if such contract for said reason was void, and no recovery could be had, either on said contract or in quantum meruit, which is an action in assumpsit, this court would do a useless thing by reversing this case and remanding it for another trial. For the defendant, after the cause was remanded, would certainly be permitted to amend its pleadings and set up that said property was delivered either under an express or implied verbal contract, in violation of § 538, supra, and that therefore no recovery could be had in quantum meruit. Under such conceded facts, this court should pass on the question on the theory that it was properly raised before the trial court. Kuchler v. Weaver, 23 Okla. 420, 100 Pac. 915, 18 Ann. Cas. 462. The only objection made as to the want of authority not being pleaded in the answer was as to the mayor and certain aldermen not being authorized by the council to make the contract of purchase.

In Fire Extinguisher Mfg. Co. v. Perry, 8 Okla. 429, 58 Pac. 635, paragraph 3 of the syllabus is as follows: "Where a city council purchases fire apparatus at one purchase, and agrees to pay the sum of $1,100 therefor, no election having been held to authorize such purchase, the contract is void, and the city council cannot validate such illegal contract by splitting the sum into three parts of less than $500 each, and executing warrants therefor, and the payment of warrants so executed may be defeated by the city." At page 433 of 8 Okla. the court said: "Section 538 is intended to limit the power of the city council in the purchase of personal property at one time to sums of $500 and less, unless such purchase shall be authorized by a majority vote of the electors resident of the city. If the council deem it advisable to make a purchase of personal property the value of which is in excess of $500, it becomes their duty to submit the question as to whether such purchase shall be made to a vote of the resident voters of the city, and the power to make such purchase can only be exercised when a majority vote of the electors voting on such proposition has authorized the council to make it."

This language applies equally to a claim under quantum meruit. In Salt Creek Twp. v. King Iron Bridge & Mfg. Co. 51 Kan. 520, 33 Pac. 303, Justice Horton, in speaking for the court, said: "Upon the facts disclosed in the record, and the provisions of the statute authorizing, under certain circumstances, township officers to build and pay for bridges, we think the bridge and manufacturing company cannot recover. It seems to be conceded that the company cannot recover upon its contract. The only claim made is that the township is estopped, and should be required to pay the reasonable value of the bridge. At the time of the execution of the contract, and also at the time the bridge was constructed, the public records of Salt Creek township showed that its officers had no power or authority to make any contract for the bridge or to issue any bonds. The proposition submitted to the people for the building of a bridge did not receive three fifths of their votes. It therefore was defeated. The statutory limitation of indebtedness in the township, as prescribed in paragraph 413, was also an inhibition against the making of the contract. The township board, and, possibly, the bridge and manufacturing company, mistook the law. In any event, the township officials acted in direct conflict with the provisions of the statute prescribing their duties and limiting their powers. The records of the township were public, open to all, and the bridge and manufacturing company was not, and could not have been, misled. The bridge was constructed upon a public highway within the township, but used by the people generally. It is a well-settled rule that township or other municipal officers cannot do by indirection that which they might not do directly. State ex rel. Reed v. Marion County, 21 Kan. 419. If township officers may disregard all of the statutory provisions concerning the construction of and payment for bridges, and create a liability against the people of a township by accepting bridges or other work without any power so to do, and thereby make the township liable, then the provisions of the statute defining how bridges should be built and paid for have no force whatever. Under such a rule, the township officers may at any time build and accept bridges and create liabilities against the people of the township without a vote and without limit. As the contract between the township officers and the bridge and manufacturing company is void under the statute, we do not think the other facts disclosed show the township is estopped from asserting the want of power on the part of the township officers, or from defending against any liability for the bridge. There is no innocent holder of bonds in this case, and, in fact, no innocent parties. The township officers, as well as the bridge and manufacturing company, are presumed to know the law. The statute clearly declares the conditions upon which a municipal township may obtain bridges; but if the provisions of the statute are overlooked, or voluntarily cast aside by the parties, with full knowledge of all the facts, no estoppel of any kind can be created. There is a seeming hardship in refusing to pay for the bridge after the money of the company has completed it, and it is in use upon a regular laid-out public highway. But the want of legal authority to contract was known, or ought to have been known, by the company before it expended any of its money. Therefore it is at fault. Those dealing with a township must see to it that its officers have power to act. In this case nothing was concealed, and all the facts appear upon the public records. A township or other municipality can only act by the mode prescribed by law. Any other rule leaves the taxpayer at the mercy of the officers of the township and contractor, and would render all statutory provisions of limitation of power nugatory. Lewis v. Bourbon County, 12 Kan. 186; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1124; Daly v. San Francisco, 72 Cal. 154, 13 Pac. 321; Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 278, 26 L. ed. 138; Newbery v. Fox (1887) 37 Minn. 141, 5 Am. St. Rep. 830, 33 N. W. 333; Reichard v. Warren County, 31 Iowa, 381; Brady v. New York, 2 Bosw. 187; Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385."

In Allsman v. Oklahoma City, 21 Okla. 142, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 511, 95 Pac. 468, 17 Ann. Cas. 184, the plaintiff sued for the recovery of the unearned portion of certain money paid to the city for a liquor license, which had failed on account of the repeal of the statute under which it was issued. In that case there was no question of the municipality acting beyond its authority, or in express violation of a statutory or constitutional prohibition.

In Oklahoma City v. T. M. Richardson Lumber Co. 3 Okla. 5, 39 Pac. 386, no question of the want of authority of the municipality to purchase said lumber was involved. The provisional government for the regulation and management of the affairs of the cities and towns of the territory of Oklahoma which were established prior to the act of Congress approved May 2, 1890 (act May 2, 1890, chap. 182, 26 Stat. at L. 81), being merely voluntary associations of the people living in such city, purchased lumber from the Jones-Richardson Lumber Company. The lumber was applied to constructing sidewalks upon the streets, and for other public improvements for the city. The unpaid account for the lumber was assigned for value to the defendant in error, the T. M. Richardson Lumber Company. Afterwards the plaintiff in error, the city of Oklahoma City, was legally incorporated, and, coming into possession of said streets, used said lumber. It had authority then to purchase said lumber without any reference to the voters. The court properly held it was liable in quantum meruit or assumption; there being no statute prohibiting such purchase.

In Doyle v. School Dist. No. 38, — Okla. —, 118 Pac. 386, by Robertson, Commissioner, it was held that where the majority of the members of a board of a school district employed a law firm to defend the board in a suit brought against it, at an agreed fee of $75, though the board may have failed to meet in an official capacity and authorize such employment, yet, if the service was actually rendered, and the contract became an executed one, and was of the reasonable value claimed, to wit, $75, and the school district received the benefit therefrom, the board was estopped from pleading the irregularity of said employment. This holding is in line with Allman v. Oklahoma City, and Oklahoma City v. T. M. Richardson Lumber Co. supra. The school board had the authority to make the contract of employment without the approval of the electors of said district or any other independent agency. The vice complained of went to the want of action of the school board as to what it was empowered to do, and did not consist of a violation of any statute or constitutional provision placing a limitation upon its powers.

In State v. Pullman, 23 Wash. 583, 83 Am. St. Rep. 836, 63 Pac. 265, Chief Justice Dunbar, in speaking for the court, said: "It is claimed, however, by the appellant, that, having received the benefits of the contract which the city entered into, it ought to be estopped from denying its validity; also, that it had ratified the contract by receiving the benefits. It is well established that the power to ratify is coextensive only with the power to contract, and that an act which was illegal for want of authority on the part of the contracting powers cannot be ratified. There has been a conflict of opinion on same branches of this question, but an investigation of the authorities will show, we think, that where courts have estopped municipalities from interposing the plea of ultra vires, and from escaping the responsibility of their acts, it has been where there has been a defect in the execution of the contracts, as in the issuance of bonds, etc., and not where there has been an absolute want of power on the part of the municipality to contract. The most of the cases cited by the appellant, as we indicated before, were cases of private corporations. The appellant cites Hitchcock v.

Galveston, 96 U. S. 349, 24 L. ed. 661, in support of this contention. This is a case which falls within the rule announced above, and the city was proceeding within its powers, but in an irregular manner. In speaking of the claim that the city had exceeded its power, the Supreme Court of the United States, in its opinion, says: 'Another objection to the validity of the contract urged by the city is founded upon a provision of the charter that the council shall not borrow for general purposes more than $50,000; and it is said the contract, if valid, creates a liability of the city exceeding that sum. This, however, does not appear in the contract itself, and this, perhaps, is a sufficient answer to the objection. But the limitation is upon the power to borrow money, and to borrow it for general purposes. It implies that there may be lawful purposes which are not general in the sense in which that word is used in the charter. An examination of the whole instrument, and of the numerous and large powers conferred upon the council, as well as duties imposed, makes it evident that the provision could not have been intended to prohibit incurring an indebtedness exceeding the sum named. It is in no sense a limitation of the debt of the city.' There are some remarks in this opinion that give color to the contention of the appellant; but that the Supreme Court of the United States did not intend to lay down the rule that, when a city exceeded its powers in a contract made by the authorities, the plea of ultra vires could not be successfully interposed, is made evident by a subsequent case from the same court, viz., Salt Lake City v. Hollister, 118 U. S. 256, 30 L. ed. 176, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1055, wherein is pointed out the distinction between actions arising on contracts made by a corporation in excess of its corporate powers, and actions against corporations for injuries caused by tortious acts done by its agents in the course of its business, and of their employment in excess of its powers. In that case it was held that the city could not escape taxes due on its property, whether acquired legally or illegally; and could not make its want of legal authority to engage in a particular transaction or business a shelter from the taxation imposed by the government on such business. And in answer to the contention of appellant in that respect the court said: 'It remains to be observed that the question of the liability of corporations on contracts which the law does not authorize them to make, and which are wholly beyond the scope of their powers, is governed by a different principle. Here the party dealing with the corporation is under no obligation to enter into the contract. No force or restraint or fraud is practised on him. The powers of these corporations are matters of public law, open to his examination, and he may and must judge for himself as to the power of the corporation to bind itself by the proposed agreement. It is to this class of cases that most of the authorities cited by appellants belong,—cases where corporations have been sued on contracts which they have successfully resisted because they were ultra vires.' It is true that the court, continuing, says: 'But even in this class of cases the courts have gone a long way to enable parties who had parted with property or money on the faith of such contracts to obtain justice by recovery of the property or the money specifically, or as money had and received to plaintiff's use,'—citing Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950; Louisiana v. Wood, 102 U. S. 294, 26 L. ed. 153; Chapman v. Douglas County, 107 U. S. 348, 27 L. ed. 378, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62. But an examination of those cases shows that the general rule announced by the court above had not been impinged upon.

'The law is announced by Mr. Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. vol. 1, § 457, in a manner so concise and explicit that we cannot do better than to give it room in this opinion. It is as follows: 'The general principle of law is settled beyond controversy that the agents, officers, or even city council of a municipal corporation cannot bind the corporation by any contract which is beyond the scope of its powers, or entirely foreign to the purposes of the corporation, or which (not being legislatively authorized) is against public policy. This doctrine grows out of the nature of such institutions, and rests upon reasonable and solid grounds. The inhabitants are the corporators. The officers are but the public agents of the corporation. The duties and powers of the officers or public agents of the corporation are prescribed by statute or charter, which all persons not only may know, but are bound to know. The opposite doctrine would be fraught with such danger, and accompanied with such abuse, that it would soon end in the ruin of municipalities, or be legislatively overthrown. These considerations vindicate both the reasonableness and necessity of the rule that the corporation is bound only when its agents or officers, by whom it can alone act, if it acts at all, keep within the limits of the chartered authority of the corporation. The history of the workings of municipal bodies has demonstrated the salutary nature of this principle, and that it is the part of true wisdom to keep the corporate wings clipped down to the lawful standard. It results from this doctrine that contracts not authorized by the charter or by other legislative act—that is, not within the scope of the powers of the corporation under any circumstances—are void, and in actions thereon the corporation may successfully interpose the plea of ultra vires, setting up as a defense its own want of power under its charter or constituent statute to enter into the contract,'—citing authorities too numerous to reproduce. And if anything were wanting to elucidate the wisdom of the text announced, or to show the pernicious results of tolerating the practice indulged in by municipal authorities to exceed their legal powers, the history of the cities of the Pacific coast furnishes the instance, where, under the stimulus of rivalry in the growth of cities, obligations have been incurred which have bankrupted the cities and impoverished the inhabitants by excessive taxation rendered necessary to meet such obligations.

'In Brady v. New York, 16 How. Pr. 432, it was held that, where the contract under which work was done was void because entered into in violation of the charter, the contractor could not recover for the work in any form, neither under the contract nor as upon a quantum meruit; and that the subsequent ratification of the contract by the common council, whether before or after the work was done, did not make it binding on the corporation. It was further held that, where the officers of a corporation do an act in excess of the corporate power, the corporation is not bound, and when the statute under which the corporation acts restricts its action to a particular mode, none of the agents through whom the corporation acts can bind it in any other than the mode prescribed. This is a very instructive and well-considered case. In Baltimore v. Reynolds, 20 Md. 1, 83 Am. Dec. 535, it was held that a person dealing with agents who act under a special or express authority, whether written or verbal, is bound at his peril to know what the power of the agent is, and to understand its legal effect; and, if the agent exceeds the boundary of his legal powers, the act, as far as it concerns the principal, is void. The authorities are collated and distinguished in this case, and in answer to the plea of hardship the court quotes from Lee v. Munroe, 7 Cranch, 370, 3 L. ed. 374, where it is said: 'It is better that an individual should now and then suffer by such mistakes than to introduce a rule against an abuse of which, by improper conclusions, it would be very difficult for the public to protect itself.' In fact, the rule is so universal that it seems unnecessary to cite further authority.

'But we are not without precedent in our own decisions. In Arnott v. Spokane, 6

Wash. 442, 33 Pac. 1063, it was held, in common with universal authority, that, wherever a person enters into a contract with an agent of a municipal corporation, he must, at his peril, ascertain the extent of such agent's authority; and, if he fails to do so, he alone must suffer the consequences. It was also said: 'The power to ratify a particular contract presupposes the power to make it in the first instance; and, if it is such that it would not be made originally except in a certain prescribed mode, where that mode is disregarded the power to ratify does not exist. A contract which is invalid because not authorized by law cannot be made valid and binding retroactively by any subsequent action of the corporate body, and a liability be thereby fastened upon the corporation.'—citing Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 97, 81 Am. Dec. 96; Nicolson Pav. Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 704; McPherson v. Foster, 43 Iowa, 48, 22 Am. Rep. 215; Bryan v. Page, 51 Tex. 532, 32 Am. Rep. 637. In Chehalis County v. Hutcheson, 21 Wash. 82, 75 Am. St. Rep. 818, 57 Pac. 341,—a case where a great hardship was worked upon the appellant by the application of this rule, where the appellant was a school superintendent for Chehalis county, and had visited schools under a statute which allowed a certain compensation therefor, but which statute was afterwards pronounced unconstitutional by this court, it was held that the county would not be estopped from disputing the validity of the warrants which had been issued in payment of such claims, for the reason that the contract would be void ab initio by virtue of the original lack of authority upon the part of the commissioners. The court announced as the reason of the rule which governs the decision in this case that the acts of the officers were unauthorized and void, and that one dealing with them was bound to take notice of the extent of their powers,—citing 2 Herman, Estoppel, p. 1365, to the effect that 'the true principle in such case is well settled that one cannot do indirectly what cannot be done directly; and, where there is no power or authority vested by law in officers or agents, no void act of theirs can be cured by aid of the doctrine of estoppel. Where there is power, and it is irregularly exercised, or there are defects and omissions in exercising the authority conferred by law, the doctrine of equitable estoppel may well be applied by courts.' In the case at bar there was no power on the part of the municipality to enter into this contract. The power was conferred upon the voters. The city had authority only to put the machinery in motion which would elicit and determine the will of the voters. The discretion and authority were conferred upon the voters, and not upon the officers of the city."

The question involved in State v. Pullman, 23 Wash. 583, 83 Am. St. Rep. 836, 63 Pac. 265, was, the municipality being prohibited from contracting for the extension of its water system without the approval of its citizens, whether quantum meruit or assumpsit would lie on account of the benefits received. This case is in point, and sustains the judgment of the lower court. In Wiegel v. Pulaski County, 61 Ark. 74, 32 S. W. 116, it is said: "Can the county court authorize the letting of a contract to construct a turnpike road, without an appropriation first made therefor? The statute itself answers this question in the negative in § 1279, Sandels & Hill's Dig., which provides that 'no county court or agent of any county shall hereafter make any contract on behalf of the county unless an appropriation has been previously made therefor, and is wholly or in part unexpended.' This is the act of March 19, 1879. Construing this act, this court held in the case of Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb, 54 Ark. 645, 13 L.R.A. 353, 17 S. W. 7, that the county court could not make a contract for the building of a bridge across the Arkansas river at the city of Little Rock without an appropriation having been first made therefor. In this case the court said: 'It is the policy of the act to require the concurring judgment of the levying court and of the county judge that a bridge should be built, before a contract for building it can be made. When the levying court makes an appropriation to pay for one, that signifies its favorable judgment, and the county judge may afterwards signify his by letting the contract. . . . While we think that a contract cannot be made before there is an appropriation for it, we do not think that, when an appropriation has been made, the contract will be limited to the amount appropriated. When the levying court appropriates any sum for the work, that signifies their judgment that the work should be done, and the county judge may then proceed to contract for it without further consulting them; the only limitation upon his power being found in other directions.' We hold upon this statute and the authority of this case that without some appropriation made therefor by the quorum or levying court, the county judge has no power to let a contract to construct a turnpike road. Though he has jurisdiction to let such a contract, he must do so, if at all, within the limitations imposed by law upon the exercise of such jurisdiction. Otherwise there would be no restraint upon the extent of his power to contract, based upon the fact, simply, that he is invested with jurisdiction to make the contract. Such unlimited exercise of his jurisdiction to make such contracts might involve the county in hopeless bankruptcy; and the limitation is but a wholesome safeguard against the abuse of the power to make contracts binding the county. While the county court is invested with jurisdiction of roads and highways, to have them 'laid out, opened, and repaired,' by § 28, art. 7, of the Constitution, and by § 1173 of Sandels & Hill's Digest, conferring upon the county court exclusive original jurisdiction in 'all matters relating to county taxes, in all matters relating to roads,' etc., and by § 6746 of Sandels & Hill's Digest, still the extent and exercise of this jurisdiction are limited and controlled by law. The counsel for appellant contends that the validity of the contract with the county is res judicata, because the work under it was accepted and approved by the county, and allowances were made the contractor upon the work. But we think otherwise. There was no jurisdiction, without an appropriation first made, to make the contract upon the part of the county, and without such an appropriation it was void, and no adjudication could make it valid. If there was no power to make the contract, it was not, and could not be, ratified by the county's acceptance of the work done under it. . . . If this were not true, the county court would be above the law, and could make contracts without the authority of law, and then ratify them, and bind the county, and thus the law would be set at defiance. 'It is a well-settled rule of construction of grants by the legislature to corporations, whether public or private, that only such powers and rights can be exercised under them as are clearly comprehended within the words of the act, or derived therefrom by necessary implication.' . . . There is not only no express or implied power in the county court to make such a contract without an appropriation first made for the work to be done, but, as we have seen, there is a positive inhibition against it in the statute quoted above."

In Moss v. Sugar Ridge Twp. — Ind. App. —, 67 N. E. 460, it was held that "a municipal corporation does not become liable for a debt by substituting the fiction of an implied contract for an express contract, void for noncompliance with the terms of a statute not penal." See also Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 119, 45 L.R.A. 420, 73 Am. St. Rep. 31, 57 Pac. 777; Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Merchants' Ins. & T. Co. 11 Humph. 1, 53 Am. Dec. 742; Superior Mfg. Co. v. School Dist. No. 63, 28 Okla. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE COGGESHALL, Plff. in Err.,

v.

THOMAS W. CONNER.

(— Okla. —, 120 Pac. 559.)

Officer — compensation by individual.

A public officer cannot recover compensation from third persons for the performance of acts within the scope of his official duty, even though the acts were performed at their request, or though they may have expressly promised to pay him.

This rule applies to an attorney acting as special prosecutor for the state, the regular county attorney being disqualified, by appointment by order of the district court.

ERROR to the County Court for Kiowa County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover a fee for legal services. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. McIntosh, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff was, at all times during which he rendered services in the prosecution of John C. Stanfill, county attorney, either by election or appointment, and therefore had no legal right to contract for or accept fees or pay from individuals for services rendered during the time he was such county attorney, either by election or appointment.

Mahaffey v. Territory, 11 Okla. 220, 66 Pac. 342.

Mr. W. A. Phelps for defendant in error.

Headnote by WILLIAMS, J.

Note. — Right of prosecuting attorney to compensation from individual.

This note does not include cases as to the authority of a county or other political unit to employ an assistant or special prosecuting attorney, and his resultant right to compensation.

The case of COGGESHALL v. CONNER is decided upon the broad, general principle that underlies this whole question, and upon which most cases of this kind rest, namely, that a special prosecuting attorney, being a public officer whose salary or compensation is fixed by law, and is payable out of the public treasury, cannot recover com-

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding in error is to review the judgment rendered in favor of the defendant in error, as plaintiff, against the plaintiff in error, as defendant, in the county court of Kiowa county, in an action for the recovery of a fee in the sum of $125 for the prosecution of John C. Stanfill, charged with arson. Plaintiff's claim was resisted on the grounds (1) that the defendant had neither expressly nor impliedly employed plaintiff, and (2) such services in such prosecution were performed by said plaintiff whilst he was the duly elected and qualified county attorney of Kiowa county, territory of Oklahoma, and (3) after he went out of office as such officer, the services were performed by him under special appointment by the district court of the state for said county.

The defendant requested the following instruction: "You are instructed that if you find that the plaintiff did the services claimed while he was acting in the capacity of county attorney, either by election or by appointment by the district court, then you should find for the defendant." This instruction was refused and exceptions saved. We think that in this the court erred. A person who accepts an office to which no compensation is attached is presumed to undertake to serve gratuitously (Wortham v. Grayson County Ct. 13 Bush, 53), and cannot recover anything from the state or county, upon the ground of an implied contract to pay what the service was reasonably worth. White v. Levant, 78 Me. 568, 7 Atl. 539; Talbot v. East Machias, 76 Me. 415; Sikes v. Hatfield, 13 Gray, 347; Walker v. Cook, 129 Mass. 578; Greer County v. Watson, 7 Okla. 174, 54 Pac. 441. This presumption is in favor of the state or county. Greer County v. Watson, supra; Throop, Pub. Off. 1892, § 449; Cole v. White County, 32 Ark. 45; Wortham v. Grayson County Ct. 13 Bush, 53. Where services are to be performed by officers for private parties, as, for instance, where a clerk files papers at the instance of private litigants, this presumption does not obtain. Bohart v. Anderson, 24 Okla. 82, 103 Pac. 742, 20 Ann. Cas. 142; Throop, Pub. Off. 1892, § 449.

A public officer whose salary or compensation is fixed by law, and is payable by, or made a charge against, the public, cannot recover compensation from third persons for the performance of acts within the scope of his official duty, even though the acts were performed at their request, or though they may have expressly promised to pay him. Hatch v. Mann, 15 Wend. 44; Brophy v. Marble, 118 Mass. 548; Evans v. Trenton, 24 N. J. L. 764; Pool v. Boston, 5 Cush. 219; New Haven & N. Co. v. Hayden, 117 Mass. 433; Andrews v. United States, 2 Story, 202, Fed. Cas. No. 381; Converse v. United States, 21 How. 463, 16 L. ed. 192.

It was an offense at common law for a person from a private individual for the performance of acts within the scope of his official duty, even though the acts are performed at the request of such individual, or even under an express promise by him to pay therefor.

Where attorneys were employed by settlers to test title to certain land, and suits were brought by permission in the name of the United States to vacate certain patents to the land, and later the settlers, having paid only a small amount for the services, abrogated the agreement on the ground that if the suits were successful, the land would revert to the United States, and therefore the United States ought to pay the expense, but such payment was refused on the part of the government, in an action to compel payment it was held that a promise to pay for such services can be implied only when they are rendered under such circumstances as authorize the party performing them to entertain a reasonable expectation of their payment by the party benefited, and that that was not true of this case. Coleman v. United States, 152 U. S. 96, 38 L. ed. 368, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 473.

A county attorney may not recover upon a contract with a superintendent of schools for prosecuting a civil action in which the county is interested, for it is his duty to prosecute such action without compensation in addition to his regular salary, but he may recover for such services rendered after his term of office as county attorney has expired. Money v. Beard, 136 Ky. 219, 124 S. W. 282.

Where a watchman, while performing his duties as such, discovered one setting fire to a building, and, instead of reporting the case to the authorities, chose to prosecute it himself, and thereby obtained a conviction, it was held that he was not entitled to the reward offered by the city for such conviction, for he could not, by prosecuting the case himself, subject the city to a liability to which it would not have been subject had he given notice to some city officer, as he naturally should have done. Pool v. Boston, 5 Cush. 219.

As to the right of a public officer to claim reward for arrest generally, see note to Somerset Bank v. Edmund, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1170.

Although a prosecuting attorney is not bound to prosecute criminal actions in a magistrate's court, he may do so voluntarily, and the fact that a citizen requests him to do so, and he complies, will not raise an implied contract on the part of such citizen to compensate him for such services. Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. v. Lee, 37 Ohio St. 479.

member of a municipality to refuse to take upon himself an office in such corporation to which he had been appointed. Rex v. Bower, 2 Dowl. & R. 842, 1 Barn. & C. 585, 1 L. J. K. B. 110; Rex v. Lone, 2 Strange, 920; Rex v. Jones, 2 Strange, 1146; Throop, Pub. Off. 1392, § 167.

If the defendant in error rendered any services in this prosecution between the 16th day of November, 1907, the date on which his term of office as county attorney of Kiowa county, Oklahoma territory, terminated, and the 8th day of January, 1908, the date on which he was appointed, by order of the district court, to prosecute said case, he would be entitled to recover a reasonable value therefor, provided the plaintiff in error requested him to continue such prosecution; for, if he made such request, and the services were rendered, the law would imply a contract to pay a reasonable compensation therefor.

It is against public policy for a public officer to be allowed private compensation for the performance of any duty as a public officer. The very moment that the plaintiff was appointed by the district court as a special prosecuting officer to prosecute this case, for the purposes of that case he then and there became a public officer, and for any service rendered in that appointment he would not be entitled to recover as against a private individual. As to whether there is a provision of law for him to be compensated out of the public treasury, that is not essential here to be determined. It may be that there is no provision of law for such compensation out of the public treasury, but it is certainly against sound public policy to permit an attorney to be appointed as a special prosecutor when the regular county attorney is disqualified, and to receive private compensation for such services.

When the state seeks to bring one of its citizens to the bar of justice, and a special prosecutor is appointed, his sense of duty should be impelled only by that of a public prosecutor receiving only the compensation or emoluments, if any, from the sovereignty or subdivision thereof. It would be a dangerous policy for private parties to employ and pay private counsel, and then have them commissioned by the state as special public prosecutors, and thus, in the name of the state, frequently be empowered to wreak vengeance at the instance of private parties. When a private prosecutor is employed by private parties, and he assists in the prosecution without any appointment by the court, he is subject to the guidance and control of the regular prosecuting attorney, and does not come within this restriction.

It follows that the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial and proceed in accordance with this opinion.

All the Justices concur.

In the case of State v. Kent, 4 N. D. 577, 2 L.R.A. 686, 62 N. W. 631, in discussing the right of interested private parties to employ counsel to assist the public prosecutor, when such public prosecutor and the trial judge deem such a course proper, it is said by the court that the state's attorney is not allowed to receive any fee or reward from or on behalf of any private prosecutor or other individual, for services in any prosecution or business to which it is his official duty to attend.

Under the Oregon statutes of 1898, the state is deemed a party defendant in any suit for the dissolution of the marriage contract, and in the fourth judicial district, which comprises Multnomah county, the district attorney is allowed a fee for defending the same on behalf of the city, and the plaintiff is required to deposit such fee with the clerk of the court before the complaint is filed. State ex rel. Fitzgerald v. Moore, 37 Or. 536, 62 Pac. 28.

But under the act of 1899, placing district attorneys on a salary, and cutting off all fees and other compensation, in all judicial districts other than the fourth, the district attorney fee in divorce cases need not be paid. Howard v. Clatsop County, 41 Or. 149, 68 Pac. 425. It seems, however, in contrast with the general rule, that where a town has a special interest in the prosecution of offenders beyond that of the general public, as, for example, where a town receives all fines imposed for offenses committed within its limits, it may assign its attorney to assist the state's attorney in such prosecutions, and pay him therefor. In this case, although the precise question did not arise, it seems clearly implied that such an attorney would have a right to claim such compensation. People v. Warren, 14 Ill. App. 296.

So, a county prosecuting attorney may recover reasonable compensation for services rendered a school district at its own request, in defending an action brought against it, where there is no agreement that he is to render the services as county attorney, or without charge, and where such services are not required of county attorneys by statute. Bates v. School Dist. No. 10, 45 Wash. 498, 88 Pac. 944.

SAME.

(111 C. C. A. 428, 190 Fed. 700.)

Mechanics' lien — owner — mortgagee out of possession.

1. A mortgagee out of possession is not an "owner" within the meaning of a statute permitting a mechanics' lien for lumber and materials furnished by consent of the owner, so as to charge his interest with a lien in case he knowingly permits materials to be furnished without protest.

Note. — Mortgagee as owner within mechanics' lien laws.

The question of priority as between a mortgage and a mechanics' lien is not within the scope of this note, except so far as it turns upon the question whether the mortgagee is an "owner" within the terms of a mechanics' lien statute.

The mortgagee is an owner neither within the meaning of a statute giving a lien for labor and materials furnished at the instance of the owner, nor within the spirit of the rule that one of two joint tenants or cotenants may make proper and reasonable repairs on buildings on an estate in which they have a community interest, and be entitled to contribution from the other. Reid v. Bank of Tennessee, 1 Sneed, 262; followed, at least as to the result, in Pride v. Viles, 3 Sneed, 125.

Mortgagees of a leasehold estate in mining property are not owners of the leasehold, before the mortgagor in possession has defaulted; and therefore their interest cannot be subjected to a mechanics' lien for work contracted for by the mortgagor without their consent and before default. Broman v. Young, 35 Hun, 173.

A mortgagee is but a creditor holding a lien under the mortgage; and he can in no sense be held to occupy the position of an owner, so as to subject his interest to a mechanics' lien for improvements contracted for by the mortgagor; nor is his position any different by reason of the fact that originally he, as owner, conveyed by a warranty deed to another, who mortgaged it back, and the parties entered into a written agreement reciting the conveyance and the mortgage, and that the latter was made in contemplation of the erection of improvements by the mortgagor, and of an advance of money by the mort-

Estoppel — mortgagee — consent to improvement of property — liens.

2. That funds for the improvement of property were raised by mortgage thereon does not estop the mortgagees from asserting a priority of lien over persons claiming liens for lumber and materials supplied for the improvement.

Lien — equitable right — lumber and materials.

3. One who furnishes material or performs labor for improving property which he knows to be subject to a recorded mortgage has no equity to have his claims made superior to that of the mortgagee which will justify a court of equity in displacing vested liens or broadening the language of mechanics' lien statutes by construction, so as to afford a priority.

Mortgage — priority — advance of money.

4. That the money had not actually been paid on bonds secured by mortgage on real estate before work was done on the property which would support a mechanics' lien does not postpone the mortgage to the lien gauge to the mortgagor, in consideration of the mortgage and the price of the land, and providing that, upon default by the mortgagor, the mortgagee might complete the building at the other's expense, and have the amount so expended secured by the mortgage; and that any liens claimed on the property might be settled by the mortgagee, who might charge the sum so paid as advances under the mortgage. Ettridge v. Bassett, 136 Mass. 314.

A mortgagee has neither jus in re nor jus ad rem, but a mere right to have his debts paid out of the proceeds of a sale of the mortgaged property; it is a right which will pass by simple assignment, but will in no case pass by a conveyance of the land alone. The mortgagee's interest, therefore, is not within the meaning of a provision of the mechanics' lien law that every improvement constructed upon lands with the knowledge of the owners or the person having or claiming any interest therein shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of him or them; and that the interest owned or claimed shall be subject to any lien given by the statute, unless such owner or person having or claiming any interest shall, after he obtains knowledge of the making of the improvement, give notice that he will not be responsible for the same; and this is especially true in view of the fact that another section of the statute deals specifically with the respective rights of mortgagees and mechanics' lienors. Williams v. Santa Clara Min. Asso. 66 Cal. 193, 5 Pac. 85. This case was followed in Capital Lumber Co. v. Ryan, 34 Or. 73, 54 Pac. 1093, which also holds that a mortgagee does not come within the meaning of a provision of the mechanics' lien law, that the interest of "the owner or the person having or claiming any interest" in the property shall be subject to claimants, if, prior to the origin of the alleged lien, binding agreements had been made to improve the property in consideration of a transfer of the bonds, and to pay the contractor cash for his interest in them.

Lien — subcontractor — priority over mortgage.

5. The lien rights of a subcontractor do not relate back to the time of the execution of the principal contract, so as to give him a priority over a mortgage upon the property, executed to secure bonds delivered to the principal contractor to pay for work to be done by him after the date of the principal contract, where no work was done under the subcontract until after the rights of the mortgagee had become perfected.

(September 22, 1911.)

APPEALS by defendants from decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maine, denying priority the lien unless he shall give notice that he will not be responsible for the same.

So, in Tompkins v. Horton, 25 N. J. Eq. 284, it was held that a subsequent mortgagee was not an owner within the meaning of a provision of the mechanics' lien law requiring notice of lien to be given to the owner; and the court disapproved language stated to have a contrary import, in Edwards v. Derrickson, 28 N. J. L. 39, affirmed in 29 N. J. L. 468, 80 Am. Dec. 220, and declared that for many years the practice had been in New Jersey not to require notice to be given to encumbrancers, although the precise question as to whether a mortgagee was an owner had never been raised.

And it was held in Howard v. Robinson, 5 Cush. 119, that where the owner of land subject to a mechanics' lien mortgaged it, but was allowed to remain in possession, the mortgagee was not embraced within the meaning of a provision of the statute that the court shall order notice of the filing of the petition to enforce the lien to be given to "the owner of the land," and especially where other sections of the statute show that the word "owner" is used to designate the primary debtor; that is, the party who procures the work to be done. And it was further held that a provision of the statute that if the person indebted in any such contract should die or convey away his estate before the commencement of a suit on the contract, the suit might be commenced against his heirs or whoever should hold the estate which he had in the premises at the time of the making of the contract, did not describe a subsequent mortgagee, the court saying that although, as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, the instrument is a transmission of the fee which gives the mortgagee a remedy in the form of a real action and constitutes a legal seisin, yet, for most other purposes, a mortgage before the entry of the mortgagee was but a pledge, leaving the mortgagor for most purposes the owner.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The mortgagee is an owner.

So, the cestui que trust named in a deed of land is not the owner within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law, prescribing necessary parties in actions to enforce such liens. Cornell v. Conine-Eaton Lumber Co. 9 Colo. App. 225, 47 Pac. 912.

In Kerrigan v. Fielding, 47 App. Div. 246, 62 N. Y. Supp. 115, where it appeared that an owner of land conveyed it by a deed absolute in form, but intended merely as security for debts owed to the grantee, the question arose as to whether a notice of lien by one subsequently engaged by the grantor to make improvements was sufficient when given to the grantor, or whether it should also have been given to the grantee; and the court held that the grantor was the owner of the property at the time of the contract for improvements, and that the notice of lien to him was sufficient.

Mesrs. Arthur H. Van Brunt, Joline, Larkin, & Rathbone, and Libby, Robinson, & Ives for appellee.

Brown, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants allege error in a decree of the circuit court to the effect that a mortgage, dated July 1, 1905, given by the Bodwell Water Power Company to the Central Trust Company of New York, to secure an issue of $1,000,000 of bonds, constitutes a first lien on the mortgaged property; and that liens for labor and materials claimed by the Allis-Chalmers Company, and by James B. Mullen's executors, respectively, are subject to the superior lien of the mortgage.

In order that a lien may attach for labor 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) and materials under chapter 93, § 29, Revised Statutes of Maine, they must be furnished "by virtue of a contract with, or by consent of, the owner."

The appellants contend that a mortgagee not in possession is an "owner" within the meaning of the statute, and that consent may be inferred from knowledge that the work is being done, coupled with the failure to give a written notice that the owner will not be responsible therefor, as provided in § 30 of chapter 93.

Upon these propositions the circuit court found against the appellants, and this is assigned as error.

The circuit court was of the opinion that "a mortgagee out of possession was not in equity, and in the state of Maine, in law, 'owner' of the property. The statute does not apply to him by its terms in using the word 'owner.' There is no just reason why it should be extended by construction to apply to him; and the supreme judicial court of Maine has never held directly that it does apply to him. If he takes possession of the property, receives its income, and directs its management, then, of course, he becomes an 'owner' both in equity and at the common law of Maine. Until he does all that, he holds in fact only a lien, as he would in name under the laws of the state of New York and the laws of other states. For all practical purposes, he is no more than the holder of a lien."

See Atwood v. Moose Head Paper & Pulp Co. 85 Me. 379, 27 Atl. 259.

The chief reliance of the appellants is Morse v. Dole, 73 Me. 351. A careful examination of this case shows that it does not decide, either directly or by implication, that a mortgagee is an "owner" under the statute. The expression quoted from the opinion—"At least the knowledge of the mortgagee must in some way appear before the written notice mentioned in Rev. Stat. chap. 91, § 28 (amended 1876, chap. 140), can be required from him in order to prevent a later claim from taking precedence of the mortgage"—is by no means a clear reference to a mortgagee as an owner. On the contrary, the words "at least" indicate an intention to reserve the question of how much more than mere knowledge of a mortgagee must be shown.

In Morse v. Dole there was no evidence that the mortgagee had any knowledge of the rendering of services or delivery of materials. The court held that, without knowledge, consent could not be implied. This rendered unnecessary any consideration of the question now before us.

It is urged "the court clearly proceeds upon the assumption that a mortgagee might subject his interest to a mechanics' lien if he consents to the furnishing of the labor or materials." If there is such an assumption, it has not the force of a decision of the state court which this court should regard as establishing the law of Maine. It is an assumption for the purposes of a particular case only; it is not a decision of the court upon the point involved, and it is not even a safe indication that it was the view of the learned judge who wrote the opinion that the law of Maine was established as to this point.

Another expression is called to our attention: "The lien can hold against such a mortgagee only in cases where he has become a party to the delivery of the materials, or to the work done, by consent, tacitly or expressly given."

This is by no means definite. It may be that a mortgagee who has become a party to the contract between owner and mechanic, or a guarantor thereof, or who has induced the mechanic or materialman to go on with the work, should be held to subject his own interest as mortgagee to a lien. This we are not called upon to decide. The expression last quoted is, after all, but dictum which indicates that under conditions indefinitely described as becoming "a party to the delivery of the materials, or to the work done," the statute might give a lien on the estate of a prior mortgagee out of possession.

We are of the opinion that the appellants have failed to establish the proposition that, under Morse v. Dole, or any other decision of the Maine court, it has been settled as the law of Maine that a mortgagee out of possession is an "owner" within the meaning of the statute. The examination of the history of § 29, in connection with Morse v. Dole, 73 Me. 351, 353, tends rather to the contrary conclusion. This question, therefore, must be considered as an open question, not concluded by the decisions of the Maine court, and not even discussed upon its merits in the Maine decisions. The brief of neither of the appellants suggests that their construction of the Maine statute is supported by other authority than the inconclusive Maine cases.

On the other hand, the brief for the Central Trust Company cites a number of cases to support its contention that, upon a proper construction of the words "consent of an owner," they are inapplicable to a mortgagee out of possession. Howard v. Robinson, 5 Cush. 119; Ettridge v. Bassett, 136 Mass. 314; Tompkins v. Horton, 25 N. J. Eq. 284; Cox v. Broderick, 4 E. D. Smith, 721; Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, §§ 67, 68; Otley v. Haviland, 36 Miss. 19; Reid v. Bank of Tennessee, 1 Sneed, 262; 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

McDowell v. Rockwood, 182 Mass. 150, 65 N. E. 65; Lummus, Law of Liens, § 260.

Upon the brief of the Allis-Chalmers Company are cited the following Maine decisions touching the meaning of the expression "by virtue of a contract with, or by consent of, the owner:" Norton v. Clark, 85 Me. 357, 27 Atl. 252; Shaw v. Young, 87 Me. 271, 32 Atl. 897; Farnham v. Richardson, 91 Me. 559, 40 Atl. 553; Baker v. Waldron, 92 Me. 17, 60 Am. St. Rep. 483, 42 Atl. 225; York v. Mathis, 103 Me. 67, 68 Atl. 746. These decisions show that the words "by consent of the owner" have given rise to much doubt and to much difficulty in their application, but do not support the proposition that a mortgagee out of possession is an owner.

While the expression would doubtless cover implied or quasi contracts between mechanic and owner, yet, from the opinion in York v. Mathis, 103 Me. 67, 76, 68 Atl. 746, quoting Huntley v. Holt, 58 Conn. 445, 9 L.R.A. 111, 20 Atl. 469, it would appear that "by consent of the owner" means something different from an agreement with the owner, not requiring such meeting of minds as would be essential to the making of a contract, but enough of a meeting of their minds to make it fairly apparent that they intended the same thing in the same sense.

It is said "that the conduct of the owner, viewed in the light of all the circumstances, should justify an expectation of a lien."

In Shaw v. Young, 87 Me. 271, 32 Atl. 897, it is said: "It seems to be assumed by the legislature that the owner of real estate will be vigilant in caring for it, either in person or by agents; that if he leaves it in the possession of agents or tenants, knowing that repairs are necessary to be made from time to time, and makes no provision for them, but leaves them to be made by agents or tenants, and gives no notice of dissent, his consent may be inferred so far as the lien claimants are concerned."

This reason seems entirely lacking in the ordinary case of a mortgagee out of possession. The mere knowledge of a mortgagee that a mortgagor is improving the property, as he has a right to do, makes him in no sense a party to the delivery of the materials or the work done (Morse v. Dole); and there can be no just assumption that, like the ordinary owner, a mortgagee out of possession will be vigilant in caring for it, either in person or by agents. Shaw v. Young. See also Hanson v. News Pub. Co. 97 Me. 99, 53 Atl. 990.

The cases of Shaw v. Young and Hanson v. News Pub. Co. supra, are very suggestive as to the meaning which the court attached to the word "owner," as implying at least a relation of immediate control substantially different from the relation of a mortgagee, who is concerned only with the security of the money lent upon the faith of the mortgage, and of his interest. To place upon the ordinary mortgagee a duty to acquire knowledge of the dealings of the mortgagor with the property, or the duty of warning laborers and materialmen that the mortgagee insists upon his rights under his mortgage, would be an innovation of doubtful wisdom. The record of a mortgage is the most practical means of notice of the mortgagee's intent to insist upon his security. To charge him with consent because he fails to give personal notice in writing, in addition to the notice afforded by record of his mortgage, is to unsettle the rights of mortgagees.

While statutes giving liens to laborers and to those who furnish materials are to be liberally construed, yet, in the absence of a clear expression of the legislature, the courts should not adopt, by a construction of doubtful language, a rule that would unsettle the rights of mortgagees, or impair their security. We concur in the view of the learned circuit judge that there is no just reason why the statute should be extended by construction to a mortgagee out of possession. One who contracts with the owner of land to furnish labor and materials, or one who, with his consent, furnishes materials, is assumed to know, if a mortgage is recorded, that the consent of the mortgagor as owner can give a lien only to the extent of the mortgagor's interest. Morse v. Dole. He has no reasonable ground for an expectation or belief that a mortgagee who has advanced money upon the security of the land or on the improvements to be made thereon is willing to forego this security, even if the money is advanced for the purpose of placing improvements upon the land.

Nor are the terms of the statute misleading. In ordinary usage the term "owner" is never applied to an ordinary mortgagee out of possession, and would not be so understood.

These appellants had no contract with the owner, and were well advised by the statute that their right to a lien was dependent, not upon express contract, but upon consent, of the owner.

Apparently the framers of the statute did not contemplate the impairment of the ordinary relation of mortgagor and mortgagee. The fact that the bonds were issued for the purpose of raising funds to improve the mortgaged property does not create an equitable estoppel against the mortgagee and bondholders to prevent them from claiming that their mortgage gives a prior lien. Dunham v. Cincinnati, P. & C. R. Co. 1 Wall. 254, 17 L. ed. 584; Thompson v. White Water Valley R. Co. 132 U. S. 69, 33 L. ed. 256, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 29; Porter v. Pittsburg Bessemer Steel Co. 120 U. S. 649, 30 L. ed. 830, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1206; Toledo, D. & B. R. Co. v. Hamilton, 134 U. S. 296, 33 L. ed. 905, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905; Jones, Liens, § 1458.

Whoever undertakes construction work upon property subject to a recorded mortgage must be assumed to have relied upon the personal responsibility of the other party to the contract, and upon such liens as the statute grants in definite terms, and not upon the expectation of displacing the priority of mortgage liens. The argument that there is some sort of superior equity in claims for work and materials over liens for money previously advanced upon mortgage is without merit, and the chancellor cannot apply such a principle either to displace vested liens or to broaden a lien statute by a construction which disregards absolutely the rights in a mortgage security. Kneeland v. American Loan Co. 136 U. S. 89, 97 et seq., 34 L. ed. 379, 383, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 950.

The next contention is that though the mortgage was recorded upon July 24, 1905, it was of no effect until the bonds were certified and issued, and that by reason of delay between the recording of the mortgage and the issue of bonds the Mullen lien attached prior to the lien of the mortgage. Before the record of the mortgage, however, the Bodwell Water Company and the Milford Construction Company had, by contract of July 19th, entered into a construction contract which provided inter alia for payment to the Milford Company of $700,000 of the mortgage bonds. On the same date, July 19th, the Milford Company accepted the offer of Farson, Leach, & Company to purchase the $700,000 of mortgage bonds at 90 per cent and interest. On July 28th the Milford Company voted to forward to the complainant for certification $500,000 of these bonds, at which time it had received from the Bodwell Company the entire mass of $700,000 of bonds.

In other words, the Bodwell Company, before any rights accrued to Mullen, had delivered $700,000 of bonds to the Milford Company in pursuance of the contract of July 19th.

The Mullen claimants attach great weight to the decision of the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit in Reynolds v. Manhattan Trust Co. 27 C. C. A. 620, 55 U. S. App. 96, 83 Fed. 593, wherein it was held that a recorded railroad mortgage was not superior to mechanics' liens that attached before any bonds were issued or any mortgage debt was created.

This case, however, does not afford us assistance in deciding whether, upon the facts above set forth, a mortgage debt was created to which the security of the mortgage attached at once. For the purposes of the present case, we need not consider the correctness of this decision, for it is limited to a state of facts where no bonds had been sold and no debt created, and does not discuss the question now before us. We are of the opinion that the record of the mortgage was notice to Mullen of all the substantial equities between the mortgagor and the construction company.

We agree with the learned circuit judge that, though lacking in formalities, the sale of the bonds was complete. As the Bodwell Company had parted with all interest in the entire issue of bonds, the trustee held the mortgage title, not as agent of the Bodwell Company, which by the sale had lost all right of revocation which would destroy the subject-matter of the contract, but as trustee for the security of the bonds.

We find no error in the decision of the circuit court that the mortgage lien attached prior to the earliest date at which it is claimed the Mullen lien took effect.

The deed of trust securing the payment of the bonds was an incident, and accessory to them. The transfer of the bonds carried with it to the transferees the benefit of the security. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Montgomery, 95 U. S. 16, 18, 24 L. ed. 346, 347.

It is contended that Farson, Leach, & Company are not bona fide purchasers because they did not make payment before the Mullen contract was made. It is urged that the fact that they had agreed to purchase is immaterial and does not give priority. Dresser v. Missouri & I. R. Constr. Co. 93 U. S. 92, 23 L. ed. 815; Little v. Lansing, 147 U. S. 59, 37 L. ed. 73, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254, are cited. In the first of these cases there was notice of fraud, which made it the duty of the purchaser to withhold further payment. In the second case the bonds were void, and notice given the purchaser before payment and while he might have repudiated the purchase.

But these cases are not in point. There was no invalidity in the subject-matter of the contract and no fraud. Neither was there any right in the Milford Construction Company or in Farson, Leach, & Company to repudiate their contracts.

At the time of the purchase of the bonds there was, of course, knowledge that construction work would be performed; but this affords no reason why a contract for a first lien on all the mortgage property should not be upheld. Here is no element of fraud, nor is there any element of inequity in the fact that the bondholders sought a lien that should precede all possible future liens. A valid obligation arose to pay for the bonds, and the subsequent fact that Mullen entered into a subcontract and began work afforded no ground for repudiating this obligation.

The claim of the Allis-Chalmers Company to priority rests upon its attempt to date its lien, not from the time it entered into its first contract with the Milford Construction Company, August 16, 1905, but from the date of the main contract between the Bodwell Water Power Company and the Milford Construction Company. It is urged that a lien claim relates back to the day when each contract for labor and materials was made, even though delivery of materials or performance of work is later. See Morse v. Dole, 73 Me. 351; Farnham v. Richardson, 91 Me. 559, 40 Atl. 553.

Whether the doctrine of these cases is here applicable is very doubtful. The Allis-Chalmers Company and Mullen had no contract with the owner, but subcontracts with the construction company. They must stand upon the provision which gives a lien for labor or materials furnished by consent of the owner. As pointed out in Norton v. Clark, 85 Me. 357, 27 Atl. 252, this is "alternative" to a contract with the owner.

If, as is urged, consent is to be inferred from knowledge that the work is being done, coupled with a failure to give the notice provided for in § 30, there is difficulty in carrying the date of the lien back to an earlier time than the beginning of work under the subcontract, unless, perhaps, it can be proved that express consent of the owner preceded and induced the making of a subcontract,—a point which we need not decide, for we may assume, for the purposes of this case only, that the right to a lien arose contemporaneously with the incurring of a obligation to furnish labor or materials.

The Allis-Chalmers Company incurred no such obligation until after the mortgage had completely attached, and all questions as to the formalities of the bond issue had disappeared.

That the original construction contract may be regarded as evidence of the consent of the Bodwell Water Power Company is established by Norton v. Clark, 85 Me. 357, 27 Atl. 252. But this decision is to the effect that the subcontractor is not entitled to his lien merely by substitution to the rights of the principal contractor, but that it arises from the performance of the work as a direct right under the statute,—a right which overrides a provision in the main contract that no lien should exist.

This seems inconsistent with the reasoning of the court in Glass v. Freeburg, 50 Minn. 386, 16 L.R.A. 335, 52 N. W. 900, relied upon by the Allis-Chalmers Company. In Massachusetts the words of a statute, "the contract under which the lien is claimed," were held to mean the contract of the party claiming the lien, and not the contract of a prior contractor for whom the claimant is working. Savoy v. Dudley, 168 Mass. 538, 47 N. E. 424; Batchelder v. Hutchinson, 161 Mass. 462, 37 N. E. 452; Bowen v. Phinney, 162 Mass. 593, 44 Am. St. Rep. 391, 39 N. E. 283; Friedman v. Hampden County, 204 Mass. 494, 504, 90 N. E. 851. Neither can the words of the statute, "by virtue of a contract with the owner," be so liberally interpreted as to cover everything done by virtue of subcontracts made with the builder or materialman who has the main contract with the owner. Were the reasoning of Glass v. Freeburg applied to this case, there would be a complete defense in the fact that the Milford Company had been paid in full. The doctrine of subrogation to the rights of an original contractor would not avail the claimant. Norton v. Clark goes only so far as to hold that the original contract may be evidence of consent.

If we apply the analogy of implied contracts or agreements, as was suggested in York v. Mathias, 103 Me. 67, 68, 68 Atl. 746, the earliest date for a lien is the date of action upon the owner's consent. We are of the opinion that both of these appellants entered into their subcontracts with notice of a recorded mortgage, which was a valid security for a debt existing before the date of the earliest subcontract. In point of time, the mortgage has priority over the liens claimed by these appellants. We are further of the opinion that, according to the natural and just interpretation of the Maine lien statute, it does not cut under the rights of a mortgagee out of possession, and that the construction of the statute for which the appellants contend is strained and unnatural.

The adoption of a construction which makes a mortgagee out of possession an "owner," and also subjects him to indefinite rules as to "consent of the owner," would ignore the substantial difference in the relation to the property of mortgagor in possession and mortgagee out of possession, and tend to unsettle the law as to the rights of mortgagees. We find nothing in the Maine decisions which supports the contention that such a result would be 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) equitable. We agree with the conclusion of the circuit court.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed, and the appellee recovers its costs of appeal.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

W. A. FISHER and Wife, Appts..

v.

ENRIQUE VILLAMIL et al.

(— Fla. —, 56 So. 559.)

Mortgage — mistake — reformation after foreclosure.

1. Where the owner of two lots of land intended to execute a mortgage upon a certain lot, but described therein a different lot, after foreclosure of the mortgage and a sale of the property described therein, a court of equity may cancel the master's deed to the property actually mortgaged, sold, and conveyed, and reform the mortgage, upon sufficient showing, so as to embrace the land intended to be mortgaged.

Same — rights of purchaser.

2. When a mortgage misdescribes the property intended to be mortgaged, the mistake may be corrected by a proper proceeding before judicial foreclosure; but if the mistake has been carried into a bill filed for the purpose of foreclosure of such mortgage, into the decree ordering foreclosure, into the advertisement, and into the deed, the purchaser at such foreclosure sale cannot maintain a bill in equity to correct the description of the land as contained in the mortgage, in the decree, and in the deed.

Headnotes by PARKHILL, J.

Note. — Reformation of mortgage after foreclosure.

The weight of authority appears to be with FISHER v. VILLAMIL, in holding that where a mistake in a mortgage has been carried through proceedings for foreclosure and sale, the proper method of relief is to reform the mortgage and permit it to be foreclosed as reformed, instead of reforming the judicial proceedings and the deed received under the foreclosure proceedings.

Reformation of judicial proceedings.

Some of the cases merely deny the right to correct the mistake in the mortgage and subsequent proceedings on foreclosure, without giving or pointing out any other relief.

Thus, in Dial v. Gambrel, 126 Ala. 551, 28 So. 1, it was held that a decree of foreclosure was final after the term, and that the mortgagee, who purchased the land at the foreclosure, could not have the sale set aside and the purchase money returned to him, although the mortgage was so errone-

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Hillsborough county in complainants' favor in a suit to reform a mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wall & McKay and H. P. Baya for appellants.

Messrs. Dozier A. De Vane and H. S. Hampton for appellees.

Parkhill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees filed their bill in equity, alleging that the defendants, Fisher and wife, desiring to obtain a loan of \$1,100 from complainants, at request of defendants, the complainants went with W. A. Fisher to what he alleged to be his dwelling house and improvements, and Fisher pointed out and ran the lines of the property which he alleged belonged to him, and which he desired to offer as security for said loan; that the property so pointed out were lots 1 to 8 and lot 13 of block 1 of East Nebraska Heights subdivision of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 7, Tp. 29 S. R. 19 E.; that, the defendants having title deeds to said property, complainants requested them to execute a mortgage showing the correct description of the property; that a mortgage was executed, the land being described therein as all of block 1 of Benjamin's third subdivision, as per plat recorded in Plat Book No. 2, p. 21, records of Hillsborough county, Florida; that the said mortgage was duly executed by de-ously drawn as to cover the land of the mortgagee, instead of that of the mortgagor.

And the reason upon which this class of cases is based is well stated in Stephenson v. Harris, 131 Ala. 470, 31 So. 445, where it was held that while a mistake in the description in a mortgage may be corrected before foreclosure, nevertheless, after the mistake has been carried through foreclosure proceedings, it cannot, after the term, be corrected in the mortgage, in the decree, in the sale and deed made by the register, and in the register's report of sale, as to do so "would result in giving to complainant a title by decree, to land that was not described in the bill to foreclose, not decreed to be sold, and not advertised and sold, nor conveyed by the register to him under the foreclosure decree."

And in Stewart v. Wilson, 141 Ala. 405, 10 Am. St. Rep. 33, 37 So. 550, it was held that no additional reason for allowing the description in the mortgage and foreclosure proceedings to be corrected so as to include and omitted was afforded by the fact that the register had included the disputed lands in his sale, as his power to sell was bounded by the decree.

In Miller v. Kolb, 47 Ind. 220, it was held that the description in a mortgage and subsequent proceedings on foreclosure could not be corrected after judicial foreclosure and sale, though the sheriff in making the sale pointed out the land actually intended to be sold.

In Angle v. Speer, 66 Ind. 488, the correction of a mistake in a mortgage after foreclosure was denied to a purchaser under the foreclosure, as against persons claiming by intermediate deed and mortgage by the same mortgagor.

And in Runnels v. Kaylor, 95 Ind. 503, reformation was denied to a subsequent purchaser under the foreclosure decree, though the mistake in the mortgage was discovered, and reformation asked and granted, at the time of foreclosure, but, through error of the clerk, the correction was not shown, and the erroneous description was carried into the decree.

In some cases, however, no objection is found to correcting a mistake which has been made in a mortgage and carried through foreclosure proceedings.

Thus, in Quivey v. Baker, 37 Cal. 465, it was held that a mistake made in a mortgage as to the description of the land, and carried through foreclosure into the sheriff's deed, would be corrected all the way through by a court of equity, the court saying in answer to the contention that such correction could not be made: "We have been referred to no authorities in support of this proposition, and, on principles of reason and justice, we do not perceive why a court of equity may not reform mistakes in judgments or decrees, in like manner as in written instruments. But it is said there was no mistake, either in the decree or sheriff's deed, which followed the description in the mortgage, and could not have done otherwise; and, consequently, there is no mistake to reform in either of them. As well might it be claimed that if there be a mistake in the first of a series of conveyances, which was carried out through all the subsequent conveyances, that the court could only correct the mistake in the first deed; and that, in fact, there was no mistake in the subsequent deeds, which were correctly copied from the first, as they were intended to be. But a court of equity does not administer justice on these narrow principles. It will not only go back to the original error and reform it, but will administer complete justice, by correcting all subsequent mistakes which grew out of, and were superinduced by, the first."

And in Busey v. Moraga, 130 Cal. 586, 62 Pac. 1081, Quivey v. Baker, is followed, and the court says that it will, after having reformed the mortgage and proceedings down to the sale, direct a new notice and sale if justice requires it.

In First Nat. Bank v. Wentworth, 28 Kan. 183, in sustaining the right, where the rights of innocent third parties have not intervened, to correct an erroneous description after foreclosure of the mortgage containing it, the court, in answering the objection that this would be overturning fendants on December 7, 1907, the consideration was paid to them, the mortgage was duly recorded in Mortgage Book 9, p. 225, records of said county; that, in addition to pointing out the said land, the defendants showed complainants the improvements thereon, consisting of a dwelling house, a barn, several outhouses, fruit trees, and assigned to complainants as additional security as insurance policy on said dwelling house; that thereafter, at maturity of the mortgage, the complainants demanded payment thereof, but payment was not made, and the mortgage was foreclosed, the property described therein was sold under a decree of foreclosure as block 1 of Benjamin's third subdivision, and the complainants bought the said property at the foreclosure sale for $800; that said defendants did not bid on same at said sale; that thereafter a deficiency decree was entered against defendants; that said Fisher thereupon complained to complainants that they were taking his home, that was worth the amount of the mortgage, whereupon complainants voluntarily agreed with Fisher and canceled the deficiency decree upon payment by Fisher of $325; that defendant Fisher led complainants to believe the mortgage they accepted embraced the lots pointed out by him, and which were lots 1 to 8 and lot 13 of East Nebraska Heights subdivision, and, relying upon the knowledge and good faith of the said defendants, complainants believed the land pointed out to them and intended to be mortgaged was all of block a judgment, says: "But a distinction must be recognized between the mere correction of a mistake and the setting aside of a judgment. Where it appears that a distinct question has been presented to the consideration of a court, its ruling had thereon, and that ruling passed into judgment, it is one thing for a party to apply thereafter to have that judgment set aside, and a different ruling made by the court upon that question; but it is an entirely different thing when a party avers that by some mistake the judgment which was entered does not in fact express the intention of the court in respect to its adjudication of the rights of the parties, or that by mistake a matter has been by the language of the decree apparently adjudicated by the court, to which its attention was not called, and upon which it did not intend to make any ruling."

In Parker v. Starr, 21 Neb. 680, 33 N. W. 424, although a mistake in description of mortgaged property was carried all through foreclosure and sale, a purchaser was held to be entitled to reformation, especially as it appeared that the property intended to be mortgaged was that actually appraised and sold, and that the purchaser had entered into possession.

This apparently was the rule in Florida until the cases of Greeley v. De Cottes, 24 Fla. 475, 5 So. 239 (where a mortgage containing an error in description, together with all subsequent proceedings, was corrected after foreclosure and purchase thereunder by the mortgagee, and numerous subsequent conveyances), and Peck v. Osteen, 37 Fla. 427, 20 So. 549 (where land not belonging to the mortgagor was included, and land intended to be included was omitted, and the mistake running through foreclosure proceedings was corrected), were overruled by FISHER v. VILLAMIL.

In German Mut. Ins. Co. v. Grim, 32 Ind. 249, 2 Am. Rep. 341, a complaint to correct a mistake made in the description of land and the name of the grantee, and carried into a mortgage and through foreclosure proceedings, was sustained. This case appears to have been in effect overruled by 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Miller v. Kolb, supra, although it is not mentioned in that case.

Reformation and new foreclosure.

The affirmative relief granted by the court in FISHER v. VILLAMIL, of reformation of the mortgage and foreclosure thereof as reformed, is that adopted by a majority of the cases.

Thus, in Horner v. Bramwell, 23 Colo. 238, 47 Pac. 462, where a trust deed intended to cover 400 acres belonging to the grantor, by mistake omitted 80 acres, and included another 80 acres not owned by him, and the mistake was not discovered until after sale by the trustee, it was held that the court should have made a decree setting aside the sale, reforming the trust deed, and directing the trustee to proceed to sell under the deed as reformed.

In Conyers v. Mericles, 75 Ind. 443, the earlier Indiana cases set out above, refusing to reform foreclosure proceedings, are distinguished, and it is held that under similar circumstances, while the foreclosure proceedings could not be corrected, the mortgage involved could be corrected and foreclosed under a bill drawn for that purpose, the court saying, in speaking of the earlier cases: "No one of these cases was an action to reform and foreclose the mortgage, nor was such question raised or decided. Each was an action to recover the land through such proceedings, and to make them available, it was sought to correct the mistakes. The appellant does not seek to recover the property, nor to correct the mistake in such foreclosure proceedings; but, ignoring such proceedings, he seeks to reform and foreclose his mortgage. This he may do unless its previous foreclosure prevents him. Such foreclosure was by the erroneous description—was, in fact, upon a different parcel of land, one that was not, in fact, mortgaged, nor intended to be mortgaged,—and was therefore a mere nullity. The mortgage, as reformed, is a different instrument, embraces a different parcel of land, and one against which no foreclosure has been had. The judgment of

1 of Benjamin's third subdivision, at the time complainants accepted the mortgage and made the loan; that after the cancellation of the deficiency decree, it was discovered that the mortgage did not embrace the lots pointed out by defendants as intended to be mortgaged, but embraced a different tract of land; that defendants knew at the time they pointed out said land that its correct description thereof was not block 1 of Benjamin's third subdivision, and they knew at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and at the time of the sale and the cancellation of the deficiency decree, that such was not the correct description, and they fraudulently concealed the same for the purpose of defrauding complainants; that said W. A. Fisher is now the owner of lots 1 to 8 and lot 13 of East Nebraska Heights subdivision, and said property is clear of encumbrance; that complainants tender to defendants a proper deed of conveyance of said block 1 of Benjamin's third subdivision, and allege that defendants should be required to convey to complainants the last-described lots in block 1 of East Nebraska Heights subdivision; that the lots actually mortgaged are worth about $300, for which complainants have paid $1,350, and the lots intended to be mortgaged are worth about the sum complainants have paid; that defendant Fisher has no property out of which a judgment for the value of the land sought hereby could be satisfied.

The bill prayed the court to order and de-foreclosure upon the land described did not adjudge that the land in dispute was not mortgaged by such instrument, and omitted therefrom by mistake, and therefore 'the question of description' is not res judicata, nor does such judgment form any obstacle to the reformation and foreclosure of the mortgage."

And in Jones v. Sweet, 77 Ind. 187, which was a suit to reform a mortgage as to an erroneous description and date, and to foreclose it as reformed, it was held that the fact that the erroneous mortgage had been foreclosed was no bar to the suit.

Sanders v. Farrell, 83 Ind. 28, follows Conyers v. Mericles, and holds that the erroneous mortgage was not so merged in the former decree of foreclosure as to forbid its reformation and foreclosure in this suit.

These cases are followed by Burkam v. Burk, 96 Ind. 270; and see also McCasland v. Etna L. Ins. Co. 108 Ind. 130, 9 N. E. 119.

In Armstrong v. Short, 95 Ind. 326, it is held that the remedy adopted in Conyers v. Mericles applies only when the mistake was one of fact merely, and not if the description was as intended, but insufficient in law.

And in Ray v. Ferrell, 127 Ind. 570, 27 N. E. 159, the right to reform and foreclose a mortgage was again recognized, but it was further held that, inasmuch as the land actually covered by the erroneous description was sold under the foreclosure for the full amount of the judgment, the mortgage was extinguished and there was nothing to reform.

In Carrigg v. Mechanics' Bank, 136 Iowa, 281, 111 N. W. 329, it is held that if it be necessary to correct a mortgage to make a sheriff's deed given on foreclosure cover land omitted from the mortgage by mistake, then there must be another foreclosure and sale.

In Davenport v. Sovil, 6 Ohio St. 459, where, by mistake, a total misdescription of the property intended to be mortgaged was carried through foreclosure and sale, it was held that the purchaser was entitled to have the mortgage reformed and foreclosed as reformed.

203, a former decree, reported in 23 Utah, 152, 63 Pac. 897, in which reformation of an erroneous description was corrected in the mortgage and all subsequent proceedings, was modified so as to require foreclosure of the mortgage as reformed, because, while plaintiff, who bid in the property, believed that the property described was that actually intended to be mortgaged, it did not appear that others might not have bid higher had the description been correct.

Other remedies.

In Waldron v. Letson, 15 N. J. Eq. 126, where, through error in the description in a mortgage, the purchaser on foreclosure did not receive conveyance of all the land supposed to be included in the mortgage, although he paid the full price and was put into possession of the whole, relief was granted by restraining the mortgagor's devisee from proceeding at law, and requiring him to release his title in the premises to complainant.

But in Schwickerath v. Cooksey, 53 Mo. 75, a petition by a purchaser under foreclosure, to have the title to property erroneously omitted from the mortgage, divested out of defendants and vested in himself, was denied.

Foreclosure under power of sale.

Where the foreclosure of a mortgage containing an error was under a power of sale, the objection to correction of the mortgage and deed because of an intervening judicial foreclosure does not apply, and in Lester v. Johnston, 137 Ala. 194, 33 So. 880, and Greer v. Watson, 170 Ala. 334, 54 So. 487, reformation of the description contained in a mortgage and deed given in foreclosure under power of sale was permitted.

But in Haley v. Bagley, 37 Mo. 363, reformation of a mistake in the description contained in a mortgage was denied to a purchaser at a sale under a power contained in the mortgage, on the ground that he bought at his peril.

cree the land intended to be included in the mortgage to be lots 1 to 8 and lot 13 of block 1 of East Nebraska Heights subdivision, and defendants to convey to complainants the said land upon execution by complainants of a deed conveying all of block 1 of Benjamin's subdivision, and, in event defendants fail so to do, the complainants be decreed to hold all right, title, interest, and claim of said defendants to said land. There was a prayer also for general relief.

The defendants filed an answer.

Testimony was taken and a final decree was entered as follows:

"The above-entitled cause coming on this day for hearing upon the pleadings and the master's report, and the court having heard argument of counsel, and considered the record and the testimony, and being advised that it has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter of this cause, and the court being of opinion that whether it was the intention of the defendants at the time the mortgage mentioned in the bill of complaint was made, to include in said mortgage the property which the complainants claim should have been included therein, to wit: Lots one (1) to eight (8) and lot thirteen (13) of block one (1) of East Nebraska Heights subdivision of the east half of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section seven (7), in township twenty-nine (29) south, range nineteen (19) east, or whether it was the intention of the said defendants at the time the said mortgage was made, to give to the complainants a mortgage upon the property actually described in the said mortgage, and mislead and deceive the complainants into accepting the mortgage upon the property last mentioned, under the belief that they were obtaining a mortgage upon the property hereinabove particularly described, or whether it was the intention of all the parties that said mortgage should describe the lands hereinabove particularly described, but was made to describe other lands through mutual mistake, makes no difference in a court of equity, for the reason that the defendant

W. A. Fisher should not be permitted in this court to take advantage of his own wrong.

"It is thereupon, upon consideration thereof, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants, within five days from the date hereof, pay or cause to be paid to the complainants the amount of the decree mentioned in the bill of complaint, with attorneys' fees and costs therein mentioned, and with interest upon the total of said sums, less the sum of three hundred and twenty-five ($325) dollars paid by the defendant W. A. Fisher to the complainants, as alleged in the bill of complaint; and that upon failure to make the said payment within the time fixed as aforesaid, the said W. A. Fisher and L. M. Fisher, his wife, and all persons claiming by, through, or under them subsequent to the commencement of this suit, are hereby barred and forever foreclosed of all right, title, and equity of redemption or interest whatsoever in and to the lands hereinabove particularly described.

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that in the event the said defendants fail to pay to the complainants the amount of money adjudged to them in the preceding paragraph, within the time aforesaid, the final decree of foreclosure in the cause mentioned in the bill of complaint, wherein E. Villamil and J. B. Jackson were complainants, and W. A. Fisher and L. M. Fisher, his wife, were defendants, as recorded in Book 13, page 294, minutes of this court, be corrected and reformed, and the master's deed, made and executed on the 3d day of November, A. D. 1908, by W. T. Martin, master, to the complainants in this cause, and recorded in Deed Book 102, page 7, records of Hillsborough county, Florida, and the mortgage described in the bill of complaint herein made by the defendants to the complainants, and as recorded in the records of Hillsborough county, Florida, in Mortgage Book 19, page 225, and all proceedings in said foreclosure suit above described, be and they are hereby reformed and corrected as to the description of the property

Effect of reformation on right to redeem.

In Blodgett v. Hobart, 18 Vt. 414, a mortgage which omitted part of the property intended to be described was reformed after foreclosure and sale, and the mortgagor was given an opportunity to redeem the whole premises, the court saying that it would not do to create a mortgage and foreclose the equity of redemption at one and the same time.

In Provost v. Rehman, 21 Iowa. 419, the court recognizes a right on the part of a mortgagee to have a mortgage reformed after foreclosure, so as to supply an omission in the description, and that such reformation might revive the mortgagor's right to redeem.

But McKissick v. Mill Owners' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 50 Iowa, 116, holds that the correction of a misdescription in a mortgage after foreclosure does not revive the right to redeem, distinguishing Provost v. Rehman, on the ground that, in the latter, property not actually described in the mortgage was inserted by the reformation, while, in the present case, the property was included, but erroneously described.

mentioned therein as the mortgaged premises, as that the same shall read as follows: Lots one (1) to eight(8) and lot thirteen (13) of block one (1) of East Nebraska Heights subdivision of the east half of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section seven (7); township twenty-nine (29) south, range nineteen (19) east.

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that within five (5) days from this date, the complainants do make, execute, and deliver to the defendants a deed conveying the interest of said complainants to said defendants in the following lands situate in Hillsborough county, Florida, to wit: Block one (1) of Benjamin's third subdivision, according to the plat thereof as recorded in the public records of Hillsborough county, Florida; and upon the failure of said complainants to make, execute, and deliver the said deed, then and in that event this decree shall operate as a conveyance of said real estate from the complainants to the defendants, and that the said complainants and all persons claiming by, through, or under them subsequent to the commencement of this suit, be and they hereby are forever barred and foreclosed of all right, title, and interest whatsoever in and to the said last-mentioned lands."

Assuming that the testimony in this cause would authorize a reformation of the mortgage given by the defendants to the complainants, on the ground of mistake or fraud, we think the chancellor erred in decreeing a reformation of the decree of foreclosure and the deed executed by the master in pursuance of the foreclosure proceedings, and in decreeing that the defendants pay the amount stated in the decree, and that, upon failure so to do, the defendants be debarred and forever foreclosed of all right and title and equity of redemption in and to certain described lots of land in East Nebraska Heights subdivision, which land was not included in the mortgage foreclosed, and had not been ordered to be sold, and was not in fact sold or conveyed to the complainants.

As the court very clearly pointed out in Marks v. Taylor, 23 Utah, 470, 65 Pac. 203, the decree of the chancellor, if affirmed by this court, would invest the complainants with the title to property which was neither ordered to be sold, advertised, or offered for sale, or sold by the master to them. It may be true that the complainants thought the property intended to be mortgaged was the property offered for sale, and evidently bid in the property with that understanding; but it does not appear that other bidders, if any other were present at the sale, had the same understanding. The property intended to be mortgaged was not offered for sale, but another, and a much less valuable, parcel of land covered by the mortgage, was offered for sale and sold. If the more valuable property intended to be mortgaged had been offered for sale by the master, it is not improbable that a higher bid than the complainants' bid would have been made by some other person. But, be that as it may, the people of this state have declared in their Constitution that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law. Even though the defendants may have intended to mortgage the land in East Nebraska Heights subdivision, the giving of a mortgage does not vest the legal estate in the mortgagee. A mortgage cannot be a present conveyance of the legal title; however, it may become so by breach of conditions and the action of the courts. The title is transferred, as we said in McMahon v. Russell, 17 Fla. 698, in pursuance of the contract embraced in the mortgage, by a judicial sale decreed for the enforcement of the specific lien. Also see Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wang, 61 Fla. 299, 55 So. 73. The mortgagor remains, until a sale, seised in fee. There has never been a decree for the enforcement of the lien on the property in East Nebraska Heights subdivision, nor a judicial sale thereof.

Undoubtedly the mortgage, upon sufficient showing, may be reformed so as to embrace the land in East Nebraska Heights subdivision, instead of the land in Benjamin's third subdivision, and the mortgage as reformed may be foreclosed. The master's deed to the property that was actually embraced in the mortgage and sold and conveyed to the complainants may be canceled. Thus, the parties will be placed in the position they should occupy, if the facts and the law justify. But, where the incorrect description of the lands intended to be embraced in the mortgage, or, in other words, the wrong land, has been carried into the mortgage, the decree, notice of sale, and master's deed, such proceedings may not be corrected, as is attempted to be done here.

The question involved here has been considered by the courts many times. In a note by Mr. Freeman, in Stewart v. Wilson, 109 Am. St. Rep. 33, text 36, he says the cases are in hopeless conflict on this question. "Perhaps the better rule," says Mr. Freeman, "is that maintained by the cases which decide that such conveyances cannot be reformed in equity. . . . The majority of the cases maintain that when a mortgage misdescribes the property intended to be mortgaged, the mistake may be corrected by a proper proceeding before judicial foreclosure; but if the mistake has been carried into a bill filed for the purpose of foreclosing such mortgage, into the decree ordering foreclosure, into the advertisement, and into the deed, the purchaser at such foreclosure sale cannot maintain a bill in equity to correct the description of the land as contained in the mortgage, in the decree, and in the deed. Stephenson v. Harris, 131 Ala. 470, 31 So. 445; Rogers v. Abbott, 37 Ind. 138; Miller v. Kolb, 47 Ind. 220; Angle v. Speer, 66 Ind. 488; Conyers v. Mericles, 75 Ind. 443; Davenport v. Sovil, 6 Ohio St. 459."

In Stephenson v. Harris, 131 Ala. 470, 31 So. 445, the court said: "In the case in hand, if the relief prayed were granted, it would result in giving to complainant a title by decree to land that was not described in the bill to foreclose, not decreed to be sold, and not advertised and sold, nor conveyed by the register to him under the foreclosure decree. That part of it which was sold under the decree was, no doubt, well sold, and may have been of comparatively small value to that not sold, and which complainant now proposes to take under a decree to be herein rendered. To do this, amendment and reformation from the beginning of the case under which the decree of foreclosure was entered would have to be made, in the bill, mortgage, decree, sale, conveyance, and confirmation of the decree. The judicial sale cuts this all off from the power of the court to deal with in this case."

We are not unmindful of the decisions by this court in Greeley v. De Cottes, 24 Fla. 475, 5 So. 239, and Peck v. Osteen, 37 Fla. 427, 20 So. 549. We think these cases differ in the facts from the instant case; but, if the rule there announced differs from the views we express here, we do not approve it. As the decree must be reversed, and we do not know what facts may develop, or what questions may present themselves in the proceedings to reform the mortgage, we will content ourselves with what we have said.

The decree is reversed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF LOUISIANA, Appt.,

v.

N. K. PARRISH.

('129 La. 547, 56 So. 503.)

Perjury — unnecessary oath.

To falsely make oath before a notary public in order to obtain a saloon license is not perjury, when the law governing the issuance of such licenses does not require such an oath. An oath must be administered in accordance with the law before perjury can be charged.

(November 13, 1911.)

Headnote by BREAUX, Ch. J.

Note. — Perjury: false swearing where no oath, or the particular one administered, was not required, as perjury.

This note does not cover cases where there was merely an irregularity in administering the oath, such, for example, as People v. Parent, 139 Cal. 600, 73 Pac. 423, holding that the omission of the words "so help you God" constituted no defense to a prosecution for perjury, nor cases in which the defense set up was that the particular officer who administered the oath was not empowered to do so. (As to sufficiency of averment in indictment as to jurisdiction or authority to administer oath, see note in 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 142.)

It is a general rule that perjury cannot be predicated of an oath which is not required by law. United States v. Dupont, 176 Fed. 823; Foreman v. Union & A. Co. 83 Hun, 385, 31 N. Y. Supp. 947; State v. Wyatt, 3 N. C. (2 Hayw.) 56; People v. Fox, 25 Mich. 492.

In the last case the information charging perjury did not show that the affidavit alleged to be false was made for any authorized purpose. The court said: "Perjury is committed 'when a lawful oath is administered by any that hath authority, to any person in any judicial proceeding, who sweareth absolutely and falsely in any matter material to the issue or cause in question.' 3 Co. Inst. 164; 4 Bl. Com. 137. There must be an oath authorized by law, an issue or cause to which facts were material, and a false statement regarding such facts upon such issue, or in such cause. Such would be the case at the common law; and if it be claimed that this is statutory perjury, the information is not aided, for, by the statute, it must appear that the oath is one required or authorized by law (Comp. Laws, 1857, § 5821); and this will not appear unless the purpose for which the affidavit was made is shown. Perjury, therefore, is not well assigned, whether it be at the common law or by statute."

The general rule that perjury cannot be predicated of an oath not required by law was applied in the following cases in which APPPEAL by the State from an order of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Acadia, quashing an indictment charging defendant with perjury. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. A. Gondran, with Mr. Walter Gulon, Attorney General, and Mr. John J. Robira, for the State.

Messrs. Story & Pugh, for appellee:

An oath lawfully taken is the essential thing to be charged in an indictment for perjury, and in case perjury is assigned on a nonjudicial oath, it is insufficient to maintain a prosecution, if the person who administered the oath was not legally authorized to administer that particular oath.

State v. Theriot, 50 La. Ann. 1187, 24 So. 179; State v. Dreifus, 38 La. Ann. 877;

it was held that perjury could not be based upon:

—an oath verifying a bill in equity which was not required to be verified by oath. People v. Gaige, 26 Mich. 30; Silver v. State, 17 Ohio, 365;

—an oath by an officer of a corporation to an answer filed by the corporation to a bill in equity, where the answer was not required to be sworn to. Beecher v. Anderson, 45 Mich. 543, 8 N. W. 539;

—an oath to exceptions to the sufficiency of bail in error which were not required to be sworn to. Linn v. Com. 96 Pa. 285;

—a voluntary affidavit made at the request of fire insurance adjusters, as to the correctness of the books of the insured and the amount of stock on hand at the time of the fire. Metzger v. Manchester Fire Assur. Co. 102 Mich. 334, 63 N. W. 650;

—an unauthorized oath as to competency of applicants for marriage licenses. Com. v. Williamson, 4 Gratt. 554; State v. Theriot, 50 La. Ann. 1187, 24 So. 179;

—an affidavit of an applicant for naturalization, relative to his previous residence, as to which the act expressly excluded his oath. State v. Helle, 2 Hill, L. 290;

—an affidavit of one making application to commute his homestead entry to a cash entry, referring to his residence, and containing statements not required or authorized to be made. United States v. Howard, 37 Fed. 666;

—an oath by a pre-emptionist which did not contain what was required by statute, but contained matter not required to be sworn to. United States v. Bedgood, 40 Fed. 54;

—an oath to proof for obtaining the fishing bounty, which was not required to be made under oath. United States v. Nicholson, 3 Woods, 215, Fed. Cas. No. 15,877;

—an unauthorized affidavit made to an account, to prepare it for a set-off or a trial. Waggoner v. Richmond, Wright (Ohio) 173.

—an unauthorized oath by a person concerning the qualifications of a voter. Com. v. Polluck, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 559;

—a voluntary oath to a protest taken before a notary public as part of the proofs in a case of marine loss. People v. Travis, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 213;

State v. Wymberly, 40 La. Ann. 460, 4 So. 161; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, 9th ed. § 1269.

Breaux, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment charged the defendant with having appeared on the 16th day of December, 1910, before a notary public, and taken the oath to answer the following question:

"Q. Have you ever been charged with violating any of the laws of the state or municipality?"

To which he answered:

"No."

It was further charged in the indictment that twice before the date he took the oath he had been tried and sentenced in the par-fore a notary public as part of the proofs in a case of marine loss. People v. Travis, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 213;

—a voluntary affidavit concerning a wager, made before a justice of the peace before whom no cause was pending. Shaffer v. Kintzer, 1 Binn. 37, 2 Am. Dec. 488;

—a voluntary oath taken in a matter verbally submitted to arbitrators. Mahan v. Berry, 5 Mo. 21;

—a memorandum of a surety's property, made under his justification and affidavit. Klug v. McPhee, 16 Colo. App. 39, 63 Pac. 709;

—an oath to an account, authorized under an act permitting a party to prove his own accounts by oath or affirmation, where the account did not show that it was made within a specified time after the first article charged, as required by the act. Warner v. Fowler, 8 Md. 25.

And where a statute requires an affidavit of one becoming a qualified elector after the completion of registration to state the facts showing his qualification and disqualification, perjury cannot be assigned on an affidavit which fails to state the facts, but states merely that he was not, at the time of registration, a qualified elector, but became such subsequently. State v. Lloyd, 77 Wis. 630, 46 N. W. 898.

And under the statutes regulating the crime of perjury and false swearing, it is generally held that an offense cannot be predicated upon an oath not required or authorized by law.

Thus, under a statute making it punishable as perjury wilfully to swear or affirm falsely in regard to any material matter respecting which such oath or affirmation "is authorized or required," one who swears falsely to a bond and oath as to the value of his property, to induce the county treasurer to deposit in a certain bank, cannot be convicted of perjury, where no such bond or oath is authorized or required by law. Collins v. State, 33 Fla. 446, 15 So. 220. The court said: "One of the vital essentials of the crime, to be alleged and made out under this section of the statute, is, that the oath charged to have been falsely taken ish of Caddo for selling liquor without a license. The indictment charged that the oath taken was "corrupt perjury." (We use the words of the indictment.)

The record in the case before us for decision discloses that the defendant addressed a petition to the mayor and board of aldermen of the city of Crowley, applying for a permit to conduct a barroom within the limits of that city, and the oath in question was taken in connection with the application for the permit, and in support of the petition.

A petition is required by act 176, § 8, of 1908, known as the "Gay-Shattuck law."

must be such an oath as is authorized or required by law to be taken under the circumstances by which it is surrounded when taken. The indictment here, though it alleges that the oath it charges to have been falsely taken was authorized and required by law to be taken, shows upon its face, as matter of law, that such oath was not in fact either authorized or required by any law to be taken for the purposes and under the circumstances set forth in the indictment."

In Territory v. Weller, 2 N. M. 470, where the statute punished as perjury false swearing in cases where an oath was required, the lower court held that an oath was not required of sureties on appeal, and that therefore perjury could not be predicated upon such an oath; but, on appeal, the case was reversed on the ground that an oath was required of such sureties.

It is not false swearing within the meaning of a statute punishing false swearing in matters as to which an oath is required by the laws of the United States for one who has served as a witness to make a false oath as to the distance traveled by him, where no such oath was required by law. United States v. Babcock, 4 McLean, 113, Fed. Cas. No. 14,488.

And where the statute regulating applications for patents does not require the applicant to swear that he is the "sole" inventor, and the statute punishes as perjury false swearing in matters as to which the laws of the United States require an oath, one who makes a false oath that he is the "sole" inventor cannot be convicted of perjury, although a departmental order authorized such an oath. Patterson v. United States, 104 C. C. A. 434, 181 Fed. 970.

So, where the laws of the United States did not require an affidavit as to the non-mineral character of the land upon which a homestead was taken, it was held that one making a false oath as to such fact could not be convicted of perjury under a statute punishing as perjury the taking of false oaths in cases where the law authorized an oath to be administered, although, by a departmental regulation, such oath was required. United States v. Maid, 116 Fed. 650.

The defendant filed a motion to quash the indictment. The motion was sustained by the district court, and the indictment quashed. The state appealed, to the end of having the indictment declared legal and the case reinstated for prosecution.

The license required of retail liquor dealers may be obtained without the necessity of such a broad and sweeping oath as that required of defendant to obtain a permit.

Section 8 of the act reads: "This petition must be accompanied by the affidavit of two reputable citizens of this state, domiciled at the place where such applicant desires to locate his establishment, vouch-

And in United States v. Lamson, 165 Fed. 80, it was held that perjury could not be predicated under such statute upon an oath by a dealer in oleomargarin as to names of customers, goods sold, etc., since such an oath was not required by the laws of the United States, or by any regulation having the force of law.

And under a statute punishing as perjury false swearing in proceedings where an oath is required by law, or in which an oath may lawfully be administered, an oath to an application for a loan, taken before a justice of the peace, which it not required by law, cannot be made the basis of a charge of perjury. State v. McCarthy, 41 Minn. 59, 42 N. W. 599.

And where an act provided that to make a case of perjury the oath or affidavit must be made or taken under or by virtue of the law relating to the naturalization of aliens, perjury cannot be based upon an oath as to the applicant's residence, which is not required by such law. United States v. Grottkau, 30 Fed. 672.

And under a statute providing that a person is guilty of perjury who testifies falsely upon an oath legally administered in any proceeding before a public officer, or on an oath prescribed by any law of the state, one is not guilty of perjury if he swears falsely as to the parents' consent to a marriage, where no such oath was authorized by the statute. State v. Carpenter, 164 Mo. 588, 65 S. W. 255.

And such a case is not within the provisions of another statute providing that one who wilfully makes "any false certificate, affidavit, or statement of any nature, for any purpose," before any officer authorized to administer oaths, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, since such statute only covers instruments in writing. Ibid.

And a voluntary oath falsely made for the purpose of influencing a stockholder in the payment of a gambling wager is not punishable under a statute applying to corrupt oaths "for any purpose," since such an oath is neither authorized nor required by law, but is one made in furtherance of an illegal transaction. State v. Miller, 44 Mo. App. 159.

So, where a statute provides that one who takes a lawful oath or affirmation in any ing for the truth of all the allegations contained in applicant's petition, as herein specified."

No law prescribes the taking of such an oath. It follows there was no perjury. State v. Wymberly, 40 La. Ann. 460, 4 So. 161. Perjury is the crime expressly charged. No power is granted to any officer to administer such an oath. Whatever may be the oath required of the applicants for permits, they do not include the oath that one has not violated any law of the state or of a municipality. In order to hold that the lawmaker intended that such an oath should be taken, the intention must clearly appear. The oath must be administered in accordance with the law in order that perjury may be charged. Rev. Stat. § 857. One may violate a municipal ordinance, and yet not be guilty. He may even violate some public statutes, without thereby committing a felony or a misdemeanor which disqualifies him from opening a liquor saloon. Such is the conclusion at which we have arrived.

We are of opinion that the question was properly decided below.

For reasons assigned, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

matter in which, by law, an oath or affirmation may be required, shall be guilty of perjury if he wilfully swears falsely, one who makes an affidavit such as required where a prosecution for bastardy is commenced is not guilty of perjury where it is not required unless such proceeding is commenced, and it does not appear that such a proceeding was instituted. Smith v. State, 125 Ind. 440, 25 N. E. 598.

And where a statute provides that "if any person of whom an oath shall be required by law shall wilfully swear falsely in regard to any matter or thing respecting which such oath is authorized or required, such person shall be deemed guilty of perjury," perjury cannot be predicated upon sworn statements of one subpoenaed to appear before a justice of the peace before whom no complaint had been made concerning the offense to which they related. People v. Titmus, 102 Mich. 318, 60 N. W. 693.

And where it does not appear from the indictment that the sale of whisky was a public offense, one cannot be legally sworn to testify concerning a supposed sale, and cannot therefore be convicted under a statute punishing false swearing in a matter in which one can be legally sworn, or on which he is required to be sworn. Kerfoot v. Com. 89 Ky. 174, 12 S. W. 189.

But in Com. v. Turner, 98 Ky. 526, 33 S. W. 88, it was held that it was not necessary under the latter provision that the subject on which the witness swears falsely should be one on which he could legally be sworn, but that it was sufficient that he was required to be sworn; and it was held that the fact that the witness was required to testify as to matters which might incriminate him would not exempt him from punishment for false swearing. The court said: "The penalty attaches to false swearing on any subject 'on which he is required to be sworn,' and there is no denial that the witness was, in this case, required by the court, in the exercise of its judgment, to be sworn. Nor does this mean simply on a subject on which he is required by law, or legally required, to be sworn. The sentence immediately preceding this provides expressly for those cases 'in which he can legally be sworn,' and the fact that it is immediately followed by this other sentence, in the disjunctive, 'or on which he is required to be sworn,' shows clearly, as we think, a purpose on the part of the lawmakers to provide for two different and distinct states of case. One of these relates to subjects only 'in which he can legally be sworn,' while the other relates to those 'on which he may be required to be sworn.' To give any effect whatever to this latter clause it must be construed to cover a class of cases not embraced by the former clause, and this, in our opinion, is the true construction.

"In this case appellee was 'required to be sworn' by the court in which he was testifying as a witness, and, having recognized the authority of the court to require it, and having sworn on this subject, he was liable to the penalty prescribed by the statute if he swore falsely."

And where a statute provides that "every person who shall wilfully, corruptly, and falsely, before any officer authorized to administer oaths, under oath or affirmation, voluntarily make any false certificate, affidavit, or statement of any nature, for any purpose, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," one may be convicted for making a voluntary false affidavit before an authorized officer, for use at an investigation, stating that a certain person had attempted to persuade him to be corruptly influenced in respect to a public office. State v. Boland, 12 Mo. App. 74.

And where a statute punishes as perjury false statements to which an oath is required by law, and punishes as false swearing the making of false statements under a voluntary oath legally administered, one may be convicted of false swearing for taking a false oath as to the age of an applicant for a marriage license, although such an oath is not required by law. Davidson v. State, 22 Tex. App. 372, 3 S. W. 662.

And under such statute a statement made under oath after the accused had waived examination may form a basis for a prosecution for false swearing, but not for perjury, where only a voluntary unsworn statement is authorized. Biard v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 440, 113 S. W. 275.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MARY A. THARP

v.

C. E. JAMISON, Sheriff, et al., Appts.

(— Iowa, —, 134 N. W. 583.)

Evidence — burden of proof — alteration of instruments.

1. One seeking to avoid the effect of a deed because of an alleged alteration has the burden of showing that it was made after delivery.

Same — copy of signature — effect.

2. That an impression of the name of the grantee indorsed on the back of a deed, from which an initial had been erased, which was accidentally made upon a blank space on the paper, by exposure to the weather, soon after the deed was delivered, shows the initial to be missing, is strong corroborative evidence that the erasure was made before delivery.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court for Van Buren County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to set aside a sheriff's sale, and to enjoin the issuance of the sheriff's deed thereunder to certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

Suit in equity against a sheriff and an execution plaintiff to set aside a sheriff's sale, and to enjoin the issuance of the sheriff's deed thereunder to certain real estate. The

2. Presumption against instrument, 107.

3. No presumption, 112.

b. Special circumstances and cases.

2. Act of public officer, 114.

3. Alteration immaterial to issue, 115.

III. Alteration not apparent on face of instrument, 115.

I. Introduction and general principles.

This note does not include cases of alterations in wills; the burden of explaining erasures or alterations appearing on the face of a will being discussed in the note to Scott v. Thrall, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 184.

And see discussion of question of presumption as to alteration of typewritten instrument made in duplicate, in note to Stromberg-Carlson Teleph. Mfg. Co. v. Barber, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 680.

This note does not go into the question as to what constitutes a material alteration, nor as to the effect upon the instrument of such an alteration when proved.

There are several different rules entirely inconsistent with each other, as will appear below. These opposing rules are in part grounded upon broad principles of reason, and in so far as that is true, the conflict is real and natural, but it seems that in many cases the conflict is more apparent than real, because of different interpretations of terms and different assumptions underlying the decisions.

Thus, as will be seen, the courts generally agree that a "suspicious" alteration casts the burden of explanation upon the holder of the instrument or the one claiming under it, but they do not agree as to what a suspicious alteration is, some courts going upon the theory that every apparent alteration is calculated to arouse suspicion, and others requiring peculiar circumstances of suspicion patent upon the face of the instrument; and this requirement leads off into a maze of ramifications incapable of classification. See McCormick v. Fitzmorris, 39 Mo. 24.

In McKenzie v. Barrett, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 451, 98 S. W. 229, it was said that the rule that if no suspicion is aroused by the alteration, the presumption will be that it was made prior to or contemporaneous with the execution of the instrument, modifies the general rule that an alteration apparent upon the face of an instrument must be explained by the party offering the same in evidence.

Again, some confusion arises from the fact that in speaking of a "presumption," some courts mean a presumption of law and others mean a presumption of fact, and they do not always make clear which is meant. When the presumption is one of law, that the alteration was subsequent to the execution of the instrument, it is held that the party producing the paper must explain the apparent alteration before it can be given to the jury, the court assuming to decide upon inspection of the instrument, that it is prima facie invalid. Other authorities, not admitting such a presumption of law, have held that the instrument should be given in evidence to the jury for their inspection, leaving both parties to offer such evidence as they may think proper touching the alteration; and these authorities are again divided upon the question whether it is prima facie valid or void, that is, whether the presumption of fact is that the alteration was made before or after execution, and consequently putting the burden of proof, at least in the sense of going forward with the evidence, sometimes upon one party and sometimes upon the other, to convince the jury by a preponderance of evidence.

plaintiff alleged that she was the owner of such real estate, whereas it was levied upon by the sheriff as the property of her husband under an execution against him. There was a decree for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal.

Messrs. Walker & McBeth for appellants.

Messrs. Robert Sloan, H. B. Sloan, and J. C. Calhoun, for appellee:

An alteration apparent on the face of the writing raises no presumption that it was made after delivery and without authority, and the burden of proof is upon the defendant to prove that the alterations were made after delivery and without authority.

But, perhaps, the greatest confusion arises from the loose or careless use of the term "burden of proof." While certain presumptions of fact may arise during the trial of a case, these presumptions do not ordinarily change the burden of proof in the sense of the necessity of establishing the point by a preponderance of evidence. It still remains as in the beginning, upon him who has the affirmative of the issue. The burden of proof in this sense does not change, but the weight of evidence may, according to the nature and strength of the proofs offered on the trial, assisted by the presumptions arising therefrom.

To illustrate: If the court takes the view that the presumption is that the alteration was made before delivery of the instrument, it is apt to add, as if it were a mere corollary or complementary proposition, that the burden of proving that it was made after delivery rests on the other party. Strictly, however, the burden of proof, at least in the sense of the necessity of proving the point by a preponderance of evidence, as distinguished from the burden of proof in the sense of the necessity of going forward with the evidence, rests upon the party having the affirmative of the issue, and is not shifted by the indulgence of a presumption in his favor, although it may relieve him in the first instance of the necessity of producing evidence to sustain his point. For another phase of the distinction between presumption and burden of proof, see note in 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 527, in relation of doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to burden of proof.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the rules and the generally recognized exceptions, note will here be made of several distinctions suggested in various cases as affecting the rules, but not generally accepted or followed. It has been thought that the presumption or burden of proof might be affected by the question whether the alteration is beneficial to the maker of the instrument or otherwise; whether it is in the same ink and handwriting or different; whether it is noted in the attestation clause or at the foot of the instrument or not; 16 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controversy in this case turns upon a question of fact. Was the plaintiff the owner of the real estate in question, or was her husband the owner thereof?

One or the other of them acquired the title by warranty deed from one John Miller, on November 24, 1903. This deed was lost before it was recorded, and was not found until after the beginning of this action. It was found before the trial, and was whether it is simply the correction of an apparent mistake, or an actual change in the context; whether it is plainly in accordance with the manifest intention of the parties as shown by the rest of the instrument or not; whether it is an interlineation, an erasure, or the filling in of a blank; whether the alteration is in printed or in written words; whether it is in the body of the instrument or in the acknowledgment, indorsement, or some other attached writing; whether, if allowed to stand as a fraudulent alteration, it would absolutely avoid the instrument or not; and whether it is in an ancient document (over thirty years old) or in one not so old. No one of these suggestions has been followed as a basis for any general rule, but they have evidently affected the result in individual cases, and will be noted in connection with those cases.

Thus, it is said that where the alteration is of such a character as to defeat entirely the operation of the instrument for any purpose, as in the case of an erasure of the signature and seal to a deed, so that, admitting all to be true that appears upon the instrument when produced, it will be void in law, it should be explained in the first instance before it should be permitted to go to the jury. In other cases the instrument should be given in evidence, and should go to the jury upon the ordinary proof of its execution, although an alteration may appear in it, leaving the parties to such explanatory evidence as they may choose to offer. Stoner v. Ellis, 6 Ind. 152.

And in Smith v. McGowan, 3 Barb. 404, the court makes the following observations: "There is no principle of the common law which requires a deed to be written throughout with the same colored ink. The fact that ink of different colors is used may or may not afford evidence of a fraudulent alteration of an instrument. It may often be an important item of evidence on that question. And it may be consistent with the utmost honesty. There is nothing in the fact, considered in itself, which will require the court to exclude the instrument for that reason, as matter of law. . . . There is introduced in evidence. Such deed on its face runs to the plaintiff as grantee. Such deed, however, shows upon its face that since it was first written there was a change or erasure of the first initial in the name of the grantee. The plaintiff's name is "Mary A. Tharp." Her husband's name is "W. M. Tharp." The name of the grantee appearing in the deed is "M. Tharp." The contention of the defendants is that the name as originally written was "W. M. Tharp," and that it was altered after delivery by the erasure of the "W." The contention of the plaintiff is that the name of the grantee was originally written in the deed as "M. M. Tharp" (this was the name of a former wife of the plaintiff's husband); that, upon discovery of the mistake, the first initial was eliminated by erasure by the grantor, Miller, before delivery. Miller died before the trial. That an erasure of an initial was made in the deed after it was written is apparent upon its face, and is not disputed by either side.

The crucial question is, Was the erasure made before delivery or after? The burden was upon the defendants to prove that the apparent alteration was made after delivery.

no law requiring a deed to be free from interlineations, dots, or erasures, though it is conceded that such plénignes may cast suspicion on the instrument. . . . In early times, when few, and perhaps none, of the jurors could read or write, and when deeds were drawn only by men of a particular profession, and when the rules of pleading required the actual production of the deed, corresponding in all respects with the proffer, there was some propriety in the strictness contended for. But that extremely rigorous rule is not adapted to modern times. . . . The rules of evidence should conform themselves to the customs and wants of society. It is this plastic principle which modifies or dispenses with a rule where the reason for the rule requires it, that imparts to the common law its highest value. A large proportion of deeds are drawn by the parties or their neighbors, who are not professional men; and if the doctrine of Pigot's Case, 11 Coke, 26, and the Touchstone, should be rigorously applied to every erasure, interlineation, or obliteration, titles, would be disturbed to an incalculable amount. This would certainly be the case, if we are to presume that every alteration or erasure was fraudulent-ly made after the execution of the deed"

So, in Jordan v. Stewart, 23 Pa. 244, the court remarks: "When we look at a written instrument containing an interlineation or erasure without reference to contested rights, the natural and fair presumption doubtless is that the alteration was made before signature, because if altered after execution, it would be forgery, which is never to be presumed. Instruments of writing executed with the solemnities appointed by law are, like the men who made them, to be presumed innocent, until some circumstance is shown to beget a counter presumption. But when a contest occurs, the question at once arises whether the alteration is beneficial to the party offering it; if it be not, as in the instance of a bond or note altered to a less sum, the prima facie presumption is unchanged; if it be, . . . we do not presume a forgery, but we hold the party offering it in evidence, and seeking advantage from it, bound to explain the alteration to the satisfaction of a jury. The initiative and the burden of proof are thrown on him. If the interlineation or erasure have been noted in the attestation clause as having been made before signature, this is sufficient; or if the similarity of ink and handwriting, or the conduct of the parties, or other facts proved, shall persuade a jury that it was so made, the instrument is relieved from suspicion, and the party offering it is entitled to the benefits of it. So long as any ground of suspicion is apparent on the face of the instrument, the law presumes nothing, but leaves the question as to the time when it was done, to be ultimately found by the jury upon proofs to be adduced by him who offers it in evidence."

"Many authorities, however, while admitting that the general rule is that the law presumes that an alteration in an instrument is a legitimate part of it, until the contrary appears, hold that this rule does not extend to negotiable securities. . . . The reasons usually assigned for applying to negotiable paper a rule different from that applied to other instruments are, substantially and briefly, two: First. As notes and bills are intended for negotiation, and as payees would not receive them when clogged with impediments to their circulation, there is a presumption that such an instrument starts fair and untarnished, which stands until it is repelled. Second. That, without such a presumption to sustain him, the maker would be defenseless, as he cannot be expected to account for what happened after the paper left his hands. The first of these reasons, it seems to us, rather begs the question; and whatever force it might have possessed in times when the use of so-called negotiable instruments was confined to strictly commercial paper, it can have but little weight now, when such instruments are taken and given by all classes of people, in the most informal manner, as mere evidences of indebtedness, and without reference to their subsequent negotiation. . . . The second reason might have had much force when parties were not competent witnesses, but very little now, when they may testify in their own behalf. No one can better known than the maker what condition an instrument was in when it left

Such fact being proved, the burden of explanation would then fall upon the plaintiff. An erasure or alteration apparent upon the face of the instrument raises no presumption that it was made after delivery. Hagan v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 21, 25 Am. St. Rep. 493, 46 N. W. 1114; McGee v. Allison, 94 Iowa, 527, 63 N. W. 322. The contention of the appellant at this point is that the only burden upon him is to show that an alteration was in fact made, and that the burden is then cast upon the plaintiff to show that such alteration was made before delivery, or otherwise to explain or excuse. There are some jurisdictions where this rule is maintained. Jordan v. Stuart, 23 Pa. 244. Appellant cites the following cases in support of his contention: Robinson v. Reed, 46 Iowa, 220; Smith v. Eals, 81 Iowa, 235, 25 Am. St. Rep. 486, 46 N. W. 1110; Conger v. Crabtree, 88 Iowa, 536, 45 Am. St. Rep. 249, 55 N. W. 335; Shroeder v. Webster, 88 Iowa, 627, 55 N. W. 569; First Nat. Bank v. Zeima, 93 Iowa, 140, 61 N. W. 483; Maguire v. Eichmeier, 109 Iowa, 301, 80 N. W. 395; Rambousek v. Supreme Council, M. T. 119 Iowa, 263, 93 N. W. 277. None of these

Not only is there a conflict as between jurisdictions, but often there is an apparent conflict between cases in the same jurisdiction. This can usually be explained, however, by reference to the above remarks as to interpretation of terms and suggested distinctions. In all these cases it is important to keep in mind which party sets up the alteration as a defense, or which party claims under it.

With regard to an alteration apparent on the face of an instrument, three general rules have grown up: First, that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed to have been made before execution or delivery; second, that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, such an alteration will be presumed to have been made after execution or delivery; and, third, that an alteration raises no presumption either way, but the question as to when it was made must be left for the jury to determine. The cases generally agree, however, in holding that when the instrument is the act of a public officer, or when the alteration is absolutely immaterial to the issue, such an alteration will be presumed to have been made before execution, and that when it is of such a character as to brand the instrument with marks of suspicion, it will be presumed to have been made after execution. In the case of alterations alleged to have been made after the execution of the instrument, but not apparent upon the face of the instrument, the burden is upon the party alleging such alterations, to prove them.

II. Alteration apparent on face of instrument.

a. General rules and their ordinary application.

1. Presumption in favor of instrument.

In a large number of jurisdictions, the rule is laid down that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, and in the absence of all suspicious circumstances, an alteration apparent on the face of an instrument will be presumed to have been made before the execution of the instrument. This presumption favors the validity of the instrument, and naturally makes it incumbent upon the party alleging that the alteration was made subsequent to execution, to produce evidence to that effect, though, even then, as above suggested, the burden of proof in the strict sense will not change. Under this rule, the instrument will be admitted in evidence without any prior explanation upon the part of the one offering it, but if the other party sets up the alteration as a defense, the party relying upon the altered instrument must, notwithstanding the original presumption in his favor, prove his case before the jury by a preponderance of evidence.

"The rule that the alteration raises a presumption against the instrument cannot be indulged without conflicting with the general proposition that fraud is never presumed, and with another general proposition that the burden of proof is upon the party who pleads an affirmative defense. If it is put in issue by the pleadings, it is a fact in the case to be determined by the jury, subject to the same rule of presumption as any other fact to be proven in the case." Wolferman v. Bell, 6 Wash. 84, 36 Am. St. Rep. 126, 32 Pac. 1017.

An alteration before execution does not affect validity, but if after and without consent of the maker, it constitutes a crime, and the law never presumes a crime in the absence of proof. The only presumption the law indulges in such cases is in favor of the honesty and good faith of what appears to have been done. Franklin v. Baker, 48 Ohio St. 296, 29 Am. St. Rep. 547, 27 N. E. 550.

Especially should this rule control where a very large percentage of the deeds are never seen by a lawyer until some question of title is raised, where they are written often by men who know little or nothing of legal rules, who are not expert penmen, and the materials used frequently not of the best. A rule should be adopted tending to preserve and sustain titles acquired by such deeds. Wicker v. Jones, — N. C. —, 74 S. E. 801.

"It is obvious that the rule of proof in regard to an alteration at common law, and under the English stamp act, need not necessarily be the same. The object of the cases sustain appellant's contention in this respect. Some of them are cases wherein the alleged alteration was shown to have been made after delivery, and where the burden of explanation was thereby thrown upon the party offering the instrument. But none of them dispense with the necessity that it be made to appear that the alleged alteration was made after delivery before any presumption of fraud can arise therefrom.

An erasure or interlineation appearing upon the face of an instrument is not an alteration in a legal sense, unless made after delivery. This discrimination, however, is not always observed in the use of such terms, and the word "alteration" is often used in the books as synonymous with the word "erasure" or "interlineation." If there is any inconsistency in the language of our cases at this point, it will be found to arise from the double sense in which the word "alteration" is sometimes used.

Turning now to the question of fact, the evidence is very conflicting. If the instrument itself had not been produced in evidence, the testimony on behalf of the defendants would be quite persuasive. The widow of Miller and the notary public both testified that W. M. Tharp was the grantee in the deed as originally drawn. Miller himself took the deed when it was drawn. The only direct evidence of its actual condition at the time he delivered it is that of the plaintiff and her husband. They testify that it is in the same condition now that it common-law rule of proof would be to protect one party from the fraud of the other; that of the statute rule, to protect the revenue from the fraud of all the parties. . . . One rule of evidence might, perhaps, be necessary to protect the interests of the government, while another might be quite sufficient for the preservation of those of the parties. And for the detection of fraud upon the revenue, and to prevent its recurrence, a more stringent rule of proof may be required in England, by considerations of public policy, than justice to the parties would otherwise demand. . . . I think this rule is demanded by the actual condition of the business transactions of this country, and especially of this state,—where a great portion of the contracts made are drawn by the parties to them, and without great care in regard to interlineations and alterations. To establish an invariable rule, such as is claimed in behalf of the defendant, that the party producing the paper should in all cases be bound to explain any alteration by extrinsic evidence, would, I apprehend, do injustice in a very great majority of the instances in which it should be applied. Such a rule might be tolerated,—might perhaps be beneficially adopted,—in a highly commercial country like that of Great Britain, in regard to negotiable paper, which is generally written by men trained to clerical accuracy, and is upon stamped paper, the very cost of which would induce special care in the drawing of it; but I am persuaded its application here could not be otherwise than injurious. It is not often that an alteration can be accounted for by extraneous evidence; and to hold that, in all cases, such evidence must be given, without regard to any suspicious appearance of the alteration, would, I think, in many instances, be doing such manifest injustice as to shock the common sense of most men." Beaman v. Russell, 20 Vt. 205, 49 Am. Dec. 775.

"The doctrine that the presumption of law is that the alteration was made after delivery, and that the burden is on the holder in the first instance to explain it, seems to us to be unsound as well as harsh. Presumptions of law, if indulged in, should be in favor of innocence rather than guilt. . . . Now, it is a matter of common knowledge that at the present day every man is, to a certain extent, his own lawyer, and that laymen frequently draw their own contracts, without much regard to form, in which erasures and interlineations are the rule rather than the exception. Indeed, the same thing is unfortunately true of many instruments which come from the hands of lawyers. It is also a matter of common knowledge that printed blanks are now in general use for almost all kinds of contracts, and that it is the common practice, even with many lawyers, in case the blank does not conform to the actual agreement of the parties, to erase and interline, without making any notation that this was done before execution. Whatever might have been the fact formerly, when but few men could write, and when contracts were usually drawn by skilled conveyancers or scribes, with great care, and wholly in their own proper handwriting, the rule under consideration is wholly unsuited to the business habits or usages of this country at the present day. The mere existence of an interlineation or erasure in an instrument would not naturally or ordinarily produce an inference in the minds of men that it had been fraudulently altered after execution. Indeed, unless the alteration was of such a suspicious character as to furnish intrinsic evidence to the contrary, we think the natural inference would be that it was a legitimate part of the instrument, and was made at or before its execution." Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 4 L.R.A. 196, 12 Am. St. Rep. 754, 42 N. W. 467.

This rule, that an alteration apparent on the face of an instrument will be presumed to have been made before execution, is supported by the following cases:

U. S.—Malarin v. United States, 1 Wall. 282, 17 L. ed. 594 (grant of land); Little v. Herndon, 10 Wall. 26, 19 L. ed. 878 (patent to land); Hanrick v. Patrick, 119 U. S. 156, 30 L. ed. 396, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep.

was at the time of the delivery, and that the erasure was explained by Miller. The case turns upon the truth or falsehood of this testimony as to the actual condition of the deed at the time of delivery. The circumstances are such that this testimony should be scrutinized carefully in the light of the whole record, and we have subjected it to that process. It is not necessarily inconsistent with the testimony of Mrs. Miller and of the notary public. Good reasons are also shown why the deed should have been made to Mrs. Tharp rather than to her husband. The husband had formerly owned this property. He had originally purchased it in 1901 subject to a mortgage. The mortgage was held by Miller. Miller foreclosed the mortgage, and sold the property at execution sale, and took a sheriff's deed therefor in September, 1903. Tharp was then in failing circumstances, and was owing his wife several hundred dollars for money received from her about the time of their marriage. Miller agreed to convey the property for the amount of his debt plus expenses. This amount was received from Tharp by certain notes, under an arrangement between him and his wife that it was to apply upon the indebtedness to her. After the property was acquired, however, it was included by Tharp in his return to the assessor, and it was assessed to him. He also rented it and collected the rent in his own name. We will not stop now to deal with the explanation given of this circumstance. The explanation given is not altogether plausible, but it is by no means impossible.

The most important corroborating fact in our judgment is the appearance of the deed itself. This deed was undoubtedly lost shortly after its delivery. There was no motive for its concealment at that time. Nor is it apparent that there was any pressing motive at that time for a fraudulent alteration of the deed. There was nothing to prevent a conveyance by the husband to the wife. The question naturally arises in the mind whether this alteration was recently made and after this controversy had come into view. The judgment against Tharp upon which the execution sale was made was entered in 1907. The sheriff's sale was had in April, 1909. And on the day of the sale plaintiff caused notice of her ownership to be served upon the defendants. In August of the same year she brought this action. Some months later her deed was found under circumstances free from suspicion. It was found accidentally in the folds of the "carpet seat" of an old rocking chair which had been exposed to the weather. With this deed when so found was another instrument, and both were folded together "double." They were weather-stained. The trial court found that the appearance of the instrument was quite conclusive that the erasure was made long ago, and could not have been made after its exposure to the weather and after its discovery. It appears, also, that the deed was folded in the usual way, and that the name of grantor and grantee were "briefed" in the usual form on the back of the folded deed. When the deed was lost, it was again folded "double," so that the upper end, where the "briefing" was, rested against the blank space at the lower end. The names of grantor and grantee, which were briefed upon the upper end, were thereby impressed or "copied" upon the blank space below. This impression or "copy" shows the name "M. Tharp." The present appearance of the deed, as described by the trial court in a written opinion filed, is as follows: "The first initial letter whether 'W.' or 'M.' was erased in the body of the deed and in the briefing on the back, shortly after its execution. The erasure was done by someone who knew how to do this kind of work, and so perfectly done that it is now impossible to tell from the deed itself what the first initial really was. Tharp and wife both testify that the deed is now just as it was when it came into their hands. There is no evidence rebutting this. The deed seems to have been folded and laid away. The briefing on the back has been copied on the bottom of the back where it was folded against the top, with the first initial missing. This is a circumstance tending to corroborate Tharp and his wife that the deed is now as when received by them. It is evident from the deed itself that there is no recent change in it, and not a change made for the purpose of this suit." The foregoing statement of the trial court is not challenged, nor is the Vt.—Beaman v. Russell, 20 Vt. 205, 49 Am. Dec. 775 (note).

W. 829, in the case of an altered bond, the defense being non est factum, it was said that the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the alteration was made before execution, that the position of the parties should not be changed by indulging in presumptions. And the same rule was applied in Powell v. Banks, 146 Mo. 620, 48 S. W. 664, a case of an alteration in a deed of trust, in different ink and different handwriting. And in Hays v. Bayliss, 82 Mo. 209, a case of partnership books, it was said that when one member of a partnership has full control of its books, their presentation to the court upon a settlement of its affairs, in a mutilated, torn, erased, and scratched condition, will warrant every inference favorable to the other member.

Wash.—Wolferman v. Bell, 6 Wash. 84, 56 Am. St. Rep. 126, 32 Pac. 1017 (alteration in note with different pen and ink from certain signatures, but same as others, no fraud shown, presumption that the alteration was made when the last-named signatures were affixed); Yakima Nat. Bank v. Knipe, 6 Wash. 348, 33 Pac. 834 (note); Fairhaven v. Cowgill, 8 Wash. 686, 36 Pac. 303 (bond); Kleeb v. Bard, 12 Wash. 140, 41 Pac. 733 (bond); Blewett v. Bash, 22 Wash. 536, 61 Pac. 770 (guaranty); Slyfield v. Willard, 43 Wash. 179, 86 Pac. 392 (chattel mortgage). But this presumption gives way to positive proof to the contrary. Stockand v. Hall, 54 Wash. 106, 102 Pac. 737 (tax deed).

Eng.—The ancient doctrine of the English common law was that an interlineation in a deed, if nothing appear to the contrary, would be presumed to have been made at the time it was executed. Trowel v. Castle, 1 Keble, 21, and this case is cited as law in 12 Vin. Abr. 58, and in Fitzgerald v. Fauconberge, Fitzg. 207.

Of ancient time, if the deed appeared to be raised or interlined in places material, the judges adjudged, upon their view, the L.R.A. (N.S.)

deed to be void; but, of latter time, the judges have left that to the jurors to try whether the raising or interlining was before the delivery. Co. Litt. 225 b.

In a note in Hargrave & Butler's ed. of Coke's Littleton, it is said: "Tis to be presumed that the interlining, if the contrary is not proved, was made at the time of making the deed."

This rule is followed in Doe ex dem. Tatum v. Catomore, 16 Q. B. 745, 20 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 364, being the case of an altered deed.

But in London B. & S. C. R. Co. v. Fairclough, 2 Mann. & G. 674, 3 Scott. N. R. 68, 2 Railw. Cas. 544, 10 L. J. C. P. N. S. 133, the case of an altered deed, it was held that the one claiming under it must account for the alteration. See also II. a. 2.

Ont.—Graystock v. Barnhart, 26 Ont. App. Rep. 545 (mortgage).

2. Presumption against instrument.

Another rule, also supported by many authorities and directly opposed to the one stated above, is to the effect that, in the absence of proof to the contrary, an alteration apparent upon the face of an instrument will be presumed to have been made after the execution of the instrument. This presumption lies against the validity of the instrument, and requires explanatory evidence from the party producing the same or claiming under it, before it will be allowed to go to the jury. However, in the jurisdictions that follow this rule, it is generally held that after the instrument is admitted in evidence, the actual determination as to when the alteration was made is a question for the jury upon all the evidence in the case.

In Walters v. Short, 10 Ill. 252, it was said: "Written instruments are supposed to be the repositories of the intentions of the parties, but they would surely be very unsafe repositories of such intentions, if the party having possession of the instrument was at liberty to alter it at pleasure, and then call upon the other party to show that the alteration was made after its execution, original deed presented to our view. We deem the circumstance of great importance as strongly corroborative of the direct testimony of the plaintiff and her husband. In the light of this circumstance, we think the testimony of the plaintiff and her husband should be accepted, to the effect that the erasure in question was made before delivery. Such fact being found, it controls the case, regardless of the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff's husband in collecting the rent in his own name. This was the conclusion reached by the trial court.

The decrees entered below must therefore be affirmed.

or else be bound by its contents. Admitting that a note has been altered after its execution, how is the maker to show that fact? The note has, of course, been in possession of the payee,—is often in his handwriting, and it will be a mere accident if the maker can procure evidence to show how the note was written. Which is the more reasonable, to require the holder of an instrument which has been altered to explain the alteration, or to require that he who executed it, and never saw it afterwards, should show that the alteration had been made since its execution? It is easy for a party taking an instrument that has been interlined or altered, to have the interlineation or alteration noted in the attestation clause, so as to show its existence at the time of execution, while it is very difficult for a party who has been out of possession of the instrument to prove that the interlineation was made after he signed it."

And in Hodge v. Gilman, 20 Ill. 437, it is said that "this presumption arises from business convenience, the security of parties, and the necessities of the case. The law must presume either that it was made before or after it was executed; and if the former, no man would ever be safe in signing any paper, no matter how fairly drafted, for the holder, having it in his possession and control, could interline it at pleasure, and then call upon the maker to show that the alterations were made after its execution, which, if the alterations were made by the same hand that wrote the body of the instrument, it would, in most cases, be impossible for him to do. . . . It is true that the complainant in this case must take the affirmative, to show that the instrument has been altered since he signed it. . . . That, we say, as matter of law, is done by showing to the court that the instrument has been interlined in a material part, which changes the onus, and imposes the duty upon the other side, to show that the alteration was in fact made before it was executed."

It is probable that many of these alterations were actually considered suspicious by the courts, and that the application of the rule was determined by that fact. But the cases where the decision was placed specifically upon the ground of the suspicious circumstances are collected under II. b.

This rule, that an alteration apparent on the face of an instrument will be presumed to have been made after the execution of the instrument, was adopted in the following cases:

Cas. No. 6 (erasure of signature upon notes); Barnsdall v. Boley, 119 Fed. 191 (lease); The Richard Vaux, 20 Fed. 654 (shipping articles; presumption indulged in order to protect the rights of illiterate seamen); but see II. a, 1.

Ala.—White v. Hass, 32 Ala. 430, 70 Am. Dec. 548 (note); Wisdom v. Reeves, 110 Ala. 418, 18 So. 13 (deed); Gulf Red Cedar Co. v. Crenshaw, 169 Ala. 606, 53 So. 812 (alteration made in a deed after recordation, and presumed to have been made after delivery, the court placing the burden of proof upon the one claiming the benefit of the alteration, to show that the registration was so conditional as not to amount to a delivery); but the opposite presumption was indulged in Sharpe v. Orme, 61 Ala. 263 (alterations in a deed merely curing an imperfect description of land, and in accord with all the purposes and objects of the conveyance, and in the same handwriting as the body of the instrument); also in Lewis v. Watson, 98 Ala. 479, 22 L.R.A. 297, 39 Am. St. Rep. 82, 13 So. 570 (interlineation in a deed in the handwriting of the grantor, as was also the body of the instrument, and manifestly in accord with the purposes and objects of the instrument); also in Alabama State Land Co. v. Thompson, 104 Ala. 570, 53 Am. St. Rep. 80, 16 So. 440 (alterations in a deed fully explained by the context); also in Ward v. Cheney, 117 Ala. 238, 22 So. 996 (alteration in an assignment for the benefit of creditors, made in the same handwriting as the body of the instrument); and in Hart v. Sharpton, 124 Ala. 638, 27 So. 450 (alteration in a note and mortgage, not beneficial to the party claiming under them, and self-explanatory); but see II. a, 3.

Ark.—Chism v. Toomer, 27 Ark. 108 (note, holding that a plea by the maker setting up the defense of alteration throws the burden upon the holder to show that the alteration was made before delivery or by consent, the court remarking, however, that in general the presumption is that bills and notes start fair and untarnished, and that this presumption stands until repelled); Decker v. Laws, 74 Ark. 286, 85 S. W. 425 (check; defense payment in full, plaintiff denying that words "in full payment" were in the check when signed; the court saying that the burden on the whole case remained with the plaintiff, but that the burden was on the defendant, who produced and relied upon the instrument, to show that the words were in when plaintiff indorsed); Smith v. Weatherford, 92 Ark. 6, 121 S. W. 943 (check introduced for same purpose as one in preceding case, and same ruling); but in Gist v. Gans, 30 Ark. 285, a case of an altered note, it was held that the burden was on the defendant, setting up the alteration as a defense, to show that it was made after execution; and in Klein v. German Nat. Bank, 69 Ark. 140, 86 Am. St. Rep. 183, 61 S. W. 572, a case of an altered note, it was held that there was no presumption of law, but that it was a question for the jury.

Cal.—Galland v. Jackman, 26 Cal. 79, 85 Am. Dec. 172 (deed); Roberts v. Unger, 39 Cal. 676 (deed); Sedgwick v. Sedgwick, 56 Cal. 213 (note; the court stating that under the California Code the party producing a written instrument as genuine, which appears to have been altered after execution, must account for the alteration, or he cannot give it in evidence); Miller v. Lugo, 50 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195 (tax deed); Manuel v. Flynn, 5 Cal. App. 319, 90 Pac. 463 (contract); but in Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 82, a case of an altered note, the alteration not appearing to have been made after execution, it was held that it should be presumed to have been made before.

Del.—Herdman v. Bratten, 2 Harr. (Del.) 396 (replevin bond); Warren v. Layton, 3 Harr. (Del.) 404 (note); but in Curry v. May, 4 Harr. (Del.) 173, where a contract under seal had been altered in handwriting of the plaintiff, and was unexplained, and where it appeared that the defendant had a copy, but refused to produce it, a nonsuit was refused; and in Welsh v. Coulborn, 3 Houst. (Del.) 647, it is said that if nothing appears to the contrary, it will be presumed that an alteration in a receipt was made at the time of its execution. And this rule is quoted and approved in Hollis v. Vandergrift, 5 Houst. (Del.) 521.

Hawaii.—Kahai v. Kamai, 8 Haw. 694 (deed).

Idaho.—Mulkey v. Long, 5 Idaho, 213, 47 Pac. 949 (note, a decision apparently controlled by a statute providing that a party offering an altered instrument must explain).

Ill.—Gillett v. Sweet, 1 Ill. 475 (note); Walters v. Short, 10 Ill. 252 (note); Hodge v. Gilman, 20 Ill. 437 (power of attorney attached to a note, alteration to the palpable detriment of the maker, and manifestly to the advantage of the holder, inconsistent with the terms of the note, and harsh and unjust); Montag v. Linn, 23 Ill. 551 (deed); Pyle v. Oustatt, 92 Ill. 260 (deed); McAllister v. Avery, 17 Ill. App. 568 (interlineation in note in same ink and handwriting); Sisson v. Pearson, 44 Ill. App. 81 (bond); but the opposite presumption was indulged in Hodge v. Gilman, supra, where a power of attorney attached to a note had been altered to make it correspond with the terms of the note to which it was attached, and to which it referred (this was a second alteration, distinct from the one referred to above); and in Russell v. Peyton, 4 Ill. App. 473, where a declaration of trust had been altered in same ink and handwriting as the body of the I.R.A. (N.S.)

the instrument, which was over forty years old. But see II. a, 3.

La.—It is the rule of the civil law that an alteration apparent upon the face of an instrument is presumed to be false, but it is not a presumption juris et de jure; it may yield to contrary proof. McMicken v. Beauchamp, 2 La. 290 (alteration in acceptance to bill of exchange in different ink); Wheadon v. Turregano, 112 La. 931, 36 So. 808 (a case of a lease where plaintiff's copy showed erasure, defendant's did not, and the burden was placed upon the plaintiff to show that alteration was made before signing or with the other's consent); Pipes v. Hardesty, 9 La. Ann. 152, 61 Am. Dec. 202 (interlineation in deed in same ink and handwriting).

Mich.—Sheldon v. Hawes, 15 Mich. 519 (interlineation in note in different ink and peculiar in appearance); Ehrenkrook v. Webber, 100 Mich. 314, 58 N. W. 665, 60 N. W. 761 (certificate of deposit); but in Comstock v. Smith, 26 Mich. 306, a case of an altered deed, a somewhat different rule was laid down, where it was held that the party claiming under the instrument has the burden of proof on the whole case, to establish the genuineness of the writing by a preponderance of evidence, and that therefore there cannot be any presumption of law that the alleged alteration is seasonably made, for that would make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff without the aid of any evidence whatever, and would shift the burden of proof upon the defendant; and the court concludes that there is no presumption of law, but that it is a question of fact for the jury. And the same rule is laid down in Willett v. Shepard, 34 Mich. 106, which was a case of an altered note. See II. a, 1.

N. H.—Hills v. Barnes, 11 N. H. 395 (note; the court saying this rule is necessary for the security of the maker, who must otherwise take evidence of the appearance of the note when it is delivered, in order to protect himself against alterations subsequently made without his privity); Humphreys v. Guillo, 13 N. H. 385, 38 Am. Dec. 499 (note); Dow v. Jewell, 18 N. H. 340, 45 Am. Dec. 371 (deed); Burnham v. Aver, 35 N. H. 351 (mortgage); Cole v. Hills, 44 N. H. 227 (alteration in note to correct a mistake, the court saying that this presumption is one of fact to be exercised by the jury, and not one of law to be applied by the court, so that the instrument is admissible without explanation; and if no evidence is given it all, the presumption will be that the alteration was made after execution, but that the whole question was for the jury).

N. Y.—In New York, the party claiming under an altered instrument must explain, or the alteration will be presumed to have been made after execution. Taylor v. Crowinshield, 5 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 209 (mortgage); Herrick v. Malin, 22 Wend. 388 (deed, dictum); Ridgeley v. Johnson, 11 Barb. 527 (deed, although it be over thirty years old); Gowdey v. Robbins, 3 App. Div. 353, 3 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 231, 38 N. Y. Supp. 280 (note); Re Pinkerton, 49 Misc. 363, 99 N. Y. Supp. 492 (note); Brinn v. Cohen, 107 N. Y. Supp. 37 (receipt); Kelly v. Indemnity F. Ins. Co. 38 N. Y. 322 (book of account, held inadmissible without explanation of alteration, if objected to); Jackson ex dem. Collier v. Jacoby, 9 Cow. 125 (alteration in deed not noted upon the instrument and made in darker ink, the court saying that it is perhaps sufficient to call for explanation).

But after the explanation is given, the whole question is for the jury. Pringle v. Chambers, 1 Abb. Pr. 58 (contract); Acker v. Ledyard, 8 Barb. 514 (lease); Pease v. Barnett, 27 Hun, 378 (bond); in Rankin v. Blackwell, 2 Johns. Cas. 198, it was said that the alteration in a note alone, unsupported by other evidence, was not competent as a defense, but if there be other evidence of fraud or forgery, the alteration would be a strong corroborating circumstance, if not decisive proof.

But in Maybee v. Sniffen, 2 E. D. Smith, 1, a case of an altered release, it was held that no presumption should be indulged, but that the question was for the jury; and in Hughes's Estate, 18 N. Y. S. R. 395, 3 N. Y. Supp. 201, a case of an erasure in a voucher, it was held that it should be presumed to have been made before filing with the account, when the evidence was conflicting and left a reasonable doubt as to when it was made; and in Rosenbloom v. Finch, 37 Misc. 818, 76 N. Y. Supp. 902, where an assignment of a claim had been altered by simply interlining the name of the assignee, which had been inadvertently omitted, it was held that there was no burden on the party offering it to show that it had been made before execution; in Jefferson Bank v. Frankenstein, 110 N. Y. Supp. 1104, where notes had been altered, and where the defendants, who were indorsers, alleged that the alteration was made by the maker after indorsement, but where the facts showed that the maker had had no opportunity to do so, the presumption was indulged that the alteration was made before indorsement; in Barker v. Stroppel, 124 N. Y. Supp. 865, where a lessor asked cancellation of an alleged alteration in a lease in apparently different ink, it was held that the burden was on him to show that it had been made after execution.

Or.—Under the Oregon Code, a party offering a written instrument in evidence, which bears an alteration in a material part apparent upon its face, must explain such alteration. Dolph v. Barney, 5 Or. 191 (record of deed, especially where party offers it to contradict a certified copy); Simpkins v. Windsor, 21 Or. 382, 28 Pac. 72 (alteration in deed in same handwriting, but different ink); Nickum v. Gaston, 28 Or. 322, 42 Pac. 130 (tax receipt, but explanation may be made even after it is admitted in evidence, over the objection of the other party); Galloway v. Bartholomew, 44 Or. 75, 74 Pac. 467 (note). 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pa.—Barrington v. Bank of Washington, 14 Serg. & R. 405 (bond, burden on holder, but question for jury); Heffelfinger v. Shutz, 16 Serg. & R. 44 (alteration in deed in different handwriting, the question being for the jury; this presumption may be removed by very slight circumstances, as, for example, if the alteration is against the interest of the one offering the instrument, and in such a case this presumption will be replaced by another and stronger one, that the alteration was made at the time of execution); Churchman v. Smith, 6 Whart. 146, 36 Am. Dec. 211 (book of entries); Morris v. Venderen, 1 Dall. 64, 1 L. ed. 38 (holding that an interlineation in a deed will be presumed to have been made after execution, unless otherwise proved); but in Jordan v. Stewart, 23 Pa. 244, it is said that this is a harsh rule, and that it has not been followed; but that now it is a question for the jury on all the circumstances of the case; Simpson v. Stackhouse, 9 Pa. 186, 49 Am. Dec. 554 (note); Kennedy v. Lancaster County Bank, 18 Pa. 347 (note); Clark v. Eckstein, 22 Pa. 507, 62 Am. Dec. 307 (alteration in note, the court saying that if no explanation is given, it should not go to the jury); Jordan v. Stewart, 23 Pa. 244 (interlineation in a deed, but not shown in the record, resembling in handwriting and ink the body of the instrument; the court holding it a question for the jury as to when made); Heffner v. Wenrich, 32 Pa. 423 (note); Robinson v. Myers, 67 Pa. 9 (deed, burden placed on the holder, but no presumption of law, leaving the question to the jury); Burgwin v. Bishop, 91 Pa. 336 (lease, alteration not noted in attestation clause; same ruling as in preceding case); Nagle's Estate, 134 Pa. 31, 19 Am. St. Rep. 669, 19 Atl. 434 (alteration in check in handwriting of payee); Hartley v. Corboy, 150 Pa. 23, 24 Atl. 295 (note); Nesbitt v. Turner, 155 Pa. 429, 26 Atl. 750 (bond); McIlale v. McDonnell, 175 Pa. 632, 34 Atl. 966 (assignment of life insurance policy); Cornog v. Wilson, 231 Pa. 281, 80 Atl. 174 (note, the court saying that the rule is more stringent when applied to commercial paper, where there is no presumption of innocence, than when applied to other written instruments); Winters v. Mowrer, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 47 (note, alteration in same handwriting and ink, burden on holder, but question for the jury); Gettysburg Nat. Bank v. Gage, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 505 (note, alteration in same handwriting and ink, not interlined, but in blank spaces, and not crowded; the court holding the presumption weak, and a question for the jury); Potter's Estate, 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 576 (note); Sunday v. Dietrich, 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 640 (note); Carbondale School Dist. v. Tuttle, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 33 (contract, burden on holder, but question for the jury); Todd v. Lederach, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 173 (note); Mechling v. Hartzell, 4 Pennyp. 500 (judgment note, alteration in different ink); Van Dusen v. Thomas, 10 W. N. C. 190 (note, burden on holder, but question for jury).

But in Paine v. Edsell, 19 Pa. 178, where a note was disfigured by a blot on which one of the figures was made, this was held not to be such an alteration as to require explanation; and in Zimmerman v. Camp, 155 Pa. 152, 25 Atl. 1086, where a deed was interlined in same handwriting and ink, and the alteration was prejudicial to the holder, its admission without explanation was held not reversible error.

S. C.—Horry Dist. v. Hanion, 1 Nott & McC. 554 (bond, question for jury); Porter v. Doby, 2 Rich. Eq. 49 (sealed note, with the seal carefully cut out, leaving a mere filament by which it was attached, and found among the papers of the payee after his death); Vaughan v. Fowler, 14 S. C. 335, 37 Am. Rep. 731 (note); Kennedy v. Moore, 17 S. C. 464 (note).

But in the absence of all other evidence, the appearance of the alteration may itself be explanatory; in other words, the internal evidence offered by the instrument itself may show that the alteration preceded the execution, as where the name in the prefatory statement has been erased and another written in to correspond with the name given in the body of the bond. Wicker v. Pope, 12 Rich. L. 387, 75 Am. Dec. 732.

And in Burton v. Pressly, Cheves, Eq. 1, this rule was applied in a case where a mortgage had its blank for the date filled in with the same ink as the affidavit, but different from the body of the instrument; this was presumed to have been done at the time of the execution. So, also, with an alteration in the affidavit referring to interlineations in the body of the mortgage, and also with the interlineations in the mortgage in the same ink and handwriting as the body, and corresponding with the provisions of a copy.

Va.—Priest v. Whitacre, 78 Va. 151 (contract; under this rule, that the party offering the instrument must explain, when the instrument is produced by plaintiff's witnesses upon demand of the defendant, and the plaintiff does not claim under it, the plaintiff need not explain); Elgin v. Hall, 62 Va. 680 (receipt); Hodnett v. Pace, 54 Va. 873, 6 S. E. 217 (bond); Slater v. Moore, 86 Va. 26, 9 S. E. 419 (check, the court saying that every such alteration renders the instrument suspicious. See II. b.); Consumers' Ice Co. v. Jennings, 100 Va. 719, 42 S. E. 879 (contract, party offering must establish his case before the jury by preponderance of evidence); Ramsey v. McCue, 21 Gratt. 349 (bond, the court saying there is no presumption of law that the alteration was made after execution, but that it is a question of fact for the jury).

W. Va.—Piercy v. Piercy, 5 W. Va. 199 (bond); but an altered note may go to the jury without explanation on the question as to whether there was a mutilation or not, which is for them to decide. Conner v. Freshman, 4 W. Va. 693.

Wis.—Low v. Merrill, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 340 (note); but in Maldaner v. Smith, 102 Wis. 30, 78 N. W. 140, where a note had been altered in the same handwriting and ink, it was held that there was no presumption that the alteration was made after execution, but that the opposite presumption would control in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

Eng.—This, it would seem, was the earlier rule at common law in England as to deeds and similar instruments; but its inconvenience was such as to cause it to be abandoned as early as the time of Lord Coke. Franklin v. Baker, 48 Ohio St. 296, 29 Am. St. Rep. 547, 27 N. E. 550 and cases cited. See II. a, 1.

In England, this rule has been adopted as to commercial paper, but this results from the provisions of their stamp act. This act provides that bills and notes must be stamped before they can be used as evidence, and that if a bill is altered after it issues, no matter by whom, it becomes another bill and requires a new stamp in order to make it evidence. Accordingly, when a negotiable instrument is offered in evidence in which an alteration appears, the court will pronounce it void per se as a fraud upon the revenue, unless it is twice stamped or unless the party offering it will show that the alteration was made before it was complete. The court, in Franklin v. Baker, supra, remarks that decisions based upon such considerations, not applicable to our country, are entitled to no weight as authority in our courts; nor are decisions from those of our courts which have simply followed the English decisions as precedents.

This rule therefore applies in England to bills and notes. Johnson v. Marlborough, 2 Starkie, 313; Henman v. Dickinson, 5 Bing. 183, 2 Moore & P. 289, 7 L. J. C. P. 68, 30 Revised Rep. 565; Taylor v. Moseley, 6 Car. & P. 272 (jury must say whether made before or after acceptance); Desbrow v. Weatherley, 6 Car. & P. 758, 1 Moody & R. 438; Knight v. Clements, 8 Ad. & El. 215, 3 Nev. & P. 375, 7 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 144, 1 W. W. & H. 280, 2 Jur. 395; Clifford v. Parker, 2 Mann. & G. 909, 3 Scott. N. R. 233, 10 L. J. C. P. N. S. 227.

In Cariss v. Tattersall, 2 Mann. & G. 890, 3 Scott. N. R. 257, 10 L. J. C. P. N. S. 187, it is said that, although the party seeking to enforce a bill or note must explain any alteration apparent on the face of the instrument, the evidence may warrant the inference that the alteration was made with the consent of the other party. But see II. a, 1.

3. No presumption.

A third rule now being adopted in many jurisdictions is that an alteration apparent upon the face of an instrument, in the absence of all other evidence, and not suspicious in its character, raises no presumption as to the time when it was made. At first sight this would seem to be merely a compromise between the other two rules, adopted to avoid the necessity of supporting either one as against the other, but upon examination it is seen to be grounded upon reasoning cogent and convincing, and perhaps is the most consistent rule of the three. One difficulty found in the cases which follow this third rule is that in many of them it is said that such an alteration is in itself suspicious, and requires explanation by the party offering it. This makes explanation necessary after the instrument is in evidence, and weakens the force and effect of the rule, rendering such cases almost indistinguishable from many cited under the second rule above.

Thus, in Dodge v. Haskell, 69 Me. 429, it is said the holder of an altered instrument has the burden of proof; but the paper itself, unaided by other evidence, may satisfy the jury or it may not. All depends upon circumstances. Whether the instrument presents indications of fraud or not is a question of fact. It cannot be a question of law to decide whether a note is signed in two inks or one, or in two handwritings or one, or why so written. It is said that an alteration prima facie indicates fraud, but it is sure that it does not in all cases. On the other hand, it is said that fraud is not to be presumed, but it would be extreme to say that the instrument might not be so altered as to show upon its face the grossest attempt at forgery. Therefore, what alteration, or degree or kind of alteration, may exist without being suspicious enough to demand explanation, is for the jury to settle. There is no presumption of law either way. There can be no difficulty practically in the rule as as here stated. It will rarely happen that a case is to be tried without evidence aliunde the note, and it cannot be a matter of much consequence which side proceeds first.

This rule is well supported by reason and authority, and is in harmony with the rule that the law does not presume guilt. To presume against the writing, or that the alteration was before delivering, is to indulge in presumptions without evidence to support them. If either of two opposite presumptions are equally inferable from an established fact, it cannot be said that the fact tends to prove either. Hagan v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 321, 25 Am. St. Rep. 493, 46 N. W. 1114.

of fact for the jury, the court generally requires that the alteration shall be explained by the party claiming the benefit of the paper. Reed v. Kemp, 16 Ill. 445; Catlin Coal Co. v. Lloyd, 180 Ill. 398, 72 Am. St. Rep. 216, 54 N. E. 214.

This rule finds support in the following cases:

Ala.—Davis v. Carlisle, 6 Ala. 707 (note); Tyree v. Rives, 57 Ala. 173 (note); R. D. Burnett Cigar Co. v. Art Wall Paper Co. 164 Ala. 547, 51 So. 263 (contract); but see II. a, 2.

Conn.—Bailey v. Taylor, 11 Conn. 531, 29 Am. Dec. 321 (note); Hayden v. Goodnow, 39 Conn. 164 (bill of exchange).

D. C.—Portsmouth Sav. Bank v. Wilson, 5 App. D. C. 8 (note); but where an alteration in a deed was in different handwriting and ink, explanation was required. Peugh v. Mitchell, 3 App. D. C. 321.

Ill.—Reed v. Kemp, 16 Ill. 445 (bond); Milliken v. Marlin, 66 Ill. 13 (power of attorney); Catlin Coal Co. v. Lloyd, 180 Ill. 398, 72 Am. St. Rep. 216, 54 N. E. 214 (deed); DeLong v. Soucie, 45 Ill. App. 234 (note); Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Young, 123 Ill. App. 628 (receipt); but see II. a, 2.

Iowa.—Harlan v. Berry, 4 G. Greene, 212 (note); Jones v. Ireland, 4 Iowa, 63 (alteration in note in different ink and handwriting, but no interlineation or erasure); Ault v. Fleming, 7 Iowa, 143; Wilson v. Harris, 35 Iowa, 507; Hagan v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 321, 25 Am. St. Rep. 493, 46 N. W. 1114 (fire insurance policy); THARP v. JAMISON (deed).

Accordingly, in this jurisdiction the party alleging an alteration in an instrument since execution must prove it. Van Horn v. Bell, 11 Iowa, 465, 79 Am. Dec. 506 (mortgage); Odell v. Gallup, 62 Iowa, 253, 17 N. W. 502 (note); Shroeder v. Webster, 88 Iowa, 627, 55 N. W. 569 (note); McGee v. Allison, 94 Iowa, 527, 63 N. W. 322 (deed, alteration in different colored ink); THARP v. JAMISON (deed).

But in two Iowa cases, it was held that the burden of explaining such alteration was upon the party offering the instrument in evidence. Maguire v. Eichmeier, 109 Iowa, 301, 80 N. W. 395 (note); Rambousek v. Supreme Council, M. T. 119 Iowa, 263, 93 N. W. 277 (receipt).

Me.—Gooch v. Bryant, 13 Me. 386 (note); Crabtree v. Clark, 20 Me. 337 (note, part of writing in one hand and part in another); Belfast Nat. Bank v. Harriman, 68 Me. 522 (note); Dodge v. Haskell, 69 Me. 429 (note); Crosswell v. Labree, 81 Me. 44, 10 Am. St. Rep. 238, 16 Atl. 331 (note).

Mass.—Ely v. Ely, 6 Gray, 439 (mortgage); Simpson v. Davis, 119 Mass. 269, 20 Am. Rep. 324 (bill of exchange); Newman v. Wallace, 121 Mass. 323 (note).

Minn.—Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 4 L.R.A. 196, 12 Am. St. Rep. 754, 42 N. W. 467 (note, alteration in different colored ink.)

Miss.—In Mississippi, the whole question of alteration is for the jury, but in the absence of any evidence which will satisfy their minds, the presumption of fact will be that the alteration was after execution. Wilson v. Henderson, 9 Smedes & M. 375, 48 Am. Dec. 716 (note; but such a presumption must be very much weakened, if not destroyed, when the alteration operates prejudicially to the holder); Commercial & R. Bank v. Lum, 7 How. (Miss.) 414 (note); Croft v. White, 36 Miss. 455 (note).

But this presumption of fact against the instrument will not arise when the alteration is only an interlineation in a contract in different ink and handwriting, and only a repetition of another phrase in the body of the instrument not interlined (Ellison v. Mobile & O. R. Co. 36 Miss. 572); nor when the same situation arises in respect to a deed (Gordon v. Sizer, 39 Miss. 805). And in Jackson v. Day, 80 Miss. 800, a case of an altered note, it was said that the burden was on the party asserting a subsequent alteration, to prove it.

N. J.—Sayre v. Reynolds, 5 N. J. L. 737 (note, no presumption of forgery, especially where the debtor has made several payments upon it); Cumberland Bank v. Hall, 6 N. J. L. 215 (note); Den ex dem. Farlee v. Farlee, 21 N. J. L. 279 (deed); holder need not explain where the alteration is against his interest, and, if no evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed to have been made at or before execution); Hunt v. Gray, 35 N. J. L. 227, 10 Am. Rep. 232 (note); Hoe v. Jarman, 39 N. J. L. 523 (deed).

b. Special circumstances and cases.

1. Suspicious alteration.

Although, as shown above, the courts are in direct conflict as to the general rules, diverging upon three lines (II. a, 1, 2, and 3); yet, starting, as they do, with these opposing presumptions in the abstract sense, when applying the rules to certain concrete situations, they all arrive at the same conclusion. Thus, they all agree that a suspicious alteration will be presumed to have been made after the execution of the instrument.

In jurisdictions committed in general to the presumption against the instrument (II. a, 2), the result in the class of cases now under consideration may be referred to the application of the general rule; but in jurisdictions committed in general to the presumption in favor of the instrument (II. a, 1), or in jurisdictions which in general indulge no presumption (II. a, 3), the result in these cases is to be attributed to an exception to the general rule.

In general, whenever an instrument labors under suspicion from an apparent alteration, in the legal sense of that term, the presumption is that the alteration was made subsequent to execution, and the party claiming under or offering the instrument a evidence is required to explain and remove such suspicion and overcome the presumption. Under this rule the explanation is sometimes required before the instrument is admitted in evidence, but often it will be admitted, and the explanation will be received before the jury. See also II. a, 2.

In Cox v. Palmer, 1 McCrary, 431, 3 Fed. 16, after stating that he thinks the conflict in authority upon this point is apparent only, and not real, McCrary, Ch. J., goes on to state the one rule that in his opinion governs in all these cases, as follows: "If the interlineation is in itself suspicious, as, if it appears to be contrary to the probable meaning of the instrument as it stood before the insertion of the interlined words; or if it is in a handwriting different from the body of the instrument, or appears to have been written with different ink,—in all such cases, if the court considers the interlineation suspicious on its face, the presumption will be that it was an unauthorized alteration after execution. On the other hand, if the interlineation appears in the same handwriting with the original instrument, and bears no evidence on its face of having been made subsequent to the execution of the instrument, and especially if it only makes clear what was the evident intention of the parties, the law will presume that it was made in good faith, and before execution."

"In addition to these two leading and opposing views, different courts have adopted certain intermediate or compromise rules, none of which need be here referred to, except one, seemingly adopted by some very eminent courts, to wit, that the alteration raises a presumption against the instrument when it is suspicious; otherwise, not. But this furnishes no definite rule by which to determine when the burden is upon the holder to explain the alteration, and when it is not. Who is to determine, and by what test, whether the alteration is suspicious? And if held suspicious, when must it be explained,—before or after it is admitted in evidence? Evidence as to when, by whom, and with what intent an alteration was made, may be one or both of two kinds,—extrinsic or intrinsic; the latter being that furnished by the inspection of the instrument itself, such as its appearance, the nature of the alteration, etc. These things, considered in connection with the relation of the parties to the instrument, may often constitute important evidence. And it seems to us that the rule just referred to amounts to nothing more than saying that in some cases this intrinsic evidence may tend to prove that the alteration was made after delivery, and therefore throw the preponderance on that side, unless the holder of the instrument produces extrinsic rebutting evidence. Thus construed, we would find no special fault with the rule. But it is incorrect to call this a presumption of law; it is simply an inference of fact drawn from evidence in the case." Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 4 L.R.A. 196, 12 Am. St. Rep. 754, 42 N. W. 467.

The following cases apply this rule:

W. 675 (interlineation in city council minute book, which would destroy validity of legislative act).

N. Y.—Jackson ex dem. Gibbs v. Osborn, 2 Wend. 555, 20 Am. Dec. 649 (deed); Tillon v. Clinton & E. Mut. Ins. Co. 7 Barb. 564 (written consent of insurance company to change in application, especially where alteration unexplained would absolutely avoid the instrument); O'Donnell v. Harmon, 3 Daly, 424 (lease).

Ohio.—Marshall v. Wilhite, 4 Ohio C. C. 203, 2 Ohio C. D. 500 (note, erasure, and additional words in same handwriting and ink as rest of written material).

Pa.—Hill v. Cooley, 46 Pa. 259 (note).

Tenn.—Riseden v. Harrison, — Tenn. —, 42 S. W. 884 (deed).

Tex.—Collins v. Ball, 82 Tex. 259, 27 Am. St. Rep. 877, 17 S. W. 614 (Interlinea-tion in administrator's deed in different ink).

In several such cases it is said that the law presumes nothing, but leaves the whole question for the jury, before whom the explanation must be given. Welch v. Coulborn, 3 Houst. (Del.) 647 (receipt); Hollis v. Vandergrift, 5 Houst. (Del.) 521 (note); Wilson v. Hotchkiss, 81 Mich. 172, 45 N. W. 838 (alteration in note in different ink and handwriting); Sweitzer v. Allen Bkg. Co. 76 Mo. App. 1 (erasure with ink and pencil in certificates of deposit); German-American Bank v. Manning, 133 Mo. App. 294, 113 S. W. 251 (tax bill, alteration in different handwriting); Smith v. McGowan, 3 Barb. 404 (assignment of lease, alteration in different ink and written upon an erasure); Farnsworth v. Sharp, 4 Sneed, 55 (note).

But in Putnam v. Clark, 33 N. J. Eq. 338, in case of an altered assignment of mortgage, it was said that plaintiff, producing the instrument, and asserting subsequent alteration, and asking its cancelation, must prove his charges; he cannot rest his case upon a technical presumption arising from circumstances of suspicion.

And in Rollins v. Humphrey, 98 Wis. 66, 73 N. W. 331, where the name of one surety out of ninety-five had been erased from a bond which was approved by the county judge, the alteration was held to be not so suspicious as to require explanation.

2. Act of public officer.

Practically all the cases, whatever the general rule as to presumptions to which the court is committed, agree that an alteration in an instrument, which is the act of a public officer, will be presumed to have been made before execution,—at least if it has since been in his custody, or the alteration is in his hand. A public officer is presumed to act lawfully and do his duty, and he usually has no personal interest in the transaction.

This rule was applied in the following cases:

Ga.—Clayton v. May, 68 Ga. 27 (obliteration in bill of exceptions; certified copy reserved by clerk of court showed obliterated parties left out; presumed that obliteration was made by judge himself before filing); Smith v. Wrightsville & T. R. Co. 83 Ga. 671, 10 S. E. 361 (bill of exceptions; alterations presumed to be made before signing by judge); Bedgood v. McLain, 89 Ga. 793, 15 S. E. 670 (deed; alteration in same handwriting and ink, by an official); Collins v. Boring, 96 Ga. 360, 23 S. E. 401 (tax execution, official entry).

Idaho.—Dangel v. Levy, 1 Idaho, 722 (alteration in injunction bond presumed to have been made before bond was submitted to judge for his approval, and before it was filed in the case).

Ind.—French v. State, 12 Ind. 670, 74 Am. Dec. 229 (interlineation in indictment).

Iowa.—Warren v. Chickasaw County, 13 Iowa. 588 (county warrant).

Ky.—Welch v. Chandler, 13 B. Mon. 420 (interlineation in certificate of acknowledgment of deed in county clerk's record book, in different handwriting, record made by deputy, interlineation by clerk himself; presumed to have been made before deed first delivered out of his office).

La.—State v. Boisseau, 1 Rob. (La.) 388 (interlineation in bail bond in same ink and handwriting, on printed form, because of lack of space upon the lines for all the writing).

Mass.—Wilbur v. Wilbur, 13 Met. 405 (levy of execution).

Mich.—Hommel v. Devinney, 39 Mich. 522 (interlineation in public record of deed); Brand v. Johnrowe, 60 Mich. 210, 26 N. W. 883 (appeal bond).

Mo.—McCormick v. Fitzmorris, 39 Mo. 4 (sheriff's deed); Holladay-Klotz Land & Lumber Co. v. J. T. Moss Tie Co. 87 Mo. App. 167 (sheriff's deed).

N. Y.—People ex rel. Stone v. Minck, 21 N. Y. 539 (original statement of return of votes made by proper officials); Lazier v. Westcott, 26 N. Y. 146, 82 Am. Dec. 404 (remplification of the record of a judge of a foreign court, verified by initials of clerk); Devoy v. New York, 35 Barb. 264 (certified copy of oath of office, never in custody of party executing it).

N. C.—Sloan v. Stanly, 33 N. C. (11 Ind. L.) 627 (officer's return of levy).

Pa.—Stevens v. Martin, 18 Pa. 101 (interlineation in patent to land); Xander v. Com. 102 Pa. 434 (erasure in guardian's bond).

Wash.—Baylis v. Kerrick, 64 Wash. 410, 116 Pac. 1082 (deed executed by a county treasurer, erasure apparent, none on official word, and no fraud suggested).

3. Alteration immaterial to issue.

In a few cases, where the alteration was shown to be absolutely immaterial to the question at issue, the instrument has been admitted in evidence without any explanation on the part of the one offering it. Fletcher v. Cavalier, 4 La. 267 (copy of baptismal register); Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass. 307, 6 Am. Dec. 67 (alteration in deed to correct a name); First Nat. Bank v. Mack, 35 Or. 122, 57 Pac. 326 (alteration in indorsement on note, but not material in suit by indorsee against maker, who admitted its execution); Miller v. Reed, 27 Pa. 244, 67 Am. Dec. 459 (alteration in note in same handwriting and ink); Parker's Estate, 19 Pa. Co. Ct. 606 (interlineation in acknowledgment of copy of lease); Frey v. Weasner, 1 Woodw. Dec. 145 (alteration in note in different handwriting, but not affecting rights of parties, who were indorser and indorsee); Bashaw v. Wallace, 101 Va. 733, 45 S. E. 290 (bond); Williams v. In the case of an alleged alteration which is not apparent on the face of the instrument, the burden is on the party alleging it, to prove it. The presumption is that, if there has been any alteration, it was made before execution.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

BAR ASSOCIATION OF THE CITY OF BOSTON

v.

PETER J. CASEY.

(211 Mass. 187, 97 N. E. 751.)

Judge — qualification — disbarment proceedings — membership in bar association.

That a judge is an honorary member of a bar association does not disqualify him

Note. — Membership in bar association as disqualification of judge to preside at disbarment proceedings instituted by association.

A search has disclosed but two cases previous to BAR ASSO. v. CASEY, where the question of the disqualification of a judge by reason of his membership in a bar association, to preside at disbarment proceedings instituted by such association, has been decided. Both of these decisions are in accord with the result reached in BAR ASSO. v. CASEY, to the effect that such membership does not constitute a disqualification.

Thus, in Ex parte State Bar Asso. 92 Ala. 113, 12 L.R.A. 134, 8 So. 768, it was held that the membership of a judge in a state bar association did not disqualify him to to sit in proceedings instituted by the association for the disbarment of an attorney.

(February 29, 1912.)

EXCEPTIONS by respondent to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of a proceeding for his disbarment which resulted in an order of disbarment. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. S. Richardson and P. J. Casey for respondent.

Messrs. A. D. Hill and A. G. Grant, for petitioner:

Membership in the bar association did not disqualify the judges from acting on this petition.

Ex parte State Bar Asso. 92 Ala. 113, 12 L.R.A. 134, 8 So. 768; Bowman's Case, 67 Mo. 146.

The interest which disqualifies a judge cannot be a mere possible, contingent interest in the general subject to which the matter relates; it must be certain and demonstrable,—a relation by which the judge would gain or lose something by the result of the proceedings.

Northampton v. Smith, 11 Met. 390; Com. v. Ryan, 5 Mass. 90; Com. v. Emery, 11 Cush. 406; Pearce v. Atwood, 13 Mass. 324.

Hammond, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a petition filed in the superior court by the Bar Association of the City of Boston for the disbarment of the respondent for alleged misconduct therein set forth. In response to an order of notice, the respondent appeared and filed an answer. There was a hearing on the merits, and on April 9, 1906, an order of disbarment was entered. The respondent appealed, and at his request the case was reported to this court for the determination. The question presented is whether the disbarment of an attorney, although the association might be liable for the costs if defeated. The court said: "This corporation is not a commercial or financial concern. It is not capitalized; its members are not stockholders. Its purposes are social, ethical, and public, and not pecuniary or private. Its scheme involves no element of gain or loss pecuniarily to its membership. It is supported by fixed annual dues exacted from its members, and these would neither be increased nor diminished by any possible result of this litigation. It has authority to acquire and hold property within certain limits of value. Whether it has acquired any property does not appear from the return, and if the respondent seeks any advantage by reason of tion of the question whether, under the findings of fact made by the judge, "the order of disbarment was justified as a matter of law." After full argument in this court the order of disbarment was affirmed. 196 Mass. 100, 81 N. E. 892. Thereupon the respondent filed in the superior court a motion to vacate the order of disbarment and in arrest of judgment, and afterwards a motion for a new trial and several other motions which were heard and determined adversely to the respondent; and upon appeals, seven in number, the respondent again brought the case to this court, where, after due hearing, the orders appealed from were all affirmed and it was ordered that judgment be entered in the superior court in accordance with the order of disbarment of April 9, 1906. 204 Mass. 331, 90 N. E. 584. After the issue of the rescript and before final judgment in the superior court, the respondent filed there a motion to set aside all orders, decisions, and findings theretofore made in that court, and also a motion in arrest of judgment.

At the hearing on these motions it appeared that Mr. Justice Fessenden, who issued the original order to show cause, Mr. Justice Fox, who heard the cause on the merits and made the finding thereon and the order of disbarment of April 9, 1906, and Mr. Justice Pierce, who made a certain order as to the disbarment, were respectively, at the times in which they thus acted, honorary members of the Bar Association of the City of Boston, in whose name the petition was filed. The respondent in substance asked the court to rule that these several judges, being such members, were thereby disqualified to sit in the case. The court refused so to rule, and ruled that upon all the evidence neither of these judges "was disqualified to act and find as . . . [he] did find, by reason of interest or otherwise." The respondent also asked for a ruling "that all the orders and findings in the proceedings in the said petition are null and void." This also the court refused to give, and denied the motion. To these refusals to rule and to the ruling actually made the respondent excepted. It is doubtful whether this last request, fairly construed, is intended to cover any other ground for the nullity of the acts of the court except that arising from the alleged disqualification of the judges. The respondent's brief, however, touches upon some other reasons why the acts are null and void; but even if he relies upon any such other reasons, they raise only such questions as have been heretofore determined in this case, or such as are no longer open to him at this stage. The only question open to him now is whether the judges, being honorary members of the incorporated bar association, were thereby disqualified to act.

It is urged by the prosecution that even this is not now open to him; that, notwithstanding his affidavit that he was ignorant of the relation until after the last rescript from this court, he has not shown due diligence in ascertaining the facts about the association and the relation of the judges to it. But we are not inclined to decide the case upon so narrow a ground, even if it were possible to do so. The question of ownership of property, his interest in which as a member would be affected by any judgment that might be rendered in this cause, it was upon him to return the fact. But conceding that we must assume that the association did own property to the limits of its power in that respect, and conceding, further, that the interest of members in that property was such that, upon the dissolution of the corporation, each member would be entitled to a distributive share of it,—a proposition unsupported by authority,—still this interest would be entirely too remote and speculative to disqualify the member from sitting as judge or juror in a case to which the corporation is a party. The interest which will disqualify must be a pecuniary one, or one affecting the individual rights of the judge. The fact that dues which he pays to the association may have to be appropriated to the satisfaction of a judgment for costs cannot constitute such interest, since the dues are paid for that purpose, among others, whether in contemplation of such judgment or not, and the amount of his liability in that respect is not affected by the rendition of 35 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a judgment for costs against the association. Moreover, 'the liability of pecuniary gain or relief to the judge must occur upon the event of the suit, not result remotely, in the future, from the general operation of law upon the status fixed by the decision.' 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 45 et seq. The diminution of a member's distributive share in the corporate property, depending upon a dissolution which may never occur, or never during his life or membership, or relief from such result, is certainly entirely too remote to be considered in any sense as occurring 'upon the event of the suit.' It is, on the contrary, if possible at all, a result of the remote future, 'from the general operation of law on the status fixed by the decision.'

And in Bowman's Case, 67 Mo. 146, it was held that the fact that a judge was an honorary member of the bar association of St. Louis did not disqualify him from sitting at a trial of a case of disbarment instituted by a committee of such association, since he had not a particle of pecuniary interest involved.

tion is likely to arise in the future, and for the information and guidance of the members of the courts who may be called to act in similar cases, it is better that it should be squarely met, duly considered, and finally settled.

There is substantially no dispute about the material facts. The association was incorporated under the laws of this commonwealth. Stat. 1886, chap. 22. This statute (§ 1) provides that the members of the Bar Association of the City of Boston, heretofore an unincorporated association, and all persons who shall hereafter be associated with them, shall be a body corporate under the same name, "for the purpose of promoting social intercourse among the members of the bar, of insuring conformity to a high standard of professional duty, and of making the practice of the law efficient in the administration of justice;" that (§ 2) for attaining the objects and carrying into effect the purposes of the corporation, it may acquire, receive, and hold real and personal estate, including a suitable building, library, and furniture, not exceeding $500,000 in value; that (§ 3) it may adopt a constitution, by-laws, and rules for the admission, government, suspension, and expulsion of its members, the collection of fees, the election of officers, and defining their duties, and for the management of the affairs of the corporation; and that (§ 4) all interest of any member shall terminate and vest in the corporation upon his ceasing to be a member "by death, resignation, expulsion, or otherwise."

By the constitution it appears (article 3) that every member must be an attorney. The constitution further provides (article 4) for the appointment of various officers and committees, among which is a committee on grievances, and defines their respective duties; also that (article 6) there shall be an admission fee and an annual fee. The method of dealing with a person accused of professional misconduct, whether or not he be a member of the association, is set out partly in the constitution and partly in the by-laws. So far as material to this case it is substantially as follows: The complaint is not laid before the association, but is referred to the committee on grievances, consisting of seven members, who, after such hearing as they deem expedient, shall report the facts and their recommendations to the council, a larger committee consisting of at least twenty-one regular members, including the president, vice president, treasurer, and secretary, and shall thereupon institute such proceedings against offenders as the council may order. The committee on grievances shall keep a record of their proceedings, which shall not be shown to any person not a member of the association, "except that any member of the bar not a member of the association shall be entitled to an examination of any proceedings of the committee affecting him." All meetings of the committee on grievances and of the association shall be private, and the cost of all proceedings before this committee shall be paid by the treasurer of the corporation, on the order of the chairman of the committee. By-law No. 3. The committee shall institute and carry on such proceedings against offenders, whether or not members of the association, and to such extent as the council or the association may order, and shall employ suitable counsel or agents for that purpose, the cost of such proceedings to be paid as in the case of the cost of hearings before the committee on grievances. Const. art. 4, § 7, pt. 3.

One of the purposes of the incorporation was "to insure conformity to a high standard of professional duty," and one of the methods adopted to this end is a systematic course of procedure for the detection and disbarment of unworthy attorneys, whether members of the association or not. Without stopping to dwell upon the features of this system, it is sufficient to say that in devising and pursuing it the association is engaged in a praiseworthy work, and that the system seems well calculated as well to protect the reputation of the person against whom an unjust complaint is made, as to detect and expose the person justly accused.

The association has a large library and commodious rooms. Among its active members are many of the prominent members of the bar in this vicinity. There are no shares of stock and no pecuniary profits. The relation of honorary members is thus set forth in article 3 of the constitution: "Any member of the association who may become a judge or justice of any court of record, and all other members of the supreme judicial and superior courts, shall be, while they shall hold such office, honorary members of the association, and shall be entitled to all its privileges, except that of voting, and shall be exempt from payment of dues." Such is the association and such is its method of procedure on charges of unprofessional conduct. Such also is the relation which the honorary members sustain to it.

The petition in this case was filed in the name of this association. The heading is as follows: "Bar Association of the City of Boston v. Peter J. Casey. Petition for Disbarment." It alleges that the respondent was duly admitted to the bar, that he has been guilty of gross misconduct, giving a detailed account of the same, and ends with the prayer "that the said Casey be removed from the office of attorney at law in this commonwealth, or that the court may make such further order in the premises as it shall deem expedient in the interests of the public welfare;" and it is signed "Bar Association of the City of Boston, by" its attorneys. It was the petition of the association, and there is no dispute that it was drawn up and filed under its authority.

Under these circumstances the respondent contends that every honorary member of this association was disqualified to act in this case. In support of that contention he says that this is a case in which the parties are two, the association on one side and he on the other; that every member of the association, whether regular or honorary, is therefore interested in the result, and is in substance a plaintiff, and that no man can be both judge and party in the same case.

It may be at once conceded that if the respondent's premises were correct, his conclusion would be the natural logical sequence. But the premises are not correct. They are based upon an entire misconception of the nature of the proceeding. This is not a proceeding between two parties where the court is asked to adjudicate conflicting claims as to some right, corporeal or incorporeal, and where a decision favorable to one party is necessarily to that extent unfavorable to the other. It is rather in the nature of an inquest or inquiry as to the conduct of the respondent. In the result of this inquiry the association has no interest. It can gain nothing, nor can it lose anything, whatever may be the result. It simply calls the attention of the court to the alleged misconduct of an attorney, not for the purpose of obtaining redress of any grievance suffered by itself, but only that the court, if so disposed, may inquire into the charge and act accordingly. Such this petition plainly is upon its face. It sets forth no wrong done to it; it asks for no relief. The prayer at the end of the petition does not ask for such a decree as justice and equity may require as between the association and respondent, but in substance for such an order as the court shall "deem expedient in the interests of the public welfare."

And such is the proceeding in reality. An attorney at law is not merely a member of a profession practising for personal gain, nor is he on the other hand a public officer. He is an officer of the court. Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 18 L. ed. 366; Splane's Petition, 123 Pa. 527, 540, 16 Atl. 481. The court, by reason of the necessary and inherent power vested in it to control the conduct of its own affairs, and to maintain its dignity, has a summary jurisdiction to deal with the alleged misconduct of an attorney.

A proceeding for disbarment is simply the exercise of jurisdiction over an officer, an inquiry into his conduct, not for the purpose of granting redress to a client or other person for wrong done, but only for the maintenance of the purity and dignity of the court by removing an unfit officer. As stated by Andrews, Ch. J., in Fairfield County Bar v. Taylor, 80 Conn. 11, 15, 13 L.R.A. 787, 22 Atl. 441, 442: "[The proceedings are] an investigation by the court into the conduct of one of its own officers, not the trial of an action or suit." In that case a petition or complaint was filed by a committee of the Fairfield county bar, and the following language was used by Andrews, Ch. J.: "Neither the whole bar of Fairfield county nor its committee were parties to an action in any proper sense. They were not prosecuting any matter of their own. They were not plaintiffs. They were performing their sworn duty to the court by bringing to its knowledge the misdoings of one of its agents." This is an accurate statement of the relation sustained to this case by the petitioner. It has no control over the proceedings, nor any rights as to them, not even to an order of notice. The question whether any action shall be taken on the petition, and, if so, what, is entirely within the discretion of the court. From the moment of the filing of the petition, the petitioner in law dropped completely out of the case, and the matter was entirely in the hands of the court to make the inquest on its own account, and to such extent as it saw fit. And Mr. Hill in his subsequent acts, either in the preparation of the evidence, in putting it in at the hearing, or in addressing the court, was in law not acting for and in behalf of the association, but as an officer of the court, by the authority expressly or impliedly conferred by it upon him. And that is so although the formal order authorizing Mr. Hill "to prosecute the inquiry and proceedings in relation to said petition, such authorization to take effect from the date of the filing of the petition," was not entered upon the record until February 25, 1907. The expenses of the hearing were payable out of the county treasury (Rev. Laws, chap. 165, § 44; Borraga v. Bristol County, 210 Mass. 299, 96 N. E. 719), and they were so paid.

"Usually . . . [proceedings for disbarment] are commenced by rule to show cause or by an attachment or summons to answer; but these are issued on motion or bare suggestion to the court, or even on the knowledge which the court may acquire of the doings of an attorney by their own observation. No formal or technical description of the act complained of is deemed requisite to the validity of such a proceeding. Sometimes they are founded on affidavit of the facts to which the attorney is summoned to answer, in other cases by an order to show cause why he should not be stricken from the roll; and when the court judicially know of the misconduct of an attorney, they will, of their own motion, order an inquiry to be made by a master without issuing any process whatever, and, on the coming in of his report, will cause his name to be stricken from the roll." Bigelow, Ch. J., in Re Randall, 11 Allen, 473, 479, citing Bacon, Abr. Attachment, A, Attorney, H, and cases therein cited; Rex v. Southerton, 6 East, 143, 2 Smith, 305, 8 Revised Rep. 428; Re Elsam, 3 Barn. & C. 597, 5 Dowl. & R. 389; 3 L. J. K. B. 75. See also Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 27 L. ed. 552, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 569; Ex parte Steinman, 95 Pa. 220, 40 Am. Rep. 637; Randall v. Brigham, 7 Wall. 523, 19 L. ed. 286.

The nature of the present proceeding is not affected by the fact that through all its stages it has been entitled "Bar Association of the City of Boston v. Casey." This is a mere matter of designation common in such a case in this commonwealth. See Cowley v. O'Connell, 174 Mass. 253, 53 N. E. 1001, 54 N. E. 558; Bar Asso. v. Greenwood, 168 Mass. 169, 46 N. E. 508; Boston Bar Asso. v. Hale, 197 Mass. 423, 83 N. E. 885; Bar Asso. v. Scott, 209 Mass. 200, 95 N. E. 402. In other jurisdictions a case for disbarment may be entitled either Ex parte or In re or In the Matter of,—followed by the name of the accused. And such a title seems preferable as indicating more accurately the real nature of the proceeding.

We entertain no doubt that the several justices of the superior court, whose right to sit has been challenged by the respondent, of their own motion, upon information giving them reasonable cause to believe that the respondent had been guilty of professional misconduct, could have conducted an inquiry into the matter either through a master or in open court, and that it is immaterial upon the question of their qualification that the information came by the petition, or from whatever way it reached them.

Exceptions overruled.

Orders affirmed.

v.

CITY OF BOSTON.

(211 Mass. 171, 97 N. E. 1100.)

Damages — personal injury — interest.

Interest cannot be allowed as damages for 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

a personal injury, even as compensation for delay in settlement.

(February 29, 1912.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defect in a highway. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fowler, Bauer, & Kenney, for plaintiff:

The court erred in refusing to allow the jury to consider the delay as affecting the amount of damages. The question is not whether interest should be allowed, or whether the jury must give damages for delay, but merely whether the jury have a right to consider the delay, if in their judgment the circumstances call for it.

Inasmuch as the jury was not allowed to exercise its discretion in reference to the matter of delay, the plaintiff should be given a new trial on the question of her damages only.

Mr. George A. Flynn, for defendant:

Note.—The general subject of the right to interest on unliquidated damages is treated in the note to Fell v. Union P. R. Co. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, and see later case, New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Roper, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 952.

In addition to any general rule refusing a plaintiff the right to collect damages for delay in personal injury cases, the right of recovery is limited by the statute to bodily injuries, and this has been construed to prevent recovery for loss of consortium and for medical expenses.

Harwood v. Lowell, 4 Cush. 310; Nestor v. Fall River, 183 Mass. 265, 67 N. E. 248.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries received by the plaintiff while a traveler, from a defect in a highway. The only question to be decided is whether in such an action the plaintiff is entitled to an instruction to the effect that in ascertaining damages the jury have a right to add to the fair compensation interest by reason of delay. The plaintiff relies on Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co. 141 Mass. 126, 4 N. E. 620, where it was held that in an action for injury to property "the jury, in their discretion, and as incident to determining the amount of the original loss, may consider the delay caused by the defendant." This case has been followed in other cases of tortious injury to property. Ainworth v. Lakin, 180 Mass. 397, 57 L.R.A. 132, 91 Am. St. Rep. 314, 62 N. E. 746; Atwood v. Boston Forwarding & Transfer Co. 185 Mass. 557, 71 N. E. 72; and Peabody v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 187 Mass. 489, 493, 73 N. E. 649. The rule in substance adopted in these cases is that, while interest is not allowed as matter of right, the time for which the plaintiff has been kept out of the use of his property, or the damage occasioned by the wrong of the defendant, may be considered, and an amount not exceeding the legal rate of interest may be included therefor in the verdict if necessary in order to give adequate compensation. This principle is applicable to cases where there has been a definite injury to specific property. The reason is that stated by Chief Justice Shaw in Parks v. Boston, 15 Pick. 198, in laying down the rule for the computation of interest where property is taken by eminent domain. The injury occurs and is finished in its results on a particular day, and can then best be ascertained, and exact justice would be done by a contemporaneous determination of the loss. An action for personal injuries is essentially different in its 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

nature. The damages are not complete and ended on the day of the accident, but continue for a greater or less period thereafter. The extent and magnitude of the injury are not infrequently unappreciated and incapable of reasonable ascertainment on the day it is received. Its degree of permanence is often deceptive at the first, and commonly the determination of conditions requisite for recovery is materially assisted by the perspective of time. The most helpful aids in learning the nature and degree of actual injury may be events occurring after the event complained of.

There is no fixed standard by which the compensation to be awarded can be measured. Its general rules have been stated many times. The sum of money fixed upon must be such as fairly compensates the injured person for the loss of time, the physical pain, and the mental suffering, both that undergone in the past and likely to occur in the future, and also money reasonably expended and to be expended in assuaging pain and in restoration to health. Elements that are past and also those which are to come must be considered. Most of them are not capable of mathematical computation. They can be settled only by the sound judgment and conscience of the tribunal by which they are assessed, and they are peculiarly within its province. The damages are to be determined, moreover, as of the day of the trial. It is apparent that interest, or considerations akin to interest, have no place in an inquiry of this sort. Interest is compensation for the use of money which is due. But the money which the wrongdoer is required by law to pay for the future suffering, expense, or loss of time of one whom he has injured, is not due until judgment is made up. It is not a debt, and does not become a definite obligation until a verdict or finding has been finally entered. It is composed to divers elements, together making up a gross sum, many of which may not have sprung into being on the day when the tort was committed, although directly traceable to it as a cause. If interest were properly chargeable on that which has already accrued, discount should be allowed upon that which relates to the future. Such a method of computing damages would be wholly impracticable. The amount of damages recoverable in actions of this sort as well as those under certain branches of the employers' liability act and under penal statutes for causing death, is limited to definite amounts. Plainly no interest can be allowed in instances of maximum injury.

It has been the practice in this commonwealth not to extend the rule of Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co. supra, to cases of this sort. Although the custom has been firmly established and continuous not to allow enhancement of damages by reason of delay, and personal injury actions have been very numerous for many years, the question has never been presented before for consideration. The grounds against such an extension of allowance of interest appear conclusive. This view is supported by the great weight of authority in other jurisdictions. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 35, 14 L.R.A. 548, 17 S. W. 882; Burrows v. Lowndsale, 66 C. C. A. 650, 133 Fed. 250; Jacobson v. United States Gypsum Co. 150 Iowa, 330, 130 N. W. 122-125; *Arkansas & L. R. NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS,

JOSEPH TAYLOR

v.

NEW YORK & LONG BRANCH RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(80 N. J. L. 282, 78 Atl. 169.)

Railroad — policeman — duties.

1. The duties of a railway policeman appointed on the application of a railroad

Headnotes by PITNEY, Ch. J.

Note. — Liability of private person or corporation for acts of special police officer appointed by public authority.

This note is supplementary to the notes appended to McKain v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 289, and Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Kelly, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 481.

The weight of authority seems to be that a corporation is liable for a wrongful assault or unlawful arrest made, or caused to be made, by a detective or peace officer employed by it in the course of its business as a watchman or detective, although he has 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — liability for acts.

2. If railway policemen appointed and commissioned under the act (P. L. 1904, p. 322, § 4) are employed in matters aside from their duties under the statute, the employer may be held answerable for what they do, the same as in other cases of agency.

Pitney, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of tort for false imprisonment, wherein the verdict and judgment went in favor of the plaintiff.

And in Brewster v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 68 Misc. 348, 123 N. Y. Supp. 992, where the defendant selected the employee, caused him to be designated "special officer," paid his salary, assigned him to work, and required him to do that which it was under a duty to perform, it was held that it was liable for an assault which the officer made upon one of the defendant's passengers. It was said: "It would be preposterous to hold that, because the defendant caused its employee to be designated as a 'special officer,' it was thereby relieved of responsibility for his acts. If, by virtue of his designation as a special officer, Kellerman became a public official, his duty to the public was thereby increased, but the defendant was not relieved from the same responsibility for his acts that it would be under for the acts of any other of its employees. It would, indeed, be an anomaly if the fact that the public power had been used to designate the employee of the defendant a public officer should relieve the defendant of responsibility for the acts which its employee performs in attempting to discharge his duties to it."

So, where a special officer of the defendant corporation, employed to preserve order on the station platform, at the instigation of a private citizen, arrested a passenger, it was held that he was acting in the regular course of his duty in making the arrest, and that the defendant was liable. Parke v. Fellman, 145 App. Div. 836, 130 N. Y. Supp. 361, wherein the court said: "The fact that he was also commissioned as a police officer, if such be the fact, does not relieve his employers for his unlawful acts committed in the course of his duty."

In Hedge v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. — Mo. App. —, 145 S. W. 116, where an employee of the railroad company, who was paid by it and charged with certain police duty about the depot, was also a special municipal policeman, but received no pay from the city, and performed no services anywhere except at the station, assaulted a person who had come to the station for the purpose of purchasing a ticket, it was held that the railroad company was liable for what the employee did, and could not escape on the principle that his act was that of a special policeman, instead of an employee.

In Schultz v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 201 N. Y. 230, 94 N. E. 601, affirming 134 App. Div. 260, 118 N. Y. Supp. 977, there are dicta to the effect that a special police officer whose duty it is to arrest persons committing crimes renders himself amenable to an action if, in the performance of that duty, he makes an unjustifiable or false arrest, acting maliciously, and that his employer will be liable also if the officer's acts are within the scope of his instructions.

But in Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Stumpo, 112 Md. 571, 77 Atl. 266, where the policeman appointed under a statute at the instance of a corporation, "for the preservation of peace and good order on the premises of the said company," made the arrest of a discharged employee on a public street of a town, not on the premises of the company, and for an act of which the corporation could not complain, it was held that the latter was not liable for the employee's act, since it was beyond the scope of his employment.

And where the plaintiff, in Buman v. Michigan C. R. Co. — Mich. —, 134 N. W. 972, while wending his way towards the defendant's station, became involved in an altercation with a municipal police officer, and the latter summoned the station night watchman of the railroad, who was also a duly appointed police officer and constable without pay from the city, to assist him in making the arrest, and the latter responded as a police officer, it was held that the railroad company was not liable, since its watchman, for the nonce, was acting outside the scope of his employment.

Likewise, in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Morrow, 88 Ark. 583, 115 S. W. 173, where the town marshal and his deputy were not employed by the railroad company, but were given a pass over the railroad merely to encourage them to discharge their official duties with reference to the company's property, it was held that the com-

The sole ground relied upon for reversal is the refusal by the trial judge of a motion made at the close of the evidence, that a verdict be directed in favor of the defendant. The proofs tended to show that in July, 1907, the railroad company obtained a judgment against Taylor before a justice of the peace of the county of Monmouth, sitting in the small cause court, in an action of tort, for $1 damages and $4.11 costs, and that on July 9, 1908, a writ of execution was issued thereon against the goods and chattels of Taylor, the writ commanding the officer, for want of sufficient goods and chattels, to take the body of Taylor and convey him to the county jail. This writ was placed in the hands of one Wilson, a constable, for execution, and by virtue thereof he took Taylor into custody at the Asbury Park station of the railroad company, being assisted in so doing by one Lankinau. Handcuffs were put upon the prisoner's wrists, but were removed shortly afterwards; and subsequently he was taken by the constable to the office of the superintendent of the railroad company at Long Branch, about 7 miles from Asbury Park. There by order of the superintendent, he was set at liberty. The plaintiff's contentions were that the judgment upon which the execution was issued had been already satisfied, so that the execution was invalid; that, assuming the execution was valid, the use of handcuffs amounted to unreasonable and excessive force; that the arrest was warranted only by want of sufficient goods and chattels out of which to make the judgment debt, and that Taylor owned and was in visible possession of personal property more than sufficient for this purpose; and that without authority the constable took Taylor to Long Branch, contrary to the direction of the writ of execution, which required him to be taken to the county jail. Without spending time upon the other points, we think the taking of Taylor to Long Branch was clearly in excess of the warrant of the writ. But the railroad company was responsible for this only on the ground that Lankinau participated in it, and that Lankinau was in this behalf an agent of the defendant, acting within the scope of his authority.

It is argued for the plaintiff in error that there was no evidence that Lankinau directed or in any way instigated Wilson to take Taylor to Long Branch. This contention is clearly untenable; there being testimony from which the jury might reasonably infer that Lankinau fully co-operated with Wilson in the arrest, and assented to, if he did not suggest, the taking of Taylor to Long Branch. Lankinau's agency for the railroad company in the matter was not so clearly demonstrated, but we think there was sufficient evidence to require the submission of the question to the jury.

It appeared from the evidence that Lankinau was a "state detective,"—a "state officer." It did not clearly appear, but seems to have been tacitly conceded, that he was a railway policeman appointed on the application of the railroad company, and commis-sionary of the railroad company. The railroad company was not liable for their unauthorized act of ejecting a trespasser from a train and assaulting him. The court was also of the opinion that, even if the parties were to be specially compensated for special attention to those things which would come in the line of the officers' duties as marshals, it would not constitute them agents of the railroad company.

So, in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Nelson, 87 Ark. 524, 113 S. W. 44, a railroad company was held not liable for an arrest ordered by its gate keeper, and made by an ordinary municipal policeman stationed at its depot to arrest offenders and protect life and property, and who was entirely under the control of the municipality, although the railroad company paid half of his salary.

A railway corporation in Massachusetts cannot escape liability for the false imprisonment of a passenger by its employees, even if they act as special police officers, under the provisions of the statute of 1898, § 282, which authorizes their appointment, because § 2 of the statute makes the corporation liable for their official misconduct to the same extent as for their torts when acting as their employees. Horgan v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 208 Mass. 287, 94 N. E. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

386. But in this case, since the person arrested had voluntarily complied with another statute (Stat. 1905, chap. 384, § 2) in securing his release, which statute expressly provided "that if the person arrested is released at his request, the officer who took him into custody shall not be liable for an illegal arrest or imprisonment," the corporation was held not to be liable either, on the principle that, the tort being joint, the discharge of one of the wrongdoers discharged them all.

It has been held to be a question of fact for the jury whether, when the special policeman performed the acts, he was acting in his capacity as servant or as public officer. Hirst v. Fitchburg & L. Street R. Co. 196 Mass. 353, 82 N. E. 10, wherein a police officer employed at a skating rink as a ticket collector, with orders, to maintain order at the rink, injured one while seeking to quell a disturbance caused by the latter.

But where it is so apparent that the person does not act in his capacity as special police officer to the company, as in Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Stumpo, supra, the court will decide the question as a matter of law. And to the same effect, see Southwestern Portland Cement Co. v. Reitzer, supra.

sioned by the governor, pursuant to P. L. 1904, p. 322, § 4. Assuming, however, that he had such a commission, and by virtue of the statute possessed the powers of a policeman and of a constable in criminal cases, there was still abundant evidence that he was employed by the company in the performance of duties aside from those of a railway policeman. The evidence was to the effect that he was regularly employed by the company, with the duty of seeing that order was preserved about its railroad stations, included in which was the duty of seeing that the hackmen kept their proper places. The plaintiff for ten years or more had been engaged in driving hacks during the summer seasons at Asbury Park. Repeated suits were brought against him by the railroad company in the justice courts during the summer of 1907. The records of four such actions were introduced in evidence, one of which resulted in the judgment upon which the body execution was issued. Lankinau figured as a witness for the company in each of those cases, and it was Lankinau who, in the month of July, 1908, made the necessary affidavit to show that Taylor was not a freeholder, in order that the justice might issue a body execution against him. Lankinau was not only present when Taylor was arrested, but, according to one view of the evidence, he may be deemed to have acted as a volunteer in the arrest, in the sense that he was not requested by the constable to lend assistance. And it was Lankinau who produced the handcuffs, which, as the jury might believe, were not needed, except for their intimidating effect. From this and other evidence the jury might well infer that a somewhat systematic campaign was being conducted by the railroad company in the effort to secure observance by the hackmen at the Asbury Park station, of the company's regulations respecting the mode in which they should ply their trade; that Lankinau was especially charged by the company with the conduct of this campaign; and that the arrest of Taylor was only one step in its prosecution. The duties of a railroad policeman under the act of 1904 (P. L. 1904, p. 322, § 4) are confined to criminal cases. In his official capacity he has nothing to do with arrests under civil process.

The case of Tucker v. Erie R. Co. 69 N. J. L. 19, 54 Atl. 557, cited by plaintiff in error, was quite different from the present. There the plaintiffs were arrested upon a criminal charge, although without warrant, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) and all that was done by the railway policemen about the arrest and subsequent prosecution was done in the line of their duty, under the governor's commission. The decision was that for their misconduct in arresting and prosecuting the plaintiffs, the railroad company was not responsible, on the ground that, although the policemen were appointed upon the application of the company, they were responsible for the proper discharge of their official duties, not to the company, but to the state. But the opinion of the chief justice who spoke for the supreme court distinctly recognizes that if the prosecution of the plaintiffs had been instigated by the company, or its officers or employees, or if what the railway policemen did had been done by them as agents of the company, and not solely as police officers, the company would have been legally responsible.

In our opinion, if railway policemen appointed and commissioned under the act of 1904 are employed by the railroad company, or any other corporation or person, in matters aside from their duties under the statute, the principal may be held answerable for what they do, the same as in other cases of agency. Their commissions as railway policemen cannot be made a cloak to shield the company from responsibility for what may be done by such agents under the employment of the company, aside from the strict and proper performance of their duties as officers under the act.

There being evidence justifying the inference that in what Lankinau did about the plaintiff's arrest, he was acting within the scope of his authority as agent for the defendant company, and the evidence justifying the further inference that he participated in the act of the constable in taking the plaintiff to Long Branch, in excess of the warrant of the writ of execution, it was proper to submit to the jury the question of defendant's liability to the plaintiff, and the motion for the direction of a verdict in defendant's favor was properly refused.

The judgment under review should be affirmed.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

F. L. ARMSTRONG.

Carrier — exclusion of persons from stations.

1. A railway company has the right to exclude from its depots and warerooms persons who come there in an intoxicated condition, and who are turbulent and troublesome and disturb and interfere with the agents and employees of the company in the discharge of their work, and may also exclude therefrom those who are reported to be dishonest, and on account of whose past presence in and about its depots and warerooms freight had been removed without the company's consent, and for which it was compelled to pay the consignee the value thereof.

Headnotes by SHARP, C.

Note. — Right to exclude undesirable hackmen, draymen, etc., from depot.

As to the right to discriminate between hackmen and other solicitors of patronage at depots, wharves, etc., see note to Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Davidson, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 777.

No case besides CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. ARMSTRONG seems to have passed directly upon the question whether or not a railroad company may exclude undesirable hackmen or draymen from its depot where such a hackman or drayman has a contract with a patron of the railroad company to transport either himself or his goods to or from its depot. But the principles upon which the decision in that case is based have been recognized by the courts in numerous instances, as is shown by the illustrative cases hereinafter set out.

As regards the soliciting of business at railroad stations, however, in those jurisdictions which adhere to the rule that the company may lawfully exclude some hackmen or other solicitors of patronage from entering its grounds or station to ply their vocation while it gives to others the exclusive privilege of doing so (for cases so holding see note above referred to), the railroad company could exclude undesirable hackmen, etc., from soliciting business upon its grounds, by granting the exclusive privilege to another, without reference to the element of undesirability; but of course, under this rule, undesirable hackmen, etc., could not be prevented from delivering goods or passengers at the depot. Under the contrary rule (for cases applying the rule see note above referred to) which prohibits discrimination between competing hackmen, etc., however, reliance for grounds of exclusion would necessarily have to be placed upon the fact that the particular solicitor of patronage sought to be excluded was un-

Case — exclusion of drayman from station — dishonesty — defense.

2. In an action for damages on account of the issuance of a letter notifying local shippers that a railway company will refuse to allow plaintiff to haul or handle any more freight from its depot, and to secure another drayman, it is error to strike from the answer allegations charging that it was necessary, in the course of his business, for the plaintiff so excluded to go about its platform and premises unattended by its agents, and to handle and have access to goods other than those for which he had orders; that, while plaintiff was acting as drayman, merchandise had been taken from its depot without its knowledge or consent, and for which it had been compelled to pay consignee; that said plaintiff was frequently at its depot in an intoxicated condition, was contentious, turbulent, troublesome, and disagreeable, disturbed and interfered with its agents and employees in the discharge of their work; had been arrested and convicted of drunkenness a number of times; had been arrested on the charge of desirable because of misconduct on his part.

But misconduct, if sufficiently gross, would seem to warrant exclusion in all cases; the only room for difference being as to what would constitute misconduct sufficient to warrant exclusion. As before stated, this principle has been recognized in numerous cases, the following being set out as illustrative:

Thus, in Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 596, 41 Am. Dec. 465, where, following continued annoyance to passengers resulting from excessive solicitation of patronage, notice had been sent to the local innkeepers that they would thereafter be excluded from the depot platform, the court, in an action for forcibly ejecting an innkeeper who had ignored the notice, said that the jury should have been instructed: "That the opening of depots and platforms for the sale of tickets, for the assembling of persons going to take passage, or landing from the cars, amounts in law to a license to all persons, prima facie, to enter the depot, and that such entry is not a trespass; but that it is a license conditional, subject to reasonable and useful regulations; and, on non-compliance with such regulations, the license is revocable, and may be revoked either as to an individual, or as to a class of individuals, by actual or constructive notice to that effect. That if the platform, as part of the depot, is appropriated to and connected with the entrance of passengers into the cars, and the exit of passengers from the cars, and for the accommodation of their baggage, and if the soliciting of passengers to take lodgings in particular public houses, by the keepers of them or their servants, is a purpose not directly connected with the carriage of passengers by the railroad, on their entrance into or exit from cars; that if, when urged with earnestness and importunity, it is an annoyance of passengers, and interruption to theft; and all of which facts were at the time known to defendant's agents and employees at its local station, where plaintiff had been engaged in carrying on his drayage business,—such allegations, if proved, being a justification of the company's act, such as will bar a recovery.

(November 14, 1911.)

ERROR to the County Court for Texas County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful interference with plaintiff's business. Reversed.

Statement by Sharp, C.:

Plaintiff's petition charged that on and prior to April 27, 1908, he was engaged in conducting for hire a general drayage business in the town of Guymon, Oklahoma; that as such drayman he hauled freight and express to and from the depot of defendant company for his customers upon their or-their proper business of taking or leaving their seats in the cars, and procuring or directing the disposition of their baggage, or if the presence of such persons for such a purpose is a hindrance and interruption to the officers and servants of the corporation, in the performance of their respective and proper duties to the corporation, as passenger carriers,—then the prohibition of such persons from entering upon the platform is a reasonable and proper regulation, and a person who, after actual or constructive notice of such regulation, violates or attempts to violate it, thereby loses his license to enter the depot; that such license as to him may be revoked; and if, upon notice to quit the depot, he refuses so to do, he may be removed therefrom by the [depot] superintendent and the persons employed by him; and if they use no more force than is necessary for that purpose, such use of force is not an assault and battery, but is justifiable. That as to the circumstances of the present case, if the superintendent had issued a circular, giving notice to all innkeepers and landlords that he had prohibited them from entering the depot to solicit persons to go to their respective houses as guests, and if this notice came to Hall [the offending innkeeper], and he afterwards, and after special notice to him personally, had attempted to violate this prohibition, and solicit passengers; . . . and if Power [the depot superintendent] believed that his [the offending innkeeper] intention was to violate a subsisting reasonable regulation,—then he and his assistants were justified in forcibly removing him from the depot."

And an analogous case which directly supports the principles applied in CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. CO. v. ARMSTRONG is that of Arkham v. Brown, 8 N. H. 523, 31 Am. Dec. 299, wherein, in holding that an innkeeper cannot exclude one stagecoach driver der, and that the services by him rendered were satisfactory; that on April 27, 1908, defendant, acting through its agent and employee, D. P. Bissell, with malicious intent to injure and deprive plaintiff of his usual means of livelihood, and to injure him in his business, and to boycott him, notified plaintiff's customers in writing that defendant company would no longer allow plaintiff to haul or handle any more freight or express; that the order was as follows:

Guymon, Oklahoma, April 27, 1908.

All concerned: We are advised by our special agents to refuse to allow Drayman Armstrong to haul or to handle any more freight or express. You will please secure another drayman.

[Signed] D. P. Bissell, Agent.

That in the serving of said notices, defendant company acted wilfully, maliciously, and without justification, and for the pur-and admit his rival to solicit business from the inn, if such driver came at a suitable time, in a proper manner, demeaned himself peaceably, and was doing no injury to the innkeeper, the court said: "But the jury should have been instructed that the defendant might forfeit this right by his misconduct, so that the plaintiff might require him to depart, and expel him; and if, by reason of several instances of misconduct, it appeared to be necessary for the protection of his guests or of himself, the plaintiff might prohibit the defendant from entering again, until the ground of apprehension was removed. Thus, if affrays or quarrels were caused through his fault, or he was noisy, disturbing the guests in the house,—interfered with its due regulation, intruded into the private rooms, remained longer than was necessary, after being requested to depart, or otherwise abused his right, as by improper importunity to guests to induce them to take passage with him,—the plaintiff would have a right to reform that, and, if necessary, to forbid the defendant to enter, and treat him as a trespasser if he disregarded the prohibition."

So, in Kalamazoo Hack & Bus Co. v. Sootsma, 84 Mich. 194, 10 L.R.A. 819, 22 Am. St. Rep. 603, 47 N. W. 667, the court said that no doubt a hackman wrongfully creating disorder or disturbance upon the depot grounds, or by frauding or deceiving passengers, could be lawfully ejected therefrom, and, persisting in such conduct, be forever debarred therefrom by the railroad company.

And in McConnell v. Pedigo, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 750, it was said that a railroad company has no right to discriminate between solicitors of patronage at its station where the discrimination is not necessary to the successful prosecution of its legitimate business.

pose of injuring and depriving plaintiff of his business, and that the acts done did injure and deprive plaintiff of his business, on which he at the time depended for a livelihood for himself and family; that defendant continued to refuse to deliver freight or express to plaintiff, notwithstanding the written orders held by said plaintiff therefor.

The amended answer of defendant company contains 10 paragraphs. The first is a general denial; the second and third charge in substance that defendant company was at the time a common carrier and maintained at Guymon a depot for storing goods, wares, merchandise, and other property received by freight or for shipment, and that there was at all times contained in said depot a large amount of freight belonging to its patrons, which it held in its custody as a common carrier or as warehouseman; that the freight by it received, whether for shipment from or delivery at Guymon, was unloaded on the platform, and there remained until the same could be stored in its warehouses. Paragraph 9 contains a specific denial of any malice toward plaintiff, in the issuance of said notices; says that the same was done for the protection of defendant's property in its charge and under its control, and for which it was responsible. Paragraph 10 charges that if defendant has sustained any loss of patronage, that it was due to his own conduct and habits, and not by reason of any act or fault of defendant company, its agents or employees.

Paragraphs 5, 6, 7, and 8, in substance, charge that the property of plaintiff's patrons was intermingled upon the platform with the property of other shippers, and that, while acting as drayman, it was necessary for plaintiff to go upon defendant's platform and premises unattended by defendant's employees, and to handle and have access to the goods, other than those for which he had orders; that at various times, while plaintiff had been acting as drayman, packages and boxes of goods, wares, and merchandise had been taken from defendant's depot without its knowledge or consent, and that defendant had been compelled to pay to the consignees thereof the value of such goods by reason of their loss; that plaintiff had frequently been to its depot in an intoxicated condition, and was turbulent, troublesome, contentious, and disagreeable, and disturbed and interfered with its agents and employees in the discharge of their work; that he had been arrested, tried, and convicted of drunkenness a number of times in Guymon during the times mentioned in the amended petition; that the agents and employees of defendant company had been informed that plaintiff was of bad reputation, reported to be dishonest, untruthful, and unreliable, and that plaintiff had sold and given away packages and boxes of goods, wares, and merchandise from his dray, which he had removed from the depot of defendant company at Guymon without its consent, and that the agents and employees of defendant company believed said charges and reports were true, and that plaintiff was unworthy of confidence, and that such a person should not be permitted to have access to its warehouses; and that a short time prior to the acts complained of in plaintiff's petition plaintiff had been arrested in the town of Guymon on the charge of stealing money, and that defendant's agents and employees at Guymon knew of such charge and report, and that from all the charges concerning said plaintiff, known to the agents and employees of defendant company at the time, it was believed that such plaintiff was untrustworthy and not a suitable and safe person to permit to have access in and around its depot and warehouse, such as was usually accorded to draymen at said depot. Plaintiff thereupon filed a motion to strike from the answer paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, because it was charged that the same did not constitute a defense to the plaintiff's amended petition. This motion was sustained in part, the court striking from the answer paragraphs 5 to 8, inclusive, which action of the court, among others, is assigned in this court as error.

Messrs. M. A. Low, C. O. Blake, E. E. Blake, and H. B. Low, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff had no absolute right to go upon the premises to carry on his vocation, and it was the duty of the defendant to protect its patrons from his misconduct, for a failure of which the defendant would be liable in damages.

Messrs. Wylle & Edens for defendant in error.

Sharp, C., filed the following opinion:

It is indispensable to the successful carrying on of the business of a railway company that passenger and freight depots be maintained at stations along its line. In Oklahoma this is made mandatory by § 26, art. 9, of the Constitution, which provides: "It shall be the duty of each and every railway company, subject to the provisions herein, to provide and maintain adequate, comfortable, and clean depots and depot buildings, at its several stations, for the accommodation of passengers, and said depot buildings shall be kept well lighted and warmed for the comfort and accommodation of the traveling public; and all such roads shall keep and maintain adequate and suitable freight depots and buildings for the receiving, handling, storing, and delivering of all freight handled by such roads." The liability of a railway company for freight under its charge and in its custody varies from insurance to reasonable care, depending upon whether the relationship existing is that of carrier or warehouseman; but, in either event, there exists on the part of the carrier a duty and attendant liability, dependent upon the facts and the law applicable thereto.

There being imposed upon the carrier the legal duty to provide and maintain a suitable freight depot and building for the receiving, handling, storing, and delivery of all freight received and forwarded by it, for the accommodation of its patrons, as well as for its own benefit, there is impliedly conferred upon it, as a necessary incident of its business, the right to exercise over its depots and station grounds such reasonable control and supervision as is necessary in the discharge of its duty to the public, and for the convenience, comfort, and safety of its patrons, as well as for its own protection. Donovan v. Pennsylvania Co. 199 U. S. 284, 50 L. ed. 198, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 91. That a railway company, both as the owner of the depot and station grounds connected with the road and as a carrier of freight, has authority to make reasonable and suitable regulations in regard to those making use of its property, and so long as the same remain reasonable and not in violation of some law or some regulation made in pursuance thereof, we think cannot be denied. Such regulations may depend largely upon local conditions. In order to be able to perform these imposed duties, it is requisite that the right to make reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of its business be given. In the proper discharge of its business, it is not simply empowered, but is bound, to exercise proper control over its property, and the property of others intrusted to its care. This power, which must be conceded, must of necessity be exercised through its officers, agents, and employees, which is the only mode by which a corporation can exercise its powers. While it may be said that by opening the doors to its depots, the company gives an implied license to any and all persons to enter, it may be answered that by so doing, it prima facie gives an implied license, but such license is revocable in its nature, and, if actually revoked and due notice given to an individual or or class of individuals, and they still persist in entering without a license, the owner has the right to exclude them by force, if necessary. Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 802, 41 Am. Dec. 465; Harris v. Stevens, 31 Vt. 79, 73 Am. Dec. 341.

In Summitt v. State, 8 Lea, 413, 41 Am. Rep. 637, it is said in the syllabus: "A railroad company may make and enforce by its agents reasonable and necessary rules for the transaction of its business, and for the proper and orderly management of its depot and other buildings open to the public. These rules, however, must be reasonable, and such as do not unnecessarily infringe upon the rights of the public and others having or carrying on business in connection with railroad traffic and travel."

In Com. v. Power, supra, it was said by Shaw, Ch. J.: "That if Power had been placed in charge of the depot by the corporation, as superintendent, he had all the authority of the corporation, both as owners and occupiers of real estate, and also as carriers of passengers, incident to the duty of control and management. That this power and authority of the corporation extended to the reasonable regulation of the conduct of all persons using the railroad, or having occasion to resort to the depots, for any purpose. . . . Or if the presence of such persons, for such a purpose, is a hindrance and interruption to the officers and servants of the corporation, in the performance of their respective and proper duties to the corporation, as passenger carriers, then the prohibition of such persons from entering upon the platform is a reasonable and proper regulation, and a person who, after actual or constructive notice of such regulation, violates or attempts to violate it, thereby loses his license to enter the depot; that such license as to him may be revoked."

In Thurston v. Union P. R. Co. 4 Dill. 321, Fed. Cas. No. 14,019, it was claimed that the plaintiff, who had purchased a ticket for transportation, was a notorious gambler and was then engaged in traveling on its road for the purpose of plying his calling. The court said: "It would not be obliged to carry one whose ostensible business might be to injure the line; one fleeing from justice; one going upon the train to assault a passenger, commit larceny or robbery, or for interfering with the proper regulations of the company, or for gambling in any form, or committing any crime. . . . As gambling is a crime under the state laws, it is not even necessary for the company to have a rule against it. . . . Whether the plaintiff was going upon the train for gambling purposes, or whether, from his previous course, the defendant might reasonably infer that such was his purpose, is a question of fact for the jury." 6 Cyc. 550.

Such regulations as will enable a railway corporation to execute its difficult and responsible duties, insure the comfort of its passengers, and protect itself from wrong and imposition, it has an undoubted right to prescribe, provided always that such regulations are reasonable and just. Hutchinson, Carr. §§ '989, 1078. In its passenger service, it has the right to require that all passengers shall preserve order; that they shall be seated, and not stand up in the passageways or upon the car platforms, and that they shall abstain from any act which tends to impede or interrupt the conductors and other employees in the transaction of their necessary business. Reasonable regulations may not only be prescribed, but enforced by such reasonable means as the company may have at its command; for, without some use of power to give them effect, such regulations would be of little value. Hibbard v. New York & E. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 458. The same rule should be applied with like force to those having business with the carrier concerning freight, and who may have a right to enter the depots or station grounds of the company. Certainly, it would not be said that a railway company, having the admitted right to evict from its train or station grounds those violating its reasonable rules and regulations, and with whom it may be at the time under contract for transportation, cannot exercise a similar authority, on proper occasions and under justifiable circumstances, over one to whom it does not directly have any contract relation, but who is acting independently of the company, either as a contractor, or for hire in serving its local patrons. Undoubtedly the authority exists to exercise the same reasonable control over its warerooms and depots and freight in its charge, whether indoors or upon its platforms, as it has over its equipment used in its passenger service.

In Decker v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 3 Okla. 553, 41 Pac. 610, it is said: "There is no doctrine of corporation law better settled than the right of a railroad corporation to prescribe reasonable rules and regulations for the government and use of its property. The only restriction under the law is that the rules must be reasonable."

That a railway company has the right to exercise reasonable control over those using for the time being its property must follow as a necessary incident to the right of property. It is not bound to admit to its depots and station grounds those who refuse to obey the company's reasonable rules and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

regulations, or who are guilty of gross and vulgar habits or conduct, or who make a disturbance, or are turbulent and troublesome, or those under the influence of liquor, who interfere with the agents and employees of the company in the discharge of their work, or whose reputation for honesty is bad, and which facts are known to the agents and employees at the time; and, a fortiori, whose characters are unequivocally bad; nor is it bound to admit to its premises those whose presence would interfere with the interest or patronage of the proprietors, so as to make the business less lucrative to them. Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221, Fed. Cas. No. 7,258. In this case, Story, J., said: "I think that the proprietors had a right to inquire into such intent and motives, and to act upon the reasonable presumptions which arose in regard to them. Suppose a known or suspected thief were to come on board. Would they not have a right to refuse him a passage? Might they not justly act upon the presumption that his object was unlawful? Suppose a person were to come on board who was habitually drunk and gross in his behavior, and obscene in his language, so as to be a public annoyance. Might not the proprietors refuse to allow him a passage? I think they might, upon the just presumption of what his conduct would be."

It was said by the court in Harris v. Stevens, supra, speaking of an implied license to enter the station house of the railway company: "The existence of this right in the corporation would seem to be indispensable to the comfort of passengers in getting to and from the cars, and in transacting that business with the agents of the company which is necessarily done at the stations, and also to the protection of the property intrusted to its care, for the safety of which it is held to the strictest accountability."

It is not necessary that those in charge of the property of a railway company be compelled to wait until some covert act, theft, or other offense be committed, that they may act to prevent the occurrence or recurrence of such act or offense. It is quite important and essential that it have authority to prevent, as the power to stop or repress the commission of wrongful acts, Vinton v. Middlesex R. Co. 11 Allen, 304, 87 Am. Dec. 714; Exton v. Central R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 350, 56 L.R.A. 508, 46 Atl. 1099; New Orleans, St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Burke, 53 Miss. 200, 24 Am. Rep. 689; Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hinds, 53 Pa. 512, 91 Am. Dec. 224.

The objections may be made that the exercise of such power is liable to abuse and may become the instrument of oppression; but the same is true of many other salutary rules of law. The safeguard against any unjust or unauthorized use of the power is to be found in the consideration that it can never be properly exercised except in cases where it can be satisfactorily proved that the condition or conduct, past or present, of a person, was such as to render it reasonably certain that, if permitted, he would again continue his former course of conduct.

Such being the case, it was error in the trial court to strike from defendant's answer those paragraphs thereof which set up specially and generally the alleged bad character of plaintiff. These were issues that defendant had the right to have tried out. If true, they would justify the defendant in the action of its agent in sending out the letters complained of; while, on the other hand, if, upon the trial, it should be found that the charges so stricken out were in fact untrue, it would go to show that defendant, through its agent, acted without proper justification in the premises.

Having reached this conclusion, we think also it was error for the court to give the fifteenth instruction, as follows: "You are further instructed that plaintiff had a right to receive freight, express, and baggage at the depot of the defendant so long as his customers, the consignees of such goods, were willing for him to haul it; and the fact that the plaintiff was a thief or a drunkard would not in law justify the defendant in refusing him that right." While one known to be a thief or a drunkard has the right to engage in honest employment, it does not follow, as in the case under consideration, that such a person, by reason of such employment, has the absolute and unqualified right to go unattended upon and about the premises of one not his employer, disturbing and interfering with the agents and employees of such third party, while in the discharge of their work.

Counsel for defendant in error in this case are admonished against the use of argument such as made during the trial before us. While, in the heat of argument, attorneys often say things they do not intend, still the language used in this case is of such extreme nature that it is hard for us to believe that the same was not said with the intent to influence the action of the jury, by appealing to that bias and prejudice which so often exists in such cases.

Because of the action of the court in striking paragraphs 5, 6, 7, and 8 from the defendant's amended answer, and in giving instruction No. 15, the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

NETTIE M. HOLYFIELD

v.

J. W. HARRINGTON et al.

and

G. A. PERKINS et al., Appts.

(84 Kan. 760, 115 Pac. 546.)

Note — alteration — ratification.

1. A material alteration in a promissory note may be ratified by any person affected by it, so as to bind him as fully as though he had authorized it in the first instance.

Same — necessity of consideration.

2. A new consideration is not necessary to support the contract of ratification. Section 5377 of the General Statutes of 1909, § 131 of the negotiable instruments act (Laws 1905, chap. 310), which provides that "where a negotiable instrument is materially altered without the assent of all parties liable thereon, it is avoided, except as against a party who has himself made, authorized, or assented to the alteration

Headnotes by PORTER, J.

Note. — Necessity of consideration to sustain ratification of unauthorized alteration.

This note does not include the ratification of unauthorized signatures, nor the improper filling of blanks. Cases resting upon estoppel are not included, nor those involving forgery. For the subject of ratification of forged instruments, see the note to Shinew v. First Nat. Bank, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1006.

No attempt is made to include cases where it might be inferentially argued that there was no consideration.

The great weight of authority is in accord with the decision in HOLYFIELD v. HARRINGTON, that a ratification of an alteration in an instrument does not require a consideration. Montgomery v. Crossstwait, 90 Ala. 553, 12 L.R.A. 140, 24 Am. St. Rep. 832, 8 So. 498; Dickson Bros. v. Bamberger, 107 Ala. 293, 18 So. 290; Payne v. Long, 121 Ala. 385, 25 So. 780; *Jackson v. and subsequent indorsers," is construed to mean that any one of the parties to such an instrument may assent to a material alteration, so as to make himself liable thereon, without any new consideration, upon the principle that he who may authorize in the beginning may ratify in the end.

Same — indorsement of assent.

3. At the request of the payee, the maker of a promissory note after it had been executed and delivered altered the time of payment from three years to one year. Two of the sureties on the note afterwards indorsed in writing upon the back of the instrument their agreement to the change of time. Held, that they ratified the change, and made themselves liable upon the note without any new consideration.

In Henry v. Heeb, 114 Ind. 275, 5 Am. St. Rep. 613, 16 N. E. 606, where there was a consideration, the court said: "Where, however, as in the present case, the act ratified is of an ambiguous character, and may as well be attributed to a mistaken assumption of authority as to a purpose to commit a crime, public policy does not forbid the adoption or ratification of the act; nor can it be said to be without consideration, especially where, as in the present case, indemnity has been accepted."

In Pelton v. Prescott, 13 Iowa, 567, the court said: "Suppose the alteration is made to correct a mistake (Chitty, Bills, 207), no new consideration is necessary to support the assent afterward given. And for anything that appears, these changes were made between the payee and the principal to correct a mistake, all of which was subsequently ratified and concurred in by the surety."

Grimstead v. Briggs, 4 Iowa, 559, frequently cited in this connection, rests particularly upon estoppel.

In Janney, S. & Co. v. Goehringer, 52 Minn. 428, 54 N. W. 481 (a case not strictly within the scope of this note as it concerned the filling of a blank), where it was claimed that a lease was erroneously admitted in evidence, as it appeared that when it was executed by the lessor it had a blank which was afterwards filled up, the court was not sure that there were not sufficient circumstances for the inference that the lessor authorized the blank to be filled as was done, but, nevertheless, said that there was evidence sufficient to show a subsequent recognition of and acquiescence in the lease as thus completed, on the part of the lessor and her successor, who was the defendant in the suit.

In First Nat. Bank v. Gay, 63 Mo. 33, 21 Am. Rep. 430, which was also a case without the scope of this note, as it related to an instrument not signed in the first

A PPEAL by defendants Perkins et al. from a judgment of the District Court for Wyandotte County in plaintiff's favor in an action on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James F. Getty and David F. Carson, for appellants:

The note sued on was materially altered for appellee's benefit, and thereby became void as to sureties.

place by the defendant, the court said: "No independent consideration is required in the case of an accommodation indorser, surety, etc., in the first instance, and it is difficult to see why anything more should be required on subsequent sanction than on original assent."

In State v. Paxton, 65 Neb. 110, 90 N. W. 983, the court said: "A material alteration already made may be ratified and adopted subsequently, and in that case the instrument as altered will be binding. 2 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 384. It has been held that such ratification and adoption of the altered instrument is, in substance and effect, a new agreement, and requires a new consideration. Warren v. Fant, 79 Ky. 1; Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 4 L.R.A. 196, 12 Am. St. Rep. 754, 42 N. W. 467. The weight of authority, however, seems to sustain the position that no new consideration is required. Pelton v. Prescott, 13 Iowa, 567; Montgomery v. Crossthwait, 90 Ala. 553, 12 L.R.A. 140, 24 Am. St. Rep. 832, 8 So. 498; 2 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 384. A recognition of the validity of the instrument, with knowledge of the alteration, will suffice. Stewart v. First Nat. Bank, 40 Mich. 348; Jackson v. Johnson, 67 Ga. 167. . . .

We think it is no less clear that sureties upon an official bond which has been delivered, but not yet approved, who desire to have the bond approved, and the principal retained in his office, may, to that end, ratify and adopt generally all alterations which may be required for the purpose."

In Humphreys v. Guillow, 13 N. H. 385, 38 Am. Dec. 499, the court, in holding that, where one of the makers of a promissory note spoke of its alteration, and thereupon gave security for the payment of it, and when he was asked to pay it, stated that it had been altered and he was not bound to pay it, but that it was justly due, and he would pay it, it was held that this was a sufficient ratification. The court said: "The facts proved were certainly such as to justify the inference by the jury that the defendants, when the alteration was brought to their knowledge, assented to it. If so, then the maxim, Omnis ratihabitio retro trahitur, et mandato equiparatur, will apply, and the ratification must be held to be in its effects equivalent to an original authority. If, as before suggested, an assent to an alteration be in substance an authority to make a new instrument, it will bind the parties, for the debt was not discharged by the alteration."

In Jacobs v. Gilreath, 45 S. C. 46, 22 S. E. 757, where the question was as to the statute of limitations, and as to an alleged alteration in a note, the court said: "If, as the jury were correctly told, a payment had been made upon the note within the statutory period, that would imply a new promise to pay the amount mentioned in the note, according to its terms; and if those terms were afterwards altered by the consent or with the acquiescence of the defendant, we are unable to understand how that could impair the validity of her previous promise to pay the amount specified in the note. If she, in fact, acquiesced in the change of the terms of the note, her previous promise to pay the amount specified in the note according to its original terms must necessarily be regarded as a promise to pay according to the terms as changed by her acquiescence."

In Matson v. Jarvis, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 133 S. W. 941, it was held "that a party to an instrument may ratify or consent to an alteration of it after it has been made, without a new consideration therefor. Trimstead v. Briggs, 4 Iowa, 559; King v. Hunt, 13 Mo. 97; Pelton v. Prescott, 13 Iowa, 567. And a subsequent ratification of the alteration will be equivalent to an original authority to make it. Humphreys v. Guillow, supra."

This decision does not, however, refer to Vilson v. Skaggs, 10 Tex. 298, a case which should be noted here, though strictly without the scope of this note, where it was held that the jury was correctly charged that, if the defendant authorized anyone to sign his name to the note in the first place, he was liable, and that, if he did not so authorize it, the action could not be brought. 3 L.R.A. simply on a bare promise to pay such a note signed without authority.

In Kilkelly v. Martin, 34 Wis. 531, the court said (though it seems that the point was not necessary to the decision): "The rule is well settled that an alteration of an instrument not under seal, by one party, with the assent of the other, will not render void the instrument; and if this be so, then his assent given after the alteration was made, and where knowledge of it was brought to him, ought to have the same effect, and be in all respects equivalent to such assent previously given, or to an original authority granted, according to the maxim, Omnis ratihabitio retro trahitur et mandato equiparatur. And upon this question, we find no disagreement among the authorities. Humphreys v. Guillow, 13 N. H. 385, 38 Am. Dec. 499; Perring v. Hone, 4 Bing 28, 12 J. B. Reference may be here made to Canon v. Grigsby, 116 Ill. 151, 56 Am. Rep. 769, 5 N. E. 362, in which case it was held that, where the maker of a promissory note which has, on his behalf, been delivered in purchase of property, and he receives the property with notice that there has been a change in the rate of interest in the promissory note since he signed it, and makes no offer to rescind the contract, nor to return the property, this is evidence of a ratification of the change.

It may be noted that in Wester v. Bailey, 118 N. C. 193, 24 S. E. 9, where a blank for the name of the payee was left in a note under seal, which was filled in before delivery by one maker, the other maker being absent, but assenting to it after delivery, the court said: "The only ground presented by defendant Bailey (Harper did not appeal) is that it was without consideration,—a nudum pactum. But this defense cannot benefit the defendant, because, when he acknowledged it, it became his bond, being under seal, and needed no consideration to support it. 'The law conclu-

The act of appellants in signing the statement on the back of the note as appears therefrom, with full knowledge of the same, was a ratification of the act of Harrington, their principal, in making the change in said note, and no consideration was necessary to be paid by appellee to appellants to fix their liability on said note.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Nettie M. Holyfield loaned to J. W. Harrington $1,000, and took his note for that amount dated December 12, 1907, due three years after date, signed by J. W. Harrington, with Mattie Harrington, G. A. Perkins, and John A. Stark as sureties. Two weeks afterward Nettie M. Holyfield went to the home of Harrington, and informed him that the time of payment was longer than sively presumes that it was made upon good and sufficient consideration."

Doctrine that consideration is necessary.

In a few cases the view has been taken that a consideration is necessary to a ratification.

In Mulkey v. Long, 5 Idaho, 213, 47 Pac. 949, it was held that where a surety upon a promissory note, after learning of an alteration therein, promises to pay it, such promise is of no avail being without consideration.

In Warren v. Fant, 79 Ky. 1, the court said, in the case of an alteration after delivery, in a promissory note on which it was sought to charge the surety upon his subsequent promise to pay it: "That the words in the margin were written after the obligation was delivered being admitted, and the jury having found that Warren promised to pay the debt after he was informed that the addition had been made, the 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

she desired, and Harrington altered the note by scratching out the words "three years," and writing in the words "one year." The note, as changed, reads as follows:

December 12, 1907.

One year

Three years after date we promise to pay to the order of Mrs. Nettie M. Holyfield, one thousand dollars, at Value received, with 7 per cent from date until paid. Interest payable annually.

No. Due Dec. 12, 1910.

J. W. Harrington.

Mattie Harrington.

G. A. Perkins.

Jno. A. Stark.

A day or two afterwards Nettie M. Holyfield took the note in its changed condition to two of the sureties, Perkins and Stark, and asked them to consent to the note as altered. Thereupon they signed on the back of the note the following memorandum:

We agree to and accept change of time from three years to one year.

G. A. Perkins.

Jno. A. Stark.

In an action brought on the note as altered Nettie M. Holyfield recovered judgment, from which the sureties Perkins and Stark appeal.

The change in the time of payment was a material alteration. Negotiable instruments act (Laws 1905, chap. 310) § 132, Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5378. The contention of the appellants is that there was no consideration for their agreement to be further bound by the note; that the material alteration in the original note released them, and that a new consideration was necessary for decision is whether such promise renders him liable on the obligation, as if the addition had been made before he signed, or afterward with his consent. He was merely a surety, and we think it clear that no subsequent ratification of the addition, or promise to pay the debt, can bind him, unless made upon some new consideration. That he was not bound during the time that elapsed between the making of the alteration and the ratification or promise, all will concede. The alteration released him, and thereafter, before he ratified it or promised to pay the debt, he was no more bound than if he had never signed the obligation at all."

In Westloh v. Brown, 43 U. C. Q. B. 402, the court was of the opinion that no subsequent promise to pay a note which was void by reason of an unauthorized alteration could be a ratification; but in that case it was not shown that the defendant, when promising to pay the note, had actual knowledge of the alteration. B. B. B.

sary to support the new agreement. A material alteration in a negotiable instrument made without the consent of a party will discharge him. Horn v. Newton City Bank, 32 Kan. 518, 4 Pac. 1022; Bank of Herington v. Wangerin, 65 Kan. 423, 59 L.R.A. 717, 70 Pac. 330. But a party who consents to such alteration or authorizes it to be made will be bound by the instrument (Neg. Inst. Act, § 131; Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5377), and it cannot be doubted that such alteration may be ratified by the person affected by it, so as to bind him as fully as though he had authorized it in the first instance. Stewart v. First Nat. Bank, 40 Mich. 348; Goodspeed v. Cutler, 75 Ill. 534; First Nat. Bank v. Gay, 63 Mo. 33, 21 Am. Rep. 430. "It is quite obvious that, where all the parties to a bill or note expressly agree to a change in any of its terms, they cannot complain of such change as an alteration. They have as much right to change as to make a contract. And where all do not consent, those consenting are bound, while the rest are discharged. Consent may be given before the change is made, or it may be given afterward by ratification. It may be express, or it may be implied from custom, or from the acts of the parties." 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 1401. See also 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, 2d ed. § 1766; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 396. The ratification of such an alteration will be implied where the facts are such as to warrant the implication. Weed v. Carpenter, 10 Wend. 403; Bell v. Mahin, 69 Iowa, 408, 29 N. W. 331.

It is not necessary in the present case to resort to implication, because the appellants indorsed upon the instrument itself their written consent to the alteration. The real question here is whether a new consideration is necessary to support the contract of ratification. On this there is a slight conflict, but the great weight of authority is against the necessity for a new consideration. As a matter of fact, no independent consideration is required in the case of an ordinary surety or accommodation indorser, and there is no sound reason for requiring one in the case of ratification, where, by some act of the holder, the surety has been released. The following cases are frequently cited as holding that a new consideration is necessary: Warren v. Fant, 79 Ky. 1; Mulkey v. Long, 5 Idaho, 213, 47 Pac. 949; Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 4 L.R.A. 196, 12 Am. St. Rep. 754, 42 N. W. 467. In the latter case the alteration was fraudulent and amounted to a forgery by the holder, and in the opinion it is said that no case has been found "where it has been held that a forged instrument can be ratified so as to give the forger himself a right of action upon it." In the opinion it is further said: "If the alteration was not fraudulent, so that it did not destroy the instrument, or at least did not extinguish the debt, we can see how a subsequent assent to it would create a liability on the instrument as altered. Parties can alter their contract by mutual consent, and this requires no new consideration, for it is merely the substitution of a new contract for the old one, and this is of itself a sufficient consideration for the new. And what a party may assent to when done, he may assent to afterwards, so as to bind himself, if there be a consideration to support it." It is apparent, therefore, that the case is in accord with the weight of authority upon the precise question involved here. Among numerous cases holding that no new consideration is necessary are the following: Goodspeed v. Cutler, 75 Ill. 534; Pelton v. Prescott, 13 Iowa, 567; Stewart v. First Nat. Bank, 40 Mich. 348; Wester v. Bailey, 118 N. C. 193, 24 S. E. 9; Montgomery v. Crossathwait, 90 Ala. 553, 12 L.R.A. 140, 24 Am. St. Rep. 832, 8 So. 498; Payne v. Long, 121 Ala. 385, 25 So. 780; Kilkelly v. Martin, 34 Wis. 520; National State Bank v. Rising, 4 Hun, 793; Prouty v. Wilson, 123 Mass. 297; First Nat. Bank v. Gay, 63 Mo. 33, 21 Am. Rep. 430. In the latter case the Missouri court used this language: "There have been many refinements adopted about this doctrine of ratification, refinements which savor more of subtlety than of sound judgment. With some exceptions not necessary to be adverted to here, the general proposition is, however, undoubtedly correct, that he who may authorize in the beginning may ratify in the end. . . . And there is therefore no force in the point urged on our attention that there would have to be a new consideration in order to attach validity to a confirmatory act." Under the title "Alterations of Instruments" the editor of Cyc., after citing the few cases supra to the contrary, says: "But the better rule seems to be that any one of the parties to an instrument who may have become discharged because of an alteration therein may ratify the unauthorized act, so as to make himself liable without any new consideration, upon the principle that he who may authorize in the beginning may ratify in the end." 2 Cyc. 172. See also same title in 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 259, and 3 Enc. L. & P. 449. And to the same effect is State v. Paxton, 65 Neb. 110, 131, 90 N. W. 983, where the altered instrument was an official bond.

Moreover, the question seems to be controlled by § 5377 of the General Statutes of 1909, the negotiable instruments act, § 131, which expressly provides for the ratification of altered instruments. It reads: "Where a negotiable instrument is materially altered without the assent of all parties liable thereon, it is avoided, except as against a party who has himself made, authorized, or assented to the alteration and subsequent indorsers; but when an instrument has been materially altered, and is in the hands of a holder in due course, not a party to the alteration, he may enforce payment thereof according to its original tenor." No mention is made of any new consideration being required in order to bind the assenting party, but the construction we give to the language is that no independent consideration is necessary to bind any party to the instrument, surety or otherwise, who has himself made, authorized, or assented to a material alteration.

The contention is made that the court erred in directing a verdict, and that appellants were entitled to submit to the jury the question whether they signed the memorandum with knowledge of all the facts, and particularly whether the appellee concealed from them that one of their cosureties, Mattie Harrington, had been released.

The rule is that whether the alteration is material is a question of law for the court, and whether it was made with the consent of the parties is usually a question of fact for the jury. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 396, and cases cited. Here the ratification was in writing, signed by the appellants, and its effect was a question of law for the court the same as any other part of the instrument. Besides, both of the appellants testified that they signed the memorandum, intending thereby to give their consent to the alteration, and there was no evidence of any misrepresentations, and neither of the appellants claimed that any had been made. There was no controverted question of fact to submit to the jury, and the court rightly directed a verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

J. J. DAVIS, Appt.

(157 N. C. 648, 73 S. E. 130.)

Usury — household security — classification — misdemeanor.

1. A statute making it a misdemeanor to 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

take usury on loans secured by household or kitchen furniture is not invalid as tending to deprive persons lending on such security of the equal protection of the laws, since such articles furnish a proper basis for classification in dealing with usurious loans.

Same — shrinkage on sale — effect.

2. That the security did not in fact sell for the amount of the loan does not purge the usury in a transaction by which for a loan of $10 only $8.25 of which was advanced, a note is executed for $16.75 payable in thirty days, and secured on property worth $25.

(December 20, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth county, convicting him of taking unlawful interest. Affirmed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

There was evidence on the part of the state tending to show that on or about October 24, 1910, John Wolff, desiring to borrow $10, applied to one A. R. Bridgers, who was lending money for defendant; that the said Bridgers, with the knowledge, assent, and direction of defendant, advanced to said Wolff $8.25, taking his note to himself as attorney for defendant in the sum of $16.75, payable in thirty days, and to secure same took a chattel mortgage on the household and kitchen furniture of said Wolff; that the property included in the mortgage had originally cost about $75, and was worth at the time the mortgage was executed about $25; that Wolff paid on the debt $3.50, and, default having been made, the property was seized under claim and delivery and sold at public auction for $10.45. "The auctioneer cost $1, costs claim and delivery, $3 or $4, credit on mortgage about $4, and, after applying proceeds as indicated, there was balance claimed by defendant of about $2.50." There was evidence on part of defendant tending to show that there were claims included in the mortgage other than the money loaned, and that the usurious features of the transaction were without the knowledge or approval of the defendant. On a charge correctly stating the law as declared in the statute there was verdict, "Guilty." Judgment, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Mr. L. M. Swink for appellant.

Note. — As to the constitutionality of statutory discrimination as to interest rates, see notes to Re Sohneke, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 813, and State v. Sherman, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 898.

Messrs. T. W. Bickett, Attorney General, and George L. Jones, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The statute law of the state more directly relevant to the question presented (Revised 1908, § 3712a), among other things, makes provision as follows: "If any person, firm, or corporation who shall or may loan money in any manner whatsoever by note, chattel mortgage, conditional sale, or otherwise, upon any article or articles of household or kitchen furniture, shall take, receive, reserve, or charge a greater rate of interest than six per cent, either before or after the interest may accrue . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," etc. Under a charge which correctly states the provisions of the statute, the jury have found that usurious interest has been charged by defendant; that the obligation was secured by a mortgage on the household and kitchen furniture of the debtor. There is ample evidence to justify the verdict, and the conviction must be upheld if the statute itself is a valid law. It is insisted for the defendant that the statute is in contravention of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, in that it "unlawfully divides money lenders into two classes, those lending on household and kitchen furniture and on other kinds of property, and unlawfully discriminates against borrowers, putting borrowers having only one class of property, to wit, household and kitchen furniture, into a class different from the borrower having other kinds of property to offer;" but the position cannot, in our opinion, be maintained. The power of the legislature to make the taking of usury under certain conditions a criminal offense is well recognized (Ex parte Berger, 193 Mo. 16, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 530, 112 Am. St. Rep. 472, 90 N.W. 759, 5 Ann. Cas. 383; State v. Wickhoefer, 6 Penn. [Del.] 120, 64 Atl. 273); and the right of classification, in the enforcement of reasonable and proper police regulations on this and other subjects, is conferred, very largely, to legislative discretion.

In Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 43, 43 L. ed. 554, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282, the Supreme Court of the United States, the court having, with us, the final word on this subject, referred to this right of classification as follows: "It is not necessary to state the reasoning upon which classification by legislation is based or justified. This court has had many occasions to do so, and only lately reviewed the subject in Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594. We said in that case that 'the state may distinguish, select, and classify objects of legislation, and necessarily the power must have a wide range of discretion.' And this because of the function of legislation and the purposes to which it is addressed. Classification for such purposes is not invalid because not depending on scientific or marked differences in things or persons or in their relations. It suffices if it is practical, and is not reviewable unless palpably arbitrary,"—the limitation being that the "classification has been made . . . upon some reasonable grounds,—some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification,—and is not a mere arbitrary selection." *Gulf, C. & S. There is a purpose to be achieved, as well as a distinction, which justifies the classification." In Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. the court said: "The equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment admits of a wide exercise of discretion, and only avoids classification which is purely arbitrary, being without reasonable basis. Nor does a classification having some reasonable basis offend because not made with mathematical nicety, or resulting in some inequality." And in Engel v. O'Malley, 219 U. S. 128, 55 L. ed. 128, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190, it is said, approving the same statement in Heath & M. Mfg. Co. v. Worst, 207 U. S. 338, 52 L. ed. 236, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 114: That "legislation which regulates business may well make distinctions depend upon the degree of evil, . . . and although, when size is not an index, a law may not discriminate between the great and the small, proper regulations based thereon, when size is an index of the evil to be prevented, do not offend the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment." In McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 540, 53 L. ed. 315, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206, a regulation establishing a different method of mining coal, by which the wages of laborers were to be ascertained, between mines when less than ten miners were employed and those having a larger number, was upheld. And on this very subject of usury and in Berger's Case, 193 Mo. 16, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 530, 112 Am. St. Rep. 472, 90 S. W. 759, 5 Ann. Cas. 383, differing penal provisions were upheld in case of ordinary usury and when the charge was greater than 2 per cent per month. And in Wickenhoefer's Case, 6 Penn. (Del.) 120, 64 Atl. 273, between loans not exceeding $100 and loans of that sum or greater. If these various classifications have been sustained by our highest court, assuredly a law designed and intended to protect and maintain the home of the citizen should be upheld. If the schools of thought which tend to corrupt and undermine—if the forces which make for disorder and anarchy—should ever be able to combine and so far increase as to threaten our social fabric, it is the home, the influences that hallow and emanate from it, which will arise and be potent to save. Referring to this subject as a proper basis for classification, our attorney general in his argument before us has well said: "Prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, household and kitchen furniture to the value of $200 was exempt from execution. The lawmaking power of this state has always realized that the loss of those articles necessary for comfortable and decent living entails great suffering upon women and children, frequently resulting in the breaking up of a home, and in the creation of conditions which are a menace to the public health and to the public prosperity. The statute under consideration is a logical and lawful extension of the protection which it has always been the policy of the law to afford this peculiar class of property. The general assembly knew that the man who mortgages his household goods does so because he has nothing else to mortgage. He is the poor man, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) the illiterate man, and his poverty and his ignorance make him the easy prey of the usurer. The general assembly also knew that in some of the cities of the state there were springing up a class of men who were selling money, like furniture, on the instalment plan. It was to save the things necessary to the existence of a home from the grasp of such men that the act of 1907 was passed. We submit that the statute tends to preserve the domestic peace, to promote the family health and prosperity, and is a valid exercise of the police power of the state. It is not class legislation. It operates alike on all who take mortgages on household and kitchen furniture. It regulates a business, and does not create a class."

It was further contended that, inasmuch as the property on its sale had not repaid the actual amount of the loan, no usury had been received, and therefore no violation of the statute had been established,—citing Rushing v. Bivens, 132 N. C. 273, 43 S. E. 798. That was an action by the debtor to recover a penalty allowed by the statute of "twice the amount of usury paid;" and the court held, in effect, that, to justify a recovery, it must be made to appear that usurious interest had been paid in money or money's worth, and a note of the debtor, given therefor, did not amount to such payment. The case does not apply here, when the statute makes it a misdemeanor to take, receive, reserve, or charge a greater rate than 6 per cent. The evidence of the state tends to establish that "for a loan of $10 a note of $16.75 was taken, secured by a mortgage on household and kitchen furniture, worth at least $25," which would constitute a usurious transaction within the meaning of the statute (5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 886), citing Merchants' Exch. Nat. Bank v. Commercial Warehouse Co. 49 N. Y. 635; and, in any event, it appears, further, that on a loan of $10 for thirty days, $1.75 was reserved at the time the money was supplied. There is no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

No error.

ADOLPH KANNEBERG et al., Appts.

v.

EVANGELICAL CREED CONGREGATION, Respt.

(146 Wis. 610, 131 N. W. 353.)

Religious society — attempted diversion of property from trust — liability for counsel fees.

The trustees and majority members of a religious corporation who in good faith have attempted to make a use of the property which the minority allege to be a diversion from the trust for which it was acquired may bind the corporation for counsel fees in defending their position against the attack of the minority, although the minority are successful and the contemplated diversion is enjoined.

(Winslow, Ch. J., and Timlin, J., dissent.)

(May 2, 1911.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover a balance on account for services rendered defendant as attorneys and counselors at law, and for expenses. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action on contract to recover compensation for services rendered defendant.

The complaint was in the usual form. The amount claimed was $3,869.25 as a balance on account for services as attorneys and counselors at law and expenses. Defendant pleaded as follows, in effect: The services were rendered individual members of the corporation in an action brought by other members, to prevent the former from, as alleged, diverting defendant's property from the legitimate purposes of the corporation. The action of the church congregation in employing, or attempting to employ, plaintiffs, was had on Sunday when less than a majority of the membership was present. Defendants in such action wrongfully and in bad faith defended, and in so doing employed plaintiffs to that end, and to create such corporate liabilities as would deprive the adverse members of the corporation of any benefit from the litigation in case of their being, in form, successful. It was judicially determined that the conduct complained of in such action was wholly illegal and void. The services were in fact rendered to trustees of defendant as individuals, to sustain them in usurpatious proceedings.

The trial was without a jury, resulting in a decision, so far as need be stated here, to this effect:

(1) The action in which the services for which compensation is claimed were rendered involved property of defendant, and it was determined that the defendants therein were attempting to divert such property to a denominational use, inconsistent with the trust for which it was acquired by the congregation and held by the trustees.

(2) Such action was necessary to prevent such trustees from wrongfully changing the corporate name and the faith which it represented, taught, and for which it was maintained by the congregation, so such corporation would stand for a materially different faith than that for which it was organized.

(3) Plaintiffs in such action were successful, it being held that the conduct of defendants therein was wholly without authority.

(4) The minister and a majority of the congregation supported such defendants, and by a majority vote authorized, so far as that could be done, the defending trustees to employ plaintiffs herein, which they did. Pursuant thereto the services in question were rendered and the disputed expenses incurred.

(5) The reasonable value of such services, including the expenses, less payments made, is $2,548.70.

(6) Plaintiffs really served the trustees, and such members of the congregation as participated in the wrongful course aforesaid, as individuals, not the corporation, though the employment was ostensibly in the latter's behalf.

(7) Neither the congregation nor its trustees possessed power to employ attorneys to aid in furthering an attempt to divert its property from the legitimate use thereof.

(8) To allow judgment in plaintiffs' favor would partially accomplish, by indirection, that which was held could not legally be done.

(9) The litigation grew out of an honest difference of opinion between the control-

Note. — A careful search for additional authority confirms the statement that KANNEBERG v. EVANGELICAL CREED CONGREGATION is, apparently, one of first impression upon the question of the right of the trustees and majority members of a religious corporation to bind the corporation for counsel fees which they, in good faith, incur, in defending unsuccessfully an action brought by the minority shareholders.

Nor has any case been discovered involving the question, generally, of liability for the expenses of litigation between rival factions in a religious society. Upon this latter point, however, there are cases arising within private corporations, some of which are cited in the dissenting opinion of the KANNEBERG CASE. No reason is perceived why the principles there applied are not applicable to religious corporations.

For notes on various other points involving religious corporations, attention is called to the notes mentioned under the title "Religious Societies," in the Index to Notes to this series.

ling membership of the church corporation and the minority, with reference to the construction of the corporate constitution, and persistence of the majority in carrying out their ideas without first obtaining judicial or other authoritative construction; thus rendering it necessary for the minority to seek judicial assistance to prevent usurpation. The resulting litigation was not a friendly contest, but was resisted by the majority with determination to prevail over the minority.

Upon such facts the court decided as matter of law that plaintiffs had no legitimate claim against the corporation for services and expenses. Judgment was therefore rendered dismissing the cause, with costs.

A church corporation having capacity to sue and be sued necessarily has the right to employ attorneys.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented for decision is this: If a corporation—by a majority of its members acting at a time and in a manner which would be binding in a matter within its corporate power—in good faith decides a subject in controversy, and a minority of members, acting in like good faith, resort to judicial proceedings against the officers and the corporation to prevent such determination from being effectuated, upon the ground of its being a threatened usurpation, and the majority, in good faith believing in the integrity of their position, take corporate action, valid in form, by which the organization assumes the defense, authorizing such officers to employ attorneys to appear accordingly and conduct such defense, and the litigation goes on, both sides acting in good faith, to a final determination in favor of the minority, have the attorneys so employed by the corporation any valid claim against it?

The trial court answered the question in the negative, the idea being, seemingly, that if one takes employment from a corporation in respect to any matter,—in good faith thought by its dominant membership and executive officers, charged with the duty of carrying on its affairs, to be within the scope of the corporate authority,—yet he runs the chance of being denied compensation for his labor, if the disputable matter in respect to such authority be decided in the negative. If there be such a rule, applicable so broadly as the trial court supposed, there is a serious peril in working for corporate organizations which, we may safely say, is not appreciated by the great mass of mankind who are interested in or serve such artificial entities.

There are some principles to be taken into account in deciding the question presented which are plain, simple, and so familiar that discussion of them and support thereof by reference to authorities are unnecessary. They need only be briefly mentioned.

The rule is common that a corporation has no power except such as is expressly or impliedly given by the charter; that for any act outside the scope thereof, though ultra vires, the state only can interfere, or some party actually injuriously affected without his own fault; and no one can interfere to the prejudice of a person who has performed, in good faith, a contract with the corporation, in respect to such contract, unless it is contrary to public policy or prohibited by statute. A corporation has, inherently, by necessary implication, the right, within the scope of its powers, to be governed by its dominant membership or representatives, and, in case of necessity, to defend against judicial interference in respect to the matter, and also authority to incur all the reasonable expense to that end, such as that for counsel and other ordinary expenses of litigation.

What is within the scope of corporate power is ordinarily an administrative question, determinable, primarily, by the governing authority of the organization. If such authority reaches a wrong conclusion, so far as concerns contractual matters affecting third persons acting in good faith and reasonably, the corporation is bound within the limitations aforesaid.

Whenever the right of a corporation, or its duty constituted representatives, to do a particular thing proposed to be done, is challenged by an opposing minority of its members or representatives, acting reasonably and honestly, such majority and officers have the moral and legal right to stand by their judgment in the matter, and it is their duty to the corporation to do so if they reasonably and in good faith suppose the interests of the organization require it, and if that brings upon the corporation and its governing officers, or the major portion of them, an efficient challenge to defend in court, it is their right and duty to respond to the attack. Such defense is unavoidable unless the dominating membership and representatives, whenever their authority may be challenged by the minority, submit to the latter.

Can there be any fair controversy about the foregoing? It must follow that when the corporation and its officers were attacked by the action in which the services in question were rendered the right to defend existed, and the duty also, since it seems there was a fair difference of opinion, and defendants in such action firmly believed in the right of their position. The right to defend, as indicated, included the right to employ attorneys to conduct the defense. The right to employ counsel necessarily carried with it the duty to pay counsel for their services, regardless of the outcome of the litigation. Such right, all acting in good faith, quite plainly did not depend upon who was right in the controversy.

How can it be said that whether the corporation and its officers were right or wrong rules the question of whether the services appellants in good faith rendered must be paid for or not? In any event, under the circumstances, the acts of usurpation perpetrated or threatened did not include the contract with counsel. There was no usurpation about that. It is the undoubted right of a corporation and of its managing officers, acting in good faith, to employ counsel by whom to respond to a challenge to judicial combat. That right gives character to the claim of appellants, not the result of the litigation. That seems to be so obvious on principle, it is not to be wondered at that counsel have not been able to cite instances to the court where the subject has been directly involved and decided. The indications are that the logic of such situations furnishes little or no room for controversy, and therefore no one has ventured to raise the question presented now and persist to a determination of it in a court of last resort.

We do not overlook the fact that the trial court found the plaintiffs' services were rendered in fact for the trustees of the corporation as individuals. That was a mere conclusion supposed to follow necessarily, from the ultra vires nature of the acts sought to be prevented or corrected. The record plainly shows that the corporation, through its trustees, and by express authority of its members, employed appellants; that the contract of employment was fully executed on their part to their damage in the amount they claim, in case they cannot recover, and to the benefit of the corporation in the sense that it received the services rendered and needed under the circumstances. Whether it was pecuniarily enriched or not is beside the case. Moreover, the managing officers of a corporation have a right, as before indicated, to employ counsel to stand for it when challenged in court without any special authorization. 4 Thomp. Corp. 4866.

From the last foregoing it seems plaintiffs are entitled to recover, as counsel contend, even if the contract of employment be ultra vires. There was no bad faith at any point. The contract was fully executed, respondent receiving the services as stated. In such circumstances a corporation cannot successfully plead ultra vires to avoid performance on its part. John V. Farwell Co. v. Wolf (John V. Farwell Co. v. Josephson) 96 Wis. 10, 37 L.R.A. 138, 65 Am. St. Rep. 22, 70 N. W. 289, 71 N. W. 109; McElroy v. Minnesota Percheron Horse Co. 96 Wis. 317, 71 N. W. 652; Security Nat. Bank v. St. Croix Power Co. 117 Wis. 211, 94 N. W. 74; Eastman v. Parkinson, 133 Wis. 375, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 921, 113 N. W. 649.

The doctrine as found in the above and many other decisions in this and other courts is thus stated in Eastman v. Parkinson, 133 Wis. 375, 381, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 921, 113 N. W. 649, 651, 652:

"An ultra vires contract, one not within the scope of the corporate authority to make under any circumstances, which is no longer executory, and is not tainted by fraud, or clearly prohibited by statute, or condemned by sound public policy, cannot be impeached by the corporation or anyone representing it."

The court in this case, as we have seen, acquitted plaintiffs of everything in the nature of bad faith. There is no express statute prohibiting a corporation from employing attorneys to conduct its defense, or the defense of its officers, in the pursuit of what is honestly deemed to be within the corporate authority, nor any rule of sound public policy condemning such employment.

We are at a loss to see why the facts of this case, as found by the trial court, do not fall clearly within the doctrine stated. It is based on equitable estoppel. The idea is that, as between the aggregate stockholders of a corporation, and a person under contract with the organization, acting by its officers, regularly chosen and held out to the world as having authority to represent it, the stockholders, through the corporation, should lose rather than such person. The thought should not be indulged in that such equitable rule is based on the circumstances of the corporation being enriched at the expense of the person dealing with it in good faith. It is the loss which such person would otherwise suffer which renders the rule active. It applies to prevent such loss even though the services to the corporation prove to have been to its disadvantage. As stated in 5 Thompson, Corporations, at § 6017:

"The principle, properly understood and applied, extends to every case where the consideration of the contract has passed to the corporation from the other contracting party, which consideration may, on well understood principles, consist either of a benefit to the corporation or of a prejudice or disadvantage to the other contracting party. It is therefore not strictly necessary to the proper application of the principle that the corporation has received a benefit from the contract, but it is sufficient that the other party has acted on the faith of it to his disadvantage."

That doctrine is new comparatively, but it has been so generally adopted as to be properly considered a part of the common law of this country. The doctrine of ultra vires, as formerly applied to corporate transactions, proved, in time to be unadaptable to the new conditions created by the widely adopted method of doing almost all kinds of business by uniting a few or a large number of individuals into a single artificial person. Under present conditions, the ancient doctrine of ultra vires, and application thereof to transaction between corporations and those with which they deal, would be productive of incalculable injustice.

It may be that the modern doctrine is productive of injustice now and then, but courts cannot recognize one class or particular corporation to be subject to it and others not. It applies to religious corporations in their business transactions, the same as to banking or manufacturing corporations. There is no difference. It also applies the same when the corporation is small and the amount involved is large, as where the corporation is so large and the amount involved so small that the enforcement of the contract would have no appreciable pecuniary effect upon the organization. Absolute equality before the law applies to corporations the same as individuals.

True, this case seems to be one of great hardship,—the taking of a balance to make over $3,000, from a small corporation, a religious body, probably having very little, if any, property, except that used in the religious services of the congregation: moreover, being a moderate collection of individuals, we may well suppose only in moderate circumstances, as a rule; but that is a misfortune which the courts cannot take notice of for the purpose of turning a well-settled rule of law aside or make a new one. Cases of great hardship too often tend to influence the bending of legal principles to satisfy the facts of a particular situation so as to effect a supposed just result, giving judicial administration the cast of mere arbitration. We cannot escape the conclusion that the appellants have a legal right to recover for their services, leaving the corporation to deal with its officers if they committed any remediable wrong to it.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for judgment in favor of plaintiffs for the balance of their account as found by the trial court, with interest and costs.

Winslow, Ch. J., dissents.

Timlin, J., dissenting:

I acquiesced in the decisions Marion v. Evangelical Creed Congregation, 132 Wis. 650, 113 N. W. 66, and Id., 140 Wis. 31, 121 N. W. 604, deferring largely to the judgment of my associates upon the questions of creed with which I was quite unfamiliar. In those cases it was decided that the plaintiffs were right, and that the other faction, which included the majority of the members of the congregation, who therefore had control of the corporate offices and the church property, were in the wrong, and engaged in attempting to divert the church property from the uses for which it had been acquired to the inconsistent and antagonistic uses of an Evangelical Lutheran church. I think we should stand by those decisions.

From this viewpoint, the question here presented is: Can this majority, frustrated by these decisions in their attempt to do an act ultra vires the corporation, nevertheless charge the corporate property with the fees of their lawyers, earned in attempting to justify and uphold these ultra vires acts? Can they do so by employing these lawyers for and in the name of the corporation? A kindred question was examined apparently with thoroughness in McCourt v. Singers-Bigger, 76 C. C. A. 73, 145 Fed. 103, 7 Ann. Cas. 287. There certainly shareholders prosecuted for the corporation, to recover from defendants, funds of the corporation, and prevailed. They asked for an allowance, and got it, upon the authority of Internal Improv. Fund v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527, 26 L. ed. 107. In the case cited from the Federal Reporter, the court said: "The same reasons which justify an allowance out of the fund in favor of complainant for expenses incurred in restoring it require us to approve of the disallowance of such claims in favor of the defendants. . . . No authorities are cited by counsel or found thus sustaining defendants' claim, and we certainly shall not be the first to reward obstructionists out of a restored fund in proceedings necessarily and vigorously prosecuted to regain that fund."

Even if a majority of the stockholders in a stock corporation consent to ratify an illegal use of its funds, their assent would not bind a dissenting minority. Von Schim v. American Tube Works, 188 Mass. 74 N. E. 680. Directors and officers are personally liable for ultra vires acts. Stock, Corp. 6th ed. § 682. When the majority enters into litigation with the minority, costs are not to be paid by the majority out of the corporate funds. Pickering v. Stephenson, L. R. 14 Eq. 322, 41 J. Ch. N. S. 493, 26 L. T. N. S. 608, 1 Week. Rep. 654. See also Wickersham v. Crittenden, 106 Cal. 327, 39 Pac. 602. I think it conflicts with these cases to hold that the majority of members who are in charge of the corporate assets and affairs may bind the corporation, by the employment of attorneys to act in the corporate name, to uphold the wrongful acts of such majority. It is not a corporate expense. The result of deciding the doctrine in point in favor of one faction and perverting the other and heretical faction to serve the corporation with the fees of attorneys in effect gives the property, in which the factions are contending, to the lawyers. This is a sort of equity I do not understand. I think the decision in this case is opposed to principle and without precedent. I do not think the law is with reference to ultra vires contracts and the disability of the corporation. (L.R.A. (N.S.)) tion to repudiate the same has any relevancy to the questions here presented.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS
v.

WILLIAM CONNORS et al., Plffs. in Err.

(253 Ill. 266, 97 N. E. 643.)

Assault — intent to kill — alternative intent.

1. One is guilty of assault with intent to kill who points a loaded revolver at another to compel him to do a specified act which the assailant has no right to demand, under threat to kill him if he does not comply with the demand, although death may be avoided by such compliance.

Evidence — assault — prior threats — identity of parties.

2. Upon a prosecution for assault with intent to kill evidence is admissible that some days before the assault, threats had been made to the victim, if there is evidence tending to show that the persons making the threats were in the party which committed the assault.

Same — alibi — sufficiency.

3. An alibi sought to be established by one accused of crime on April 20, by showing that he had been taken ill about the middle of March and could not leave the house until after April 20, may be rejected where he is shown to have voted at elections on April 4 and 11, and subsequently, on cross-examination, fixed the time of his illness as beginning in December.

(February 23, 1912.)

Note. — Forcing one to do an act under threat to kill as an assault with intent to kill.

The few cases disclosed are in accord with the decision in STATE v. CONNORS, in holding that one who forces another to do an act under a threat to kill is guilty of an assault with intent to kill or murder.

Thus, in Thompson v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 448, 36 S. W. 265, where two prisoners attempted to escape from jail, and one rushed upon an officer and slashed him with a razor, and the other seized the officer's pistol, which fell upon the floor, and pointed it at the latter, and compelled him to go into a cell, it was held that a conviction for assault with intent to murder was proper. The court said: "The parties acted together in the assault. They made no attempt to injure the jailer after he went into the cell, but locked him in. There could be no question that the appellant and his codefendant, Hardy, in making the assault on the jailer, intended to make their Plaintiffs in error, William Connors, Peter Gentleman, Arthur O'Connor, and Edward Storgaard, were jointly indicted, together with Walter Stevens and Joseph Kane, at the June term of the criminal court of Cook county, for an unlawful assault upon Morgan H. Bell. In the first count of the indictment the plaintiffs in error and others were charged with making a felonious assault upon Morgan H. Bell with a certain revolver, to then and there unlawfully, willfully, and with malice aforethought kill and murder the said Morgan H. Bell. There were six other counts in the indictment; but since the verdict found plaintiffs in error guilty in manner and form as charged in the first count of the indictment, it will not be necessary to refer to the other counts. At the August term of said court, Connors, Gentleman, O'Connor, and Storgaard were escape. They did not intend to kill him if they could make their escape without taking his life, but they did intend to kill him if they had to do so in order to make their escape. They had no lawful right to resist the jailer, or to use force upon him in order to make their escape; and if, at any time during the struggle, they entertained the intent to kill him in order to effect that escape, and they used means calculated to accomplish that purpose, then appellant is guilty of an assault with intent to murder. Undoubtedly, when Ras Hardy, the codefendant of the appellant, was cutting and slashing the jailer about the neck with the razor, he had the intent and purpose to take his life, in order to overpower him and effect his escape. Appellant was a party to this assault, and participated in this purpose, and was as much guilty of an assault with intent to murder as the said Ras Hardy. Moreover, there can be no question of the intent to kill the said McAfee, when he drew the pistol on him and commanded him to go into the cell, if the said McAfee had refused to do so. The defendant had no right to make this demand of the said McAfee, and if he had refused to comply, and had shot him, and killed him, he would have been guilty of murder; and as he intended to kill, or make him comply with the unlawful command, he was guilty of an assault with intent to murder." And to the same effect is Hardy v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 400, 37 S. W. 434.

And one is guilty of an assault with intent to kill where he draws a revolver when committing a burglary, and points it at another, with the warning that if he moves he will be shot. Com. v. Burk, 8 Phila. 612.

And in Keesier v. State, 154 Ind. 242, 56 N. E. 232, it was held that a verdict of guilty of assault with intent to commit voluntary manslaughter should not be disturbed where there was evidence that the defendant, who was driving a light sleigh, met the prosecuting witness, who was driving a sled loaded with logs, at a narrow point in the road, and called to him to give the road, and upon his replying that he would as soon as the sled in front started, the defendant jumped from his sleigh and ran towards the witness, saying, "You give the road . . . I will kill you;" and, as the witness ran, fired at him.

In State v. Epperson, 27 Mo. 255, where the defendant was indicted for an assault with intent to kill for having threatened to kill an officer who was attempting to make a levy, if he went to the door of defendant's house, the point discussed was whether he held his gun in a sufficiently threatening position to constitute an assault. The defendant was held guilty, but it is not clear whether he was held guilty of a simple assault or an assault with intent to kill.

found guilty by a jury of assault to murder, and after overruling a motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment they were sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary upon the verdict of the jury. Stevens and Kane were granted a change of venue, and were not put upon trial with plaintiffs in error. The alleged errors in the application of the law to the undisputed facts are relied on by all of plaintiffs in error for a reversal. Plaintiff in error Arthur O'Connor contends that the verdict as to him is contrary to the clear weight and preponderance of the evidence, and the motion for a new trial should have been sustained as to him for that reason.

The facts out of which the legal questions arise, which all of plaintiffs in error contend were erroneously decided against them, are, in substance, as follows: It appears from the evidence that on and before April 20, 1911, in the city of Chicago, there were two rival labor unions of steam fitters and associated employments. One of these organizations was known as the International Association of Steam Fitters. The other organization was known as the United Association of Plumbers, Gas Fitters, Steam Fitters, and Steam Fitters' Helpers. For convenience the United Association of Plumbers, Gas Fitters, Steam Fitters, and Steam Fitters' Helpers will hereafter be referred to as the "United Association," and the International Association of Steam Fitters will be referred to as the "International Association." On April 20, 1911, a large two-story building was being erected for the use of the Hygienic Ice Company, facing west on South Park avenue, which runs north and south. Just north of Park avenue, running east and west, is Twenty-Sixth street, which is occupied, in part, by the tracks of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. The building being constructed had two stories, or two floors. On the lower floor there was a large room about 65 by 150 feet, and a boiler room and an engine room, from which a stairway led to the second floor. The second or upper floor of the building was substantially one large room. At the time of the occurrences out of which this prosecution grows the walls of the building were up, floors laid, and the doors and some of the windows were in place. On April 20, 1911, there were at work upon the two floors of this building about 30 steam fitters and steam fitters' helpers, who were engaged in installing steam pipes on the two floors of this building. There were also a few other workmen of other trades employed at the time on the building, making a total of some 40 workmen who were employed in completing the building. The steam fitters employed upon this building at the time in question were members of the International Association. Joseph Kane, who is jointly indicted with plaintiffs in error, had been a member of the International Association for many years; but on April 18th, two days before the alleged assault was committed, he had left the International Association and become a member of the United Association, and at once became a business agent for the United Association, acting jointly in that capacity with Maurice (or Moss) Enright, who had been a business agent of the United Association for some time previous. The headquarters of the United Association were in the Bush Temple Building, and a man by the name of Burke was the secretary of the general association of the United Association. The evidence shows that the United Association was seeking to absorb the membership of the International Association, and that for this purpose Burke, as secretary, had sent out a communication to all of the steam fitters, advising them to desert the International Association (which is also called the old association) and join the new one, known as the "United Association." It is a fair and reasonable inference from the proven facts that the "business agency" of the United Association to which Kane was appointed immediately upon his desertion of the International Association was given him, in part, as a reward for his desertion of the International and going over to the United Association, and with the expectation that his former connection with the International Association and acquaintance among the membership of that organization would make him a useful man in proselyting members from the International Association. About 10 o'clock in the forenoon of April 20, 1911, three or four men, led by Joseph Kane, appeared on the lower floor of the Hygienic Ice plant. Kane spoke to some of his old associates, and informed them that he was now the business agent of the United Association. Kane and his associates remained in the building a minute or two, and then either went to the outer door or stepped out of the door and in a few seconds reappeared on the lower floor with some 15 or 20 other men. There is no dispute as to the presence of all of the plaintiffs in error on this occasion, except as to Arthur O'Connor. The evidence shows that a large portion of the men who appeared in this building were armed with pistols. Their purpose in going there armed with revolvers is made manifest by what was done and said. Pistols were displayed, and the members of the International Association were commanded to take off their overalls, cease work, and go down and obtain cards of membership in the United Association.

and then return to their work. The men who were working on the lower floor went upstairs, where they were followed by the attacking party. When the men were all gotten together on the upper floor, they were lined up by the command of Kane and his associates, and then commanded to take off their overalls and go down and get cards from the United Association. Naturally, in the excitement consequent upon a sudden attack of this character, the witnesses, honestly, no doubt, differ in describing the occurrences that took place. There is, however, a general agreement among the witnesses that the plaintiffs in error and their associates, through threats of violence and by the presentation of drawn revolvers, sought to compel the members of the International Association to cease work, take off their overalls, and go down and join the United Association, threatening that, unless this demand was complied with, they would shoot or kill the members of the International Association. Morgan H. Bell, upon whom the alleged assault to murder was committed, at the time of the attack was at work on the lower floor. The evidence shows that some one of the attacking party, approaching Bell and Lefevre, said, "Get that big son of a b——." The men walked up to Bell, and plaintiff in error Storgaard pulled a revolver partly out of his pocket, presented the point at Bell, and told him to take off his overalls, or "they would bore a hole through him." Bell succeeded in getting away at that time and went upstairs, followed by two of his pursuers. Bell gives the following account of what occurred after he got upstairs: "There was some of them got me there, and put their guns up to me. One of them held two guns at my stomach, and another one at my head, and told me, if I didn't quit my fooling and get out of there, they would fill me full of holes." Plaintiff in error Connors is identified as one of the men who held a pistol on Bell, accompanied by the threat above stated. This witness states that the revolvers were held against him until he began to remove his overalls. Plaintiff in error Gentleman is also identified as one of the men who made the attack upon Bell. The evidence shows that similar attacks were made upon other workmen, who were commanded to take off their overalls under pain of being shot, and to go down to Burke, and get a permit to work. Two of plaintiffs in error, O'Connor and Connors, are shown to have made a similar attack upon one Lettker, commanding him to take off his overalls, and threatening that, if he did not do so, to bore a hole through him. Lettker complied with the request, as did also Bell and others, to the extent of taking off their overalls. Lettker says in his testimony: "I took the gentlemen at their word. You know they said they were going to bore a hole through me, and I didn't want to be riddled or killed, and I took the man's word." This witness identifies Kane, O'Connor, Connors, Gentleman, and Storgaard as being present and participating in the assault. Pistols were also drawn upon Kapritzki, and he was commanded as were the others, and to him it was said, "If you look for trouble, I shoot you like a dog;" and, again, "If you don't go right away, you will get killed." A police station was only a block away. Some of the workmen had apparently escaped unnoticed and notified the police, and about the time that Kapritzki was being assaulted there was a cry of "Jiggers!" and "Coppers!" and at that moment a number of policemen appeared upon the scene. When the police arrived, the attacking party made a hasty exit in all directions. Some of them ran down the Illinois Central tracks, some across the coal yards, and some in other directions. As he ran, plaintiff in error Gentleman was seen to throw a revolver away, and another, who went down the Illinois Central tracks, put his revolver by the fence, where it was afterwards picked up by a watchman and taken to the police station. All of the attacking party succeeded in making good their escape except plaintiff in error Storgaard, who was arrested by the police on the lower floor, and a loaded revolver taken from him. The presence and participation of Storgaard and Gentleman in this affair is not denied. Connors testified that he was not present, but he is not corroborated in any substantial particular, and the testimony is amply sufficient to justify a finding that he was present. Arthur O'Connor also denied that he was present, claiming that he was confined to his home at the time by illness. There is some evidence tending to corroborate O'Connor's testimony, which will be considered hereafter.

Plaintiffs in error contend that the trial court erred in giving instruction No. 9 on behalf of the prosecution. That instruction is as follows: "The court instructs you as to the intent to kill alleged in the indictment that though you must find that there was a specific intent to kill the prosecuting witness, Morgan H. Bell, still, if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the intention of the defendants was only in the alternative—that is, if the defendants, or any of them, acting for and with the others, then and there pointed a revolver at he said Bell with the intention of compelling him to take off his overalls and quit work, or to kill him if he did not,—and if that specific intent was formed in the minds of the defendants, and the shooting of the said Bell with intent to kill was only prevented by the happening of the alternative,—that is, the compliance of the said Bell with the demand that he take off his overalls and quit work,—then the requirement of the law as to the specific intent is met." The plaintiffs in error earnestly contend that pointing a loaded revolver at another within shooting distance and threatening to shoot unless some demand made by the assaulting party is complied with cannot be held to be a felonious assault with intent to kill and murder, for the reason that the intent is in the alternative and is coupled with a condition, and for that reason is not a specific intent to kill, which is necessary to sustain a conviction for an assault with an intent to murder.

All the authorities agree upon the general proposition that in a prosecution for an assault with intent to murder, or with intent to commit some other felony, the specific intent charged is the gist of the offense, and must be proven as charged in the indictment. Crosby v. People, 137 Ill. 325, 7 N. E. 49; Friederich v. People, 147 Ill. 50, 35 N. E. 472. Upon this and like authorities where the general rule is stated, plaintiffs in error contend that the intent to commit the crime charged must be absolute and unconditional; and that if a dangerous weapon is presented in a threatening manner, accompanied with a demand upon the assaulted party and a threat to destroy his life unless such demand is complied with, the offense cannot be an assault to murder. It is argued that the condition which accompanies the threat negatives the existence of that positive and specific intent which, under the law, is a necessary element in the offense charged.

No case decided by this court is cited by either party, and we are not aware that any such case exists that is conclusive of the precise question which is raised here. In support of the view that an assault with a loaded revolver and a threat to shoot unless the party assaulted complies with a demand is not an assault with an intent to murder, plaintiffs in error rely with great reliance upon the case of Hairston v. State, 54 Miss. 680, 28 Am. Rep. 392, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 6. In that case Hairston, a company with others, attempted to remove the personal effects of a laborer from the plantation of his employer, Richards, to whom said laborer was indebted on account of advances of money or provisions made to said laborer. Hairston was in the act of hauling away the household furniture when Richards attempted to stop the wagon, and took hold of Hairston's mules, saying that he could not move the household goods until his debt was settled. Thereupon Hairston drew a pistol and pointed it at Richards and said, "I came here to move Charles Johnson, and by God I am going to do it, and I will shoot any God damned man who attempts to stop my mules," at the same time urging his mules forward as he spoke. His manner was threatening and angry, and his voice loud and boisterous. Other persons who were accompanying Hairston, some of whom were armed with guns, pressed around Richards, as if they intended to aid Hairston if necessary. Richards was deterred by the apparent danger, and released the mules and the wagon moved on. Under the above facts Hairston was convicted of an assault with an intent to murder Richards. The conviction was reversed by the supreme court of Mississippi. The reasoning of the court in that case is as follows: Richards was in the act of committing a trespass upon Hairston's property by laying his hands upon the mules, and forcibly stopping Hairston upon the public highway. Hairston had a right to protect his property from such unlawful trespass, using no more force than was necessary. His threat to shoot was conditioned upon a demand which he had a right to make. In disposing of the case the supreme court of Mississippi uses the following language: "Here there was only a conditional offer to shoot, based upon a demand which the party had a right to make. While the law will not excuse the assault actually committed in leveling the pistol within shooting distance, it cannot, from this fact alone, infer an intent to murder. The intent must be actual, not conditional, and especially not conditioned upon noncompliance with a proper demand." A careful analysis of that case will show that the court laid special stress on the circumstance that the threat to shoot was coupled with a demand which the prisoner had a lawful right to make.

State v. Taylor, 70 Vt. 1, 42 L.R.A. 673, 67 Am. St. Rep. 648, 39 Atl. 447; Botsch v. State, 43 Neb. 501, 61 N. W. 730; People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 41, 22 Pac. 80; and Chrisman v. State, 54 Ark. 283, 26 Am. St. Rep. 44, 15 S. W. 889, are also cited and relied on by plaintiffs in error in support of the position assumed by them upon the question under consideration. None of those cases, however, are similar in their facts to the case at bar. They are all cases supporting the general proposition that a conviction for an assault with intent to murder cannot be sustained without proof of the specific intent to take life charged in the indictment. The rule stated in those cases is well established and has been frequently announced by this court. The Hairston

Case, above referred to, seems to be the only decision that lends any support to the position contended for by plaintiffs in error, and that case is clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. We think that the position of plaintiffs in error may be satisfactorily answered without repudiating the authority of the Mississippi case cited, and without in any way departing from the general and well-established principles laid down in the other cases relied upon. Unlawfully pointing a loaded revolver at another within shooting distance, in a threatening manner, undoubtedly, under all of the authorities, constitutes an assault. The character of the assault, whether felonious or otherwise, depends upon the intent of the person charged.

If an assault be made with a loaded revolver with an intent to kill and murder the party assailed, and the assailant is prevented from carrying out his felonious purpose by the intervention of some fact not of the assailant's own will, the offense is complete, regardless of whether the weapon is discharged or not. Hardy v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 400, 37 S. W. 434; Thompson v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 448, 36 S. W. 265; State v. Dooley, 121 Mo. 591, 26 S. W. 558. The foregoing propositions are so well established that we do not deem it necessary to elaborate them. In the case at bar the evidence shows that plaintiffs in error, or some of them, pointed revolvers at the prosecuting witness and threatened to shoot him unless he quit work, took off his overalls, and procured a card from the United Association. It will be noted that the demand made upon the prosecuting witness and others at work upon the building was one which plaintiffs in error had no lawful right to make. They might properly in a peaceful manner solicit persons to unite with their association, but they could not lawfully use force, violence, or intimidation to accomplish such purpose. The demand with which the members of the International Association were required to comply under pain of being shot by plaintiffs in error and their associates was unlawful, and plaintiffs in error had no right to expect that it would be complied with. The distinction between the case at bar and the Hairston Case is that in the latter the condition upon which the threat to shoot was made was lawful, while in the case at bar the demand was unlawful.

In McClain's Criminal Law, § 232, the rule applicable to the case at bar is thus stated: "If the threatened injury, coupled with present ability to inflict it, is conditioned on the party assailed refusing to do something which the assailant has no right to require him to do, it will constitute an assault, even though the conditions are complied with and therefore no violence is used." The quotation above made is supported by Thompson v. State, supra; State v. Morgan, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 186, 38 Am. Dec. 714; State v. Dooley, and Hardy v. State, supra; State v. Church, 63 N. C. 15; and numerous other authorities.

In State v. Morgan, above cited, the facts were as follows: Morgan was charged with an assault upon a man by the name of Cantrell. The assault grew out of a quarrel for the possession of a gun which Cantrell had. Morgan demanded the gun and Cantrell refused to give it up, whereupon Morgan stepped up within reach of him, held up an ax in a position to strike, and said: "Give up the gun, or I will split you down." Cantrell did not at the time give up the gun, but proposed some arrangement, upon which Morgan laid the ax down. The matter was arranged and Cantrell gave up the gun. The jury found that Morgan, at the time he went up to Cantrell and raised the ax within reach of him, intended to strike unless Cantrell gave up the gun, but did not intend to strike if Cantrell gave it up. In the course of the opinion Gaston, J., used the following language: "The present case is one of a very different character. The act was not only apparently a most dangerous assault, but accompanied with a present purpose to do great bodily harm, and the only declaration by which its character is attempted to be changed is that the assailant was not determined to execute his savage purpose unconditionally and without a moment's delay. He had commenced the attack and raised the deadly weapon and was in the attitude to strike, but suspended the blow to afford the object of his vengeance an opportunity to buy his safety by compliance with the defendant's terms. To hold that such an act, under such circumstances was not an offer of violence,—not an attempt to commit violence,—would be, we think, to outrage principle and manifest an utter want of that solicitude for the preservation of peace which characterizes our law and which should animate its administrators. To every purpose, both in fact and in law, the attack on the prosecutor was begun, and in the pause which intervened before its consummation, most happily for both parties, an arrangement was made which prevented the probably fatal result. But this pause, though intentional and announced when the attack began, does not prevent that attack from being an offer or attempt to strike. If a ruffian were to leave his rifle at a traveler and announce to him that he might have fifteen minutes to make his peace with his God, and the unfortunate man should save his life by prayers, by remonstrance, by money, or by any other means before the expiration of that time, could it be pretended that there had been an attempt nor offer to hurt him because the intent was not to kill instantaneously, and therefore did not accompany the act? Will it be doubted if a bully should present his pistol at a citizen and order him, under pain of death, not to walk on the same side of the street with him, whether there was an offer of violence because the purpose to kill was not absolute, but conditional, merely? Wherever the act is done in part execution of a purpose of violence, whether that purpose be absolute or provisional, makes no difference as respects the question whether the act be an assault."

The case of Thompson v. State, supra, was as follows: Two prisoners by the names of Hardy and Thompson made an attack upon their jailer for the purpose of escaping, one using a razor and the other a revolver. The revolver was pointed at the jailer and he was commanded to go into the cell. The revolver was not discharged. In passing on that case the supreme court of Texas said: "Moreover, there can be no question of the intent to kill the said McAfee [the jailer] when he drew the pistol at him and commanded him to go into the cell, if the said McAfee had refused to do so. The defendant had no right to make his demand of the said McAfee, and, if he had refused to comply, and had shot him and killed him, he would have been guilty of murder; and, as he intended to kill or make him comply with the unlawful command, he was guilty of an assault with intent to murder." The case of Hardy v. State, supra, was presented to the supreme court of Texas under a similar state of facts and the same ruling was made as in the Thompson Case.

The rule to be deduced from these cases is correctly stated in the quotation above taken from McClain's Criminal Law. An assault to murder, under this rule, may be complete where it is shown that the assailant, with the present ability to destroy life and do great bodily harm, draws a dangerous weapon on another and threatens to kill unless the party assailed complies immediately with some unlawful condition or demand. The law will not tolerate excessive force or intimidation for the purpose of obtaining or defending one's legal rights, when resorted to for the purpose of carrying out an unlawful enterprise it becomes criminal; and where there is an attempt, coupled with the present ability to commit a felony, and the assailant suspends execution of his purpose merely to give the victim a chance to comply with an unlawful demand, the offense is complete, even though the commission of the felony is averted by the submission of the assailed party to the unlawful demands made upon him.

In the commission of every crime there must be a union or joint operation of act and intention or criminal negligence. The act committed is ordinarily susceptible of direct proof by facts which are discernible by the natural senses. The intent or purpose exists only in the mind of the accused, and, like malice, or any feeling, emotion, or mental status, is manifested by external circumstances capable of proof.

By whatever means it is ascertained, the intent must be direct and specific to commit the precise offense charged. Thus, if an assault is charged with an intent to commit one felony, proof of an assault to commit another and different offense will not sustain the charge. Is an intent to commit an offense which is coupled with an unlawful condition or demand, such as plaintiffs in error made upon the prosecuting witness, a direct and specific intent within the meaning of the rule of law on that subject? We think it must be so held. To hold otherwise would be to permit one guilty of violating the peace of society and the security of persons and property guaranteed to everyone, to profit by his unlawful conduct. The law will not tolerate and encourage threats of violence and death to enforce unlawful demands made upon helpless and defenseless persons by counting such acts of the perpetrator as righteousness when he is arraigned at the bar of the court where justice is administered and crime punished. In such case the unlawful character of the demand eliminates it from consideration, and the act will be judged in its naked criminality, stripped of any benefit or palliation based upon the unlawful demand or condition. If an attempt is made to commit an assault, and a threat is conditioned upon the party assailed performing some act which is known to be a physical impossibility, such a condition cannot possibly destroy or in any way modify the criminal character of the act. In such case the assailant, knowing the impossibility of compliance with his demand, will be held to have a specific intent to inflict the threatened harm. An impossible condition is no condition. So of an unlawful condition. No one has a right to expect or presume that anyone will submit to an illegal demand made upon him; and where, as in the case at bar, a violent assault with dangerous and deadly weapons is made upon a person in the peace of the people, and a threat to destroy life is made unless the victim complies with some unlawful demand, in determining the guilt or innocence of the accused the case must be determined precisely as though the unlawful demand did not exist. Instruction No. 9 stated a correct principle of law, and there was no error in giving it to the jury.

Some complaint is made by plaintiffs in error of the rulings of the court as to other instructions, which we have considered, but find nothing in connection with these rulings of special importance to require discussion.

Plaintiffs in error complain of the ruling of the court in admitting evidence tending to show that three or four days before the difficulty four men came to the Hygienic Ice plant, and the prosecuting witness was permitted to detail his conversation with these parties. The conversation was, in substance, as follows: The four men in question came up to where the prosecuting witness was working and asked him what he was doing there, to which he replied, "I am working." They asked, "What kind of a card have you got?" and the witness replied, "I have got an International Steam Fitters' card from Local No. 2." The witness was then asked by some of the party whether all of the men on that job had cards, and said that they had. One of the men said, "That is all right, pal, we will get you afterward,"—and they went away. The objection to this testimony is based upon the assumption that the four men who visited the plant at that time were not shown to be among those who were present at the time of the difficulty. The evidence is not very clear as to the identity of the men that were there on the first occasion, but the evidence tends to show that the four men who came to the ice plant on the first occasion were also there at the time of the difficulty. The prosecuting witness was asked whether he had seen "any of those men at the building before," to which he answered: "Yes; I saw—there was four of them came two days before on the 18th of April. I don't know their names, but I would know their faces if I saw them." He was then asked whether he saw the same men on the 20th that were there on the first occasion, to which he replied: "Yes; I saw that little dark electrician there, with Kane." We think it was entirely proper to show that anyone who was present on the day of the difficulty had visited the plant previously, and also to show what such person did or said. Whether the persons referred to by the witness as being present on the first occasion were in the party on April 20th was a question of fact for the jury. The evidence fairly tended to show that the men with whom witness had the conversation were in the party on the day of the difficulty. There was no error in the admission of this testimony.

himself the defense of an alibi. He testified in his own behalf that he was not present at the time of the difficulty, and that he was at that time confined to his home with rheumatism. Thirteen witnesses were called and testified in support of the alibi. Of these witnesses only three, Herbert O'Connor (a brother), Mrs. Herbert O'Connor, and Sam Craill, testified to having seen O'Connor at home in bed at or near the hour of the commission of the offense at the Hygienic Ice plant. The witnesses in support of the alibi testified that O'Connor was taken suddenly and severely ill with rheumatism about the middle of March, and that he was unable to leave the house from that time until a few days after the 20th of April. Some of these witnesses testified that O'Connor was dangerously ill in the early part of April, and some of them stated that he was so ill that he could not move himself in bed and had to be assisted to do so. To meet this evidence the state produced as witnesses judges of the election in O'Connor's precinct, who testified that O'Connor voted at the city election on April 4th and again at the judicial primary on April 11th, and that he appeared to be well and healthy. O'Connor was recalled to the stand, and in his second examination he admitted that he had voted on the two occasions testified to by the election officials. An affidavit which he had made in support of an application for bail was also introduced, wherein O'Connor swore that he was taken ill with articular rheumatism in December, 1910, and was compelled to stay in bed, under the care of Dr. Griffith, for a period of about six weeks. This testimony when taken in connection with the evidence tending to identify O'Connor as one of the party that visited the ice plant on the 20th of April, is sufficient to justify the jury in rejecting the evidence as to the alibi. It was at least a controverted question of fact for the jury to determine. The verdict of the jury upon this question is not so contrary to the evidence as to warrant us in disturbing the verdict.

We find no error in this record requiring a reversal of the judgment below. It is therefore affirmed.

URIAH S. FRY, Appt.,

v.

L. E. AUSMAN et al., Respts.

(— S. D. —, 135 N. W. 708.)

Mortgage — assumption by grantee — liability to mortgagee.

An assumption of an agreement to pa

a mortgage, in a deed from a grantor who was not personally liable on the instrument, imposes no liability on the grantee in favor of the mortgagee, where there is nothing to show an intention to benefit him by the contract, which is necessary under the statute to enable him to sue upon it.

(April 2, 1912.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jerauld County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover a deficiency arising on a foreclosure sale of a mortgage. Affirmed.

M. S. Lattin and wife on August 26, 1907, executed and delivered a mortgage containing a power of sale, to M. E. Silvius, upon certain land in Kittson county, Minnesota, which mortgage was to secure the payment of $5,000 and interest. The following June said M. E. Silvius, for a valuable consideration, assigned in writing to appellant the mortgage. In March the said Lattin and wife granted and conveyed the premises by warranty deed to N. L. Silvius, containing the following clause: "The same are free from all encumbrances except a first mortgage of $5,000." A warranty deed to the premises was delivered by N. L. Silvius and her husband to the respondents, containing the following clause: "The same are free from all encumbrances except a first mortgage of $5,000 and interest from April 26, 1908, at 6 per cent, which second party agrees to assume." The mortgage was foreclosed, and, there not being proceeds enough to satisfy it, this action was brought.

Messrs. Gleim & Hatch and Brown & Mossman, for appellant:

Where one person, for a valuable consideration, engages with another to do some act for the benefit of a third person, the latter, who would enjoy the benefit of the act, may maintain an action for the breach of the engagement.

Pom. Code Remedies, § 139.

An exception to the rule that privity of contract is necessary to the maintenance of an action is where, under a contract between two persons, assets have come into the promisor's hands or under his control, which in equity belong to a third person.

Second Nat. Bank v. Grand Lodge, F. & A. M. 98 U. S. 123, 25 L. ed. 75.

The right of the appellant rests on the equity of the transaction, and the legal right founded on the theory of a provision made for the benefit of a creditor, and the fact that the grantor has the right to contract with his purchaser as to whom, when, and how the consideration for the land should be paid.

Merriman v. Moore, 90 Pa. 78; Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91, 54 Am. Rep. 209, 1 N. E. 340; Enos v. Sanger, 96 Wis. 150, 37 L.R.A. 862, 65 Am. St. Rep. 38, 70 N. W. 1069; Marble Sav. Bank v. Mesarvey, 104 Iowa, 285, 70 N. W. 198.

Whether or not the grantor was liable is immaterial, as the purchase price of the lands is the consideration moving between the purchasers and the grantor.

Messrs. Preston, Wagner, & Tym, for respondents:

Note.—Right of mortgagee to enforce purchaser's promise to pay the mortgage where the grantee or promisee was not himself liable.

The early cases upon this question are covered in the note to Kramer v. Gardner, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 492. A search has disclosed but two cases in which the point has been passed upon since the writing of that note.

In Jenkins v. Bishop, 136 App. Div. 104, 120 N. Y. Supp. 825, it was held that a purchaser of land subject to a mortgage did not become liable for any deficiency which might arise on the sale of the property, notwithstanding his agreement to pay the mortgage contained in the deed to him, where his grantors were not personally liable for the mortgage debt.

And in Wood v. Johnson, — Minn. —, 135 N. W. 746, it was held to be the law in Minnesota that where the mortgagor is not personally liable for a mortgage debt, the fact that his grantee agrees with him to assume and pay the outstanding mortgage indebtedness does not create a right of action against the grantee in the mortgagee. In that case, however, the mortgagor was held to be liable, and his grantee, who had assumed the mortgage debt, was therefore held liable.

tween the plaintiff and defendant in order to render the defendant liable to an action by the plaintiff on the contract.

Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317; Crowell v. Hospital of Saint Barnabas, 27 N. J. Eq. 650; Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 Pac. 100.

The liability of a grantee who assumes the payment of a mortgage on land conveyed to him depends upon the personal liability of his immediate grantor. If the grantor is not so liable, the mortgagee (or his assignee) cannot claim any deficiency from such grantee.

Whiting, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question presented by this appeal is whether one holding a note secured by a mortgage upon real estate can recover upon such note against a party other than the mortgagor, where such party had taken a deed to said mortgaged premises, and in such deed had assumed such mortgage indebtedness, the grantor in such deed being in no manner bound to pay such mortgage indebtedness, and there being no evidence, other than such deed, to show an intent on the part of the grantor and grantee in such deed to contract for the benefit of the owner of the note and mortgage. The trial court held there could be no recovery.

Respondent contends that, disregarding the other question involved herein, appellant cannot recover because of a lack of privity of contract between appellant and respondent. It is true that, under what is known as the English rule, and which is followed in several of the states, appellant would not be the proper party plaintiff, and it would be necessary that the action be brought in the name of the grantor in the deed; but there early arose in this country what is known as the American rule, allowing the real party in interest to sue in his own name upon a contract made for his benefit. The so-called "Code" states have 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

many or all adopted, many by statutory enactment, the American rule. This state adopted such rule by § 1193, Civil Code, which reads: "A contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it."

Respondent further urges that this court has decided the other question involved herein, in the case of Fish & H. Co. v. New England Homestake Co. 27 S. D. —, 130 N. W. 841. It is true that we indorsed therein the rule laid down in Jefferson v. Asch, 53 Minn. 460, 25 L.R.A. 257, 39 Am. St. Rep. 618, 55 N. W. 604, to wit: "Without undertaking to lay down a general rule defining when a stranger to a promise between others may sue to enforce it, we are prepared to say that where there is nothing but the promise, no consideration from such stranger, and no duty or obligation to him on the part of the promisee, he cannot sue upon it." An examination of the contract involved in the Fish & H. Co. Case reveals the fact that such contract was one solely between Godfrey and his co-owners for Godfrey's benefit, and in no manner contained any promise or covenant in favor of third parties, and was therefore not "expressly for the benefit of a third person."

Under all the authorities, such a contract goes to third parties no right of action. The supreme court of Wisconsin holds exactly contrary to the above Minnesota decision; yet the Wisconsin court, in a case involving a question similar to that arising upon the contract in the Fish & H. Co. Case, sustains this court in its holding as to effect of such contract. Electric Appliance Co. v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 110 Wis. 434, 53 L.R.A. 609, 85 N. W. 648. Another opinion along the same line, the reasoning in which shows that this court was clearly right in its holding as to the effect of the contract in the Fish & H. Co. Case, regardless of the exact question involved in the case at bar, is that of Parlin v. Hall, 2 N. D. 473, 52 N. W. 405. See also Thomas Mfg. Co. v. Prather, 65 Ark. 27, 44 S. W. 218. It is thus seen that the precise question now before us was not necessarily involved in the Fish & H. Co. Case, and we therefore approach the discussion of it as though we had made no reference to it in our opinion in such case.

Pomeroy, at § 1207 of the third edition of his work on Equity Jurisprudence, notes that the courts holding that there can be no liability upon the part of the grantee, where there was none on the part of the grantor, also hold that the liability, when any does exist, results only from an application of the doctrine of subrogation, and that, unless there was a liability, or obligation on the part of the grantor so that, as between the grantor and grantee, the grantee became the principal debtor and the grantor but a surety, there would be nothing upon which the creditor could base a claim of subrogation. Pomeroy also notes that the courts holding the grantee liable were the grantor was not liable base the right of recovery solely upon the contract, taking the position that, where a contract made for the benefit of one not a party thereto, he may treat the promise as though made to himself, and may sue in his own name thereon.

The Federal Supreme Court has adopted the subrogation theory of liability as appears by the following from the case of Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 33 L. ed. 667, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494: "The doctrine of the right of a creditor to the benefit of all securities given by the principal to the surety for the payment of the debt does not rest upon any liability of the principal to the creditor, or upon any peculiar relation of the surety towards the creditor, but upon the ground that the surety, being the creditor's debtor, and in fact occupying the relation of surety to another person, has received from that person an obligation or security for the payment of the debt, which a court of equity will therefore compel to be applied to that purpose at the suit of the creditor. Where the person ultimately held liable is himself a debtor to the creditor, the relief awarded has no reference to that fact, but is grounded wholly on the right of the creditor to avail himself of the right of the surety against the principal. If the person who is admitted to be the creditor's debtor stands at the time of receiving the security in the relation of surety to the person from whom he receives it, it is quite immaterial whether that person is or ever has been a debtor of the principal creditor, or whether the relation of suretyship or the indemnity to the surety existed, or was known to the creditor, when the debt was contracted. In short, if one person agrees with another to be primarily liable for a debt due from that person to a third person, so that, as between the parties to the agreement, the first is the principal and the second the surety, the creditor of such surety is entitled in equity to be substituted in his place for the purpose of compelling such principal to pay the debt."

For a general discussion of this question, and a review of the numerous authorities resting upon the different phases thereof, we refer to the very exhaustive notes, pages 205 to 207 of 71 Am. St. Rep. These notes attract particular attention to the two elements required under the New York decisions in order that there may be a recovery: (1) L.R.A.(N.S.)

There must be an intent to benefit the third party; and (2) the promisee must owe some obligation to the third party. It is very apparent that the decisions from those states which have adopted the English rule, above referred to, are of no authoritative value upon the question before us. Among these states seem to be Georgia, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Vermont, Virginia, and Wyoming. We therefore cite cases from those states only which recognize the American rule, allowing suit by real party in interest.

Among the authorities supporting the New York rule, and denying a right of recovery under the facts in this case, are the following: King v. Whitely, 10 Paige, 465; Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195; Wilbur v. Warren, 104 N. Y. 192, 10 N. E. 263; Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 32 N. E. 49; Jefferson v. Asch, supra; Kramer v. Gardner, 104 Minn. 370, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 492, 116 N. W. 925; Clement v. Willett, 105 Minn. 267, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1094, 127 Am. St. Rep. 562, 117 N. W. 491, 15 Ann. Cas. 1053; Morris v. Mix, 4 Kan. App. 654, 46 Pac. 58; New England Trust Co. v. Nash, 5 Kan. App. 739, 46 Pac. 987; Crone v. Stinde, 156 Mo. 202, 55 S. W. 863, 56 S. W. 907; Young Men's Christian Association v. Croft, 34 Or. 106, 75 Am. St. Rep. 568, 55 Pac. 439; Eakin v. Schultz, 61 N. J. Eq. 156, 47 Atl. 274; Ward v. De Oca, 120 Cal. 102, 52 Pac. 130. Supporting the other rule we find: Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 474; Harts v. Emery, 184 Ill. 560, 56 N. E. 865; Birke v. Abbott, 103 Ind. 1, 53 Am. Rep. 474, 1 N. E. 485; Marble Sav. Bank v. Mesarvey, 101 Iowa, 285, 70 N. W. 199; McGregor v. Eastern Bldg. & L. Asso. 5 Neb. (Unof.) 563, 99 N. W. 509; Hare v. Murphy, 45 Neb. 809, 29 L.R.A. 851, 64 N. W. 211; Merriman v. Moore, 90 Pa. 78; Brewer v. Maurer, 38 Ohio St. 543, 43 Am. Rep. 436; McKay v. Ward, 20 Utah, 149, 46 L.R.A. 623, 57 Pac. 1024; Enos v. Sanger, 96 Wis. 150, 37 L.R.A. 864, 65 Am. St. Rep. 38, 70 N. W. 1069; Tweeddale v. Tweeddale, 100 Wis. 517, 61 L.R.A. 509, 96 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 93 N. W. 440; Fanning v. Murphy, 126 Wis. 538, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 666, 110 Am. St. Rep. 946, 105 N. W. 1056, 5 Ann. Cas. 435.

We would call particular attention to the Utah case, owing to the very exhaustive dissenting opinion found therein. There are many other authorities which in principle support one or the other of the two theories mentioned herein, but we have confined our citations to those where the facts passed upon were the same as here, namely, where the grantee in a deed had assumed a mortgage debt for which his grantor was not liable.

While we think it must be conceded that, in case the second element required under the New York decisions does exist, it may, from that fact, be presumed that the first element is also present, and therefore the party for whose benefit the contract is made be entitled, under the subrogation theory, to recover of the party who has rendered himself the principal debtor; yet it seems equally clear to us that, whenever two parties enter into an agreement that appears to have been made expressly for the benefit of a third party, and such agreement has a good and sufficient consideration, the agreement itself creates all the privity there need be between the person for whose benefit the agreement was entered into, and the party assuming the obligation, and an action at law should lie regardless of whether there was any obligation existing between the other party to the agreement and the third party. But, before the third party can adopt the agreement entered into and recover thereon, he must show clearly that it was entered into with the intent on the part of the parties thereto that such third party should be benefited thereby. This intent might, in a given case, sufficiently appear from the contract itself, but it must frequently be shown by other proof. While the cases sustaining a recovery have few, if any of them, expressly recognized the necessity of the existence of the first element (the intent to benefit the third party), yet an examination of the decisions will reveal the fact that such element was clearly established in nearly all such cases.

We concur heartily in the following words of Chief Justice Bartch, of Utah, in his dissenting opinion in McKay v. Ward: "My conclusion is that the rule which exempts a grantee who has merely in a deed of conveyance assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage, in case his immediate grantor is not personally liable for the payment of the mortgage debt, from liability to the mortgagee or owner of the mortgage, is not only founded in reason and principle, but is sustained by an overwhelming weight of authority. I do not intend to hold, however, that the grantee of mortgaged premises, whose grantor is under no personal obligation to pay the mortgage debt, cannot render himself liable to the mortgagee for a deficiency judgment upon foreclosure and sale, by accepting a deed containing an assumption clause, with knowledge of such contents, and which clause contains apt words showing that the grantor intended to bestow a benefit upon the mortgagee. The rule cannot be thus extended; for doubtless a grantor may direct the payment of the purchase price as he chooses, and may, if he so wishes, contract with a grantee that the latter will pay a certain sum to a stranger, or a mortgagee, or any person upon whom the grantor chooses to confer a benefit, and in such cases the beneficiary may enforce the contract. Where, however, as in the case at bar, the grantor is not personally liable, the assumption clause ought to be construed as a mere indemnity to the grantor, unless there is something to show a different intention by the contracting parties. In this case there appears to be nothing which indicates any other intention on the part of the grantor, than that of indemnity to himself. There are no words in the deed, nor any evidence of facts or circumstances, which indicate that the grantor had any interest in protecting the mortgagee, to whom he was under no personal obligation. Doubtless, in general, the greatest interest a grantor has is in effecting a sale of the premises, and it cannot be assumed that he would hazard the chances of such a sale by insisting on that which would not benefit him. The circumstances of this case disclose no intention to benefit the mortgagee, and therefore he is not entitled to a deficiency judgment against the promisor, the assumption in the deed being intended merely to indemnify the promisee. If the intention of the contracting parties had been otherwise, the respondent could easily have shown it by placing the vendor, McDonald, upon the stand, and interrogating him upon the subject. This he failed to do, although, under the great weight of authority, the burden was upon him to show that the contract was intended for his benefit, or that the vendor was under some legal obligation to him respecting the debt. The respondent not having done this, why should the appellate court assume that as a fact of which there is no proof?"

We think also that the very terms of our statute determine this question in favor of respondent. Recovery can only be had in case the contract was "made expressly for the benefit of a third person." The state of California has identically the same statute, and in Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 Pac. 100, the supreme court of that state said: "It is not necessary that the parties for whose benefit the contract has been made should be named in the contract. It must appear, however, by the direct terms of the contract, that it was made for the benefit of such parties. It cannot be implied from the fact that the contract would, if carried out between the parties to it, operate incidentally to their benefit." See also Biddell v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609.

From both reason and authority we conclude that, inasmuch as the provision in the deed before us merely provided that the grantee assumed the mortgage debt, and there being no other evidence of the intent of the parties to such deed, we should construe such provision as a mere agreement or contract to indemnify the grantor, and therefore insufficient as the basis of an action founded upon the doctrine of subrogation,—there being no obligation on part of grantor to the third person,—and also insufficient, as the basis of an action under § 1193, Civil Code, it not appearing that the said agreement or contract was entered into "expressly for the benefit of a (the) third person."

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

CITY OF PAXTON

v.

J. E. FITZSIMMONS, Appt.

(253 Ill. 355, 97 N. E. 675.)

Tax on dogs — uniformity.

A dog tax need not be uniform according to the value, when assessed by a municipality under charter authority to regulate dogs and impose a tax on them, since it is

Note. — Character of dog tax.

As to the constitutionality of a tax on dogs for the benefit of sheep owners, see McGlone v. Womack, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 855, and note.

A per capita tax on dogs is almost uniformly held to be a police regulation, rather than an exercise of the taxing power. Re Ackerman, 6 Cal. App. 5, 91 Pac. 429; Griggs v. Macon, 103 Ga. 602, 68 Am. St. Rep. 134, 30 S. E. 561; Fincher v. Collum, 2 Ga. App. 740, 59 S. E. 22; State v. Sharp, 169 Ind. 128, 81 N. E. 1150; Com. v. Markham, 7 Bush, 486; *Mowery v. Such a tax or license fee is therefore not subject to statutory or constitutional provisions applying to the levy of taxes, where no provision is made for its enforcement except by prohibiting the keeping of a dog until the amount is paid. Fox v. Mohawk & H. R. Humane Soc. 20 Misc. 461, 46 N. Y. Supp. 232. On appeal, 165 N. Y. 517, 51 L.R.A. 681, 80 Am. St. Rep. 767, 59 N. E. 353, this case was reversed, and the statute involved held unconstitutional, on the ground that a provision for use by defendant of the fees paid thereunder was an appropriation of public money to private uses, and because it allowed humane societies to harbor dogs without paying the license required of every other citizen.

Such a license, being for the purpose of regulation rather than revenue, need not 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not a property tax, but is assessed under the police power for purposes of regulation.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ford County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover a penalty for the alleged violation of a city ordinance imposing a tax on dogs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. E. Beach, for appellant:

The law recognizes the right of property in dogs, and the dog owned, possessed, harbored, and kept within the city of Paxton by defendant, was his property.

Taxation as to every species of property must be equal and according to value.

be uniform and equal. State ex rel. Curtis v. Topeka, 36 Kan. 76, 59 Am. Rep. 529, 12 Pac. 310, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 479; Kidd v. Reynolds, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 355, 50 S. W. 600.

Nor is it required that it be levied according to value. Carthage v. Rhodes, 101 Mo. 175, 9 L.R.A. 352, 14 S. W. 181; Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 489, 30 Am. Rep. 152.

In Washington v. Lynch, 5 Cranch. C. C. 498, Fed. Cas. No. 17,231, it being contended that the city had no power to tax dogs because they were not property, it was held that such tax or license could be levied under the power to prevent nuisances.

And in Gibson v. Harrison, 69 Ark. 385, 54 L.R.A. 268, 63 S. W. 999, a tax on dogs was held to be merely a police regulation, although described in the agreed statement of facts as a tax, this being a mere opinion not binding on the court.

However, in Com. v. Bean, Thasher, Crim. Cas. 85, it is held that a city has no right to impose a license fee upon owners of dogs, as such would be a tax, and in violation of a constitutional provision that no tax shall be imposed without an act of the legislature.

And in Washington v. Meigs, 1 MacArth. 53, 29 Am. Rep. 578, it is held that, while a dog is property subject to taxation, the owner cannot be required to pay a license fee for keeping it, under penalty of fine or imprisonment for failure to do so.

People v. Bradley, 39 Ill. 130; Rich v. Chicago, 59 Ill. 286.

Mr. S. Ludlow for appellee.

Farmer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of debt brought in the circuit court of Ford county, to recover a penalty for the alleged violation of an ordinance of the city of Paxton. The ordinance set out in the declaration required the owners and keepers of dogs to pay to the city marshal "a tax or fee of $2 for each male dog and $5 for each female dog." The ordinance also required the owner or keeper of the dog to register it at the office of the city marshal, and prescribed a penalty of not less than $3 nor more than $10 for its violation. The declaration, after setting out the ordinance, charged the defendant was the owner or keeper of a female dog within the corporate limits of the city of Paxton, and that he had not paid to the marshal the tax or fee required, nor caused the dog to be registered in the office of the city marshal, whereby an action had accrued, etc. A demurrer to the declaration, setting out as special causes the unconstitutionality of the ordinance, was overruled. The defendant elected to stand by his demurrer and refused to plead. It was stipulated that the defendant was the owner of the dog, as alleged; that he had not paid the tax or fee on said dog; that the ordinance set out in the declaration had been duly passed, signed by the mayor, and published. The court rendered judgment against the defendant, and assessed the plaintiff's damages at $5. Defendant prayed an appeal, and on the certificate of the court that the validity of a municipal ordinance was involved, and that the public interest required the appeal to be prosecuted direct to the supreme court, the appeal was brought direct to this court.

The principal argument made against the validity of the ordinance is that a dog is property, and that the ordinance is in violation of § 1 of article 9 of the Constitution, which provides for raising revenue by levying a tax by valuation, so that every person "shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property;" also in violation of §§ 9 and 10 of said article 9 of the Constitution, which require that taxes levied by the corporate authorities shall be uniform in respect to persons and property.

Clause 80, § 1, art. 5, of the cities and villages act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1909, chap. 24, § 62), confers power upon the city council in cities, and the president and board of trustees in villages, "to regulate, restrain, and prohibit the running at large of horses, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

cattle, swine, sheep, goats, geese, and dogs, and to impose a tax on dogs." It is true, dogs are regarded, in law, as property, but they stand on a different basis from other domestic animals, and have always been subject to control and regulation by the exercise of the police power. Statutes and ordinances imposing a tax or license on dogs have been almost uniformly held to be within the police power of the state, and not governed by constitutional provisions relating to taxation for revenue. Ordinances prohibiting dogs from running at large, and authorizing the killing of any dog found running at large in violation of an ordinance, have been sustained as a valid exercise of the police power, and not violative of any constitutional provision. The object of statutes and ordinances for the imposition of a tax or license on dogs is regulation, and not revenue.

In Carthage v. Rhodes, 101 Mo. 175, 9 L.R.A. 352, 14 S. W. 181, the court passed upon the validity of an ordinance requiring the licensing of dogs and cats, and providing for their being impounded or destroyed if found running at large. The validity of the ordinance was sustained. The court said: "Taxation may be for the purpose of raising revenue, or for the purpose of regulation. Where for the purpose of regulation, it is an exercise of the police power of the state. They are both distinct, coexistent powers in the state, and either or both may be exercised through a municipal corporation. In this case by the terms of the charter, both powers are granted to the city of Carthage as to the dogs of that city. The dog license tax required by its ordinance is easily referable to the exercise of the police power."

In Van Horn v. People, 46 Mich. 163, 41 Am. Rep. 159, 9 N. W. 246, the constitutionality of a statute imposing a tax on dogs was before the court. It was claimed the statute violated the constitutional provision for uniformity and the taxation of property according to its value. The court held the statute was not an emanation from the taxing power within the meaning of the Constitution; that it was not for revenue, but was a species of legislation pertaining to the police power of the state.

In State ex rel. Curtis v. Topeka, 36 Kan. 76, 59 Am. Rep. 529, 12 Pac. 310, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 479, the court considered an ordinance passed pursuant to power conferred by act of the legislature, which required the registration of dogs and the payment of a tax of $2 for male and $5 for females. In that case it was contended the ordinance was in conflict with the Constitution, which required taxes to be levied at a uniform and an equal rate. The court held the ordinance was valid; that the tax was not for the purpose of raising revenue, but for the purpose of regulation and restriction.

In Holst v. Roe, 39 Ohio St. 340, 48 Am. Rep. 459, the court construed the validity of a statute which required dogs over three months old to be listed by the owner without any valuation; but the owner might, if he desired, fix a valuation, without swearing to it. The statute further provided that, in addition to the tax on the valuation that might be fixed by the owner, an additional tax of $1 on each dog should be levied by the auditor. The court held the statute was a valid exercise of the police power, and was not controlled by the constitutional provisions relating to taxation for revenue.

In Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, the Supreme Court of the United States considered the validity of a statute of the state of Louisiana which declared that dogs were personal property and entitled to the same guaranties of law as other personal property, provided they were given in by the owner to the assessor, and unless so listed with the assessor and placed upon the assessment roll, no dog was entitled to the protection of the law. The statute further provided that in civil actions for killing or injuring a dog, the owner could not recover beyond the value of the dog as fixed by himself in the last assessment. The statute was held valid, and a number of cases are cited and quoted from in the opinion. Among the cases cited with approval is Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 489, 30 Am. Rep. 152. The Supreme Court says: "In Ex parte Cooper, supra, it was held that dogs were not property within the tax clause of the Constitution, and that a tax upon dogs was a police regulation, and a legitimate exercise of the police power. The point was made that dogs, being property, should, under the Constitution, be taxed ad valorem, as other property was; but it was held that the law was not a tax law in its ordinary sense, but a police regulation."

In Cole v. Hall, 103 Ill. 30, owners of dogs filed a bill to enjoin the collector of taxes from collecting a license fee of $1 on each dog owned by them, which was imposed under the act of 1879 (Laws 1879, p. 54) entitled "An Act to Indemnify the Owners of Sheep in Cases of Damage Committed by Dogs." This tax is called in the act "a license fee." The court held the act valid as an exercise of the police power, and that the license fee was not a tax within the meaning of the section of the Constitution providing for the raising of revenue by levying a tax so that every person shall pay the tax in proportion to his or her property.

application to the ordinance before us, because it was held in Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560, that there is a difference between a tax and a license, and that the constitutional provision in reference to taxation has no application to fees exacted for a license. It is claimed the exaction imposed by the ordinance before us is not a license fee, but is a tax. The ordinance calls it "a tax or fee." But we think it immaterial, when imposed for regulation and restriction under the police power of the state, whether it is called a license, a fee, or a tax. This is sustained by the authorities above cited.

Appellant also contends that there is a material difference between the statute authorizing a tax or license fee against dogs, and the ordinance before us. The difference pointed out is that the statute requires the money collected from the dog tax or license fees to be applied to the reimbursement of persons whose sheep have been killed or injured by dogs running at large, while the ordinance makes no provision for the application of the fund collected under it. In Cole v. Hall, supra, the court held what disposition was to be made of the fund, when collected, could not affect the validity of the statute, and the same rule is applicable to the ordinance.

The demurrer was properly overruled, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

CROSS APPEALS from a decree of the District Court for Furnas County in an action brought to quiet title to certain land and for a partition of said land; plaintiffs appealing from so much of the judgment as awarded them an undivided one-eighth interest in the land and from an order refusing partition; defendants Kolp et al. appealing from so much as awarded defendant Benjamin Fisher a three-fourths interest. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Perry Lambe, & Butler, for plaintiffs:

Root, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in equity to settle conflicting claims to a quarter section of land in Furnas county. The case is here on appeal and cross appeals.

Elizabeth Fisher, a widow, one of the pioneers of Furnas county, acquired title from the United States to the land in controversy. Mrs. Fisher was the second wife of her husband, and to them were born three sons and two daughters, all of whom attained maturity. Of these children Benjamin, the oldest, for many years, was the head of the family. One son, Perley J. Fisher, departed this life subsequently to his mother's demise, and his heirs are parties to this action. The daughters married, and they also are parties hereto. Benjamin, subsequently to his marriage, lived separate from his mother, but in the immediate neighborhood of her home. The other son, John Thomas Fisher, remained unmarried and departed this life intestate May 28, 1908. Elizabeth Fisher departed this life intestate September 17, 1895. There are numerous other parties to this action, all of whom are relatives of the half blood of John Thomas Fisher, or assignees of some of those relatives. For convenience' sake they will be collectively referred to as "the half bloods." All of these relatives are descendants of John Thomas Fisher's father by the first marriage, and in the veins of none of them flows the blood of Elizabeth Fisher.

There is evidence to prove, and this court may take judicial notice of the fact, that droughts, insect plagues, and almost universal low prices for farm products, prevailed in western Nebraska during many of the years covered by this inquiry. The proof also discloses that Benjamin Fisher years ago sold his homestead, and the proceeds were used in part at least for the benefit of his mother's family. The same sacrifice was made by one of the daughters, and John Thomas also brought to the common fund the proceeds of the sale of a tract of land formerly owned by him. The close and tender relations which the evidence discloses existed between this widow and all of her children continued to the close of her natural life. In 1895, during a period of financial depression, the Fishers were in sore need of money, and for the purpose of supporting her sons Benjamin and John Thomas with funds, Elizabeth Fisher, probably at the suggestion of Benjamin, determined to mortgage her farm. She also concluded that, for the purpose of keeping the title to the homestead in those sons, she would convey the farm to them. The attendance of a justice of the peace was procured, and, according to his testimony, he was directed by Mrs. Fisher to prepare a deed conveying the farm to these men. She said: "My time is short, and I want this land to remain with the Fisher boys,"—referring to Benjamin and John. Before the deed was drawn, it was mentioned that Benjamin's wife was not in condition to go to Beaver City, the county seat, to sign the mortgage which it was proposed should be made, and thereupon it was suggested by the scrivener or by Benjamin, that the deed might be made to the unmarried son, John Thomas, and this was done. Subsequently, the mortgage was executed to secure the payment of $500. The deed was executed February 28, 1895, but seven months before Mrs. Fisher died. The proof discloses that John Thomas Fisher was an easy-going, pleasure-loving man of simple tastes, working at times on the farm and on another quarter section, the title whereof he acquired under the pre-emption laws, but devoting considerable of his time to hunting, attending baseball games, and occasionally indulging in a mild drinking bout. Benjamin farmed his land, and was in controversy, and John Thomas's exemption, so that Benjamin received all the income from these tracts of land. He paid the taxes thereon, and supplied John Thomas with whatever money he desired. With one possible exception, there seems to have been no friction between the brothers, but John Thomas, relieved of all responsibility and the necessity of earning his bread in the sweat of his face, was content that Benjamin should farm the land, pay the taxes and all expenses, receive the proceeds, and furnish his brother such sums of money as he demanded. The evidence is contradicted that John Thomas was well supplied with money, and that it was all furnished by his brother Benjamin. This condition existed before as well as subsequently to the execution of the deed by Elizabeth Fisher.

The court held that the deed executed by Mrs. Fisher was void and conveyed no title. A deed from Mrs. Bailey, one of Mrs. Fisher's daughters, to Benjamin Fisher, was set aside, and the title to the land was quieted as follows: In Benjamin Fisher an undivided ed three fourths, in the heirs of Perley Fisher, each, a one thirty-second part, collectively a one eighth, and in Mrs. Bailey an undivided one eighth. Benjamin's portion includes the share his sister Mrs. Kolp inherited, which she conveyed to him.

The writer of this opinion is directed by a majority of the court to say that, while this court does not adopt all of the findings nor the reasoning of the learned district judge, we are of opinion that he attained the correct result for the reasons following: We are inclined to the view that the heirs cannot now successfully question the validity of the deed from Mrs. Fisher to her son John Thomas. At this late date, it is immaterial whether there was a consideration for the deed, or whether it was executed by reason of Benjamin's undue influence. John Thomas was in possession of this land under a claim of right for more than ten successive years subsequently to the execution of the deed and to Mrs. Fisher's demise, before he departed this life and before this suit was commenced. Therefore the plea of the statute of limitations is sustained. Nor do we think there is any such proof of recently acquired knowledge of the alleged duress, fraud, or lack of consideration as will toll the statute.

To the contention made by the plaintiffs and by the relatives of the half blood that the deed conveyed no estate to Benjamin, and that, since no writing was signed by Elizabeth Fisher or by John Thomas Fisher, no trust was created or declared which Benjamin may avail himself of, and therefore he has no interest in the land other than as an heir of John Thomas, we have to say: If the evidence of the justice of the peace is competent, it discloses that Elizabeth Fisher intended that her sons Benjamin and John Thomas should own the farm in equal shares, and but for the ignorance of all parties to the transaction, including the scrivener, a written instrument would have been prepared and signed to evidence that intent. However, the proof is satisfactory that, subsequently to the execution of the deed, Benjamin's possession was under a claim in right. He made lasting and valuable improvements on the farm, and not only tilled the soil, but assumed authority to place his married children in possession of the land. Ordinarily such acts would reasonably be referable to a claim of right, but it is said that, because of the peculiar circumstances of this case, we should not so hold. But we find declarations of John Thomas made at different times to within two years of his death, admitting, by inference or directly, his brother's interest in the land. In 1897, but two years after the deed was executed, John Thomas requested a third party to prepare a deed to convey all of the title to Benjamin, saying that "he ought to have it" (the land), and, solely because the proposed scrivener desired to go home to luncheon and the subsequent attraction of a ball game, that purpose was not consummated. John Thomas refused to sell part of the land because, as he said, it was always to remain in the Fisher family. This statement may indicate a testamentary intention, but it sheds some light on the controversy. Within two years of John Thomas's demise, in discussing the location of a ditch on the farm, he said, in substance, that he did not know whether Benjamin wanted the ditch constructed along the proposed path, and that he and Benjamin owned the land together. There is some evidence of John Thomas's declarations to the contrary, and also Benjamin's declarations evincing a disclaimer of any interest in the land, but, taking all of the evidence together, we find that, at all times subsequently to the execution of the deed to John Thomas, Benjamin Fisher asserted ownership to at least an undivided one half of this land, and, in reliance upon his belief and contention that his mother intended that he should have an interest in the land, made lasting and valuable improvements thereon, and, with his brother John, held undisputed possession of the premises for more than ten years preceding the commencement of this action, and subsequently to his mother's death; and during all of that time John acquiesced in that claim. A tenancy in common may be created by prescription. Inglis v. Webb, 117 Ala. 387, 23 So. 125. This estate in Benjamin was not created so much by a disseisin of his brother John, as by John's recognition of his mother's trust and confidence in him and his respect for his brother's rights. There was in effect an execution by him of the trust reposed in him by her, and, that trust having been fully executed and respected by him for more than ten successive years, not only should the ten-year statute of limitations (§§ 5 and 6 of the Code) bar a recovery, but the case is within the principle announced in Karr v. Washburn, 56 Wis. 303, 14 N. W. 189, and Oberlender v. Butcher, 67 Neb. 410, 93 N. W. 764.

This brings us to the contention between the half bloods and the descendants of Elizabeth Fisher, the one faction contending for an estate of inheritance because the deed from Elizabeth Fisher is one of purchase, and the other side asserting that the deed is one of gift, and hence, by the terms of § 33, chap. 23, Comp. Stat. 1911, which provides that an estate of inheritance which vested in an intestate by devise or gift from some of his ancestors shall descend from him solely to such of his relatives as are of the blood of that ancestor. The line of descent is confined to the heirs of the full blood. We do not think that the execution of the mortgage and the use of the funds acquired thereby should control the character of Mrs. Fisher's deed. The money was secured for the benefit of Benjamin Fisher and John Thomas Fisher, and, in effect, they mortgaged their land to secure the payment of their debt. Rather this controversy depends upon the right of the heirs of the full blood to contradict by oral evidence the recital in the deed from Elizabeth Fisher that she was paid $2,000 therefor.

A majority of the court instructed me to say that oral evidence is admissible to prove the actual consideration for a deed, even though the effect may be to convert the instrument from one of bargain and sale into one of pure gift. Such proof has always been considered competent in other actions, and a majority of the court does not think sound sense should permit an exception to be made in a case where to do so is to compel the court to hold contrary to the fact and thereby render ineffectual a plain provision of the statute. Such evidence, although admissible, should not be held to prove the fact, unless it is clear and convincing and leaves no reasonable doubt in the mind concerning the consideration given for the deed. The courts of last resort are not in harmony in cases like the one at bar. The following cases directly sustain the majority of this court: Bradley v. Love, 60 Tex. 472; Rockill v. Spraggs, 9 Ind. 30, 68 Am. Dec. 607; Jones v. Jones, 12 Ind. 389; Kenney v. Phillipy, 91 Ind. 511. See also Sires v. Sires, 43 S. C. 266, 21 S. E. 115, and Salmon v. Wilson, 41 Cal. 595.

The writer of this opinion, while recording the views of a majority of the court, personally holds to the contrary. That is to say, that while for many purposes recitations in a deed may not, even as between the parties and their privies, be conclusive evidence of the facts, and the recitation of consideration is frequently held to be solely prima facie evidence of the fact, yet it seems to me that both upon reason and the better authority, persons claiming under a deed should not, in the absence of fraud or mutual mistake, be permitted to prove by oral evidence that a recitation of a substantial, valuable consideration, where no other consideration is referred to in the deed, is false, and prove by the oral evidence that the sole consideration was good, so as to change the quality of the estate thereby conveyed. In such cases the recitation gives quality to the estate transferred, and to contradict it by oral evidence violates the statute of frauds and perjuries. Patter- son v. Lamson, 45 Ohio St. 77, 12 N. E. 531; Brown v. Whaley, 58 Ohio St. 654, 65 Am. St. Rep. 793, 49 N. E. 479; Groves v. Groves, 65 Ohio St. 442, 62 N. E. 1044. Among the cases cited to sustain the majority of the court, Bradley v. Love, supra, is directly in point, but the opinion is a mere declaration that the law is as stated, and contains no convincing argument to sustain the conclusion. The later Indiana cases follow Rockhill v. Spraggs, 9 Ind. 30, 68 Am. Dec. 607, and it was decided on the authority of M'Crea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460, 30 Am. Dec. 103. The New York case, however, merely involved the right of a party to a deed to prove that the consideration therefor was a quantity of iron delivered by the grantee to the grantor, rather than a money consideration as recited in the deed. That case was correctly determined, but does not sustain the Indiana cases, nor the majority opinion in the instant case. In Salmon v. Wilson, 41 Cal. 395, in addition to a recitation of a nominal valuable consideration, there was a recitation of a good consideration, and it was held that, upon a consideration of the entire instrument, the court should construe the deed to be one of gift. In Carty v. Connelly, 91 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 599, that court recognized the rule that, in the absence of fraud, oral evidence should not be received to contradict the recitation of consideration, for the purpose of defeating the conveyance according to its terms. In the case at bar the testimony is convincing that the sole consideration for the deed was that of love and affection, and we conclude, upon a consideration of the entire record, that substantial justice has been done.

The judgment of the District Court therefore is affirmed.

Sedgwick, J., concurring:

The foregoing opinion was prepared by Judge Root while he was a member of the court, and is now adopted as a correct disposition of the case. The most serious contention in the case is determined by the second paragraph of the syllabus. The general rule is that the consideration expressed in a written instrument may be inquired into, and that it may be shown by parol testimony to be without consideration, although such consideration is recited in the instrument. The adjudicated cases are in conflict, and each view is supported by many decisions. We think that the better reasoned decisions hold that the general rule obtains in cases of this kind. If there was a valuable consideration for the deed, the property goes, upon the death of the grantee, to his heirs in general. If the deed was in fact a gift from an ancestor of the grantee, the property, upon the death of the grantee, descends to those who are "of the blood of such ancestor." When the ancestor makes a gift to his descendant and recites in the deed of gift that a valuable consideration was paid therefor, this recitation on his part may be for the purpose of controlling the line of descent of the property. We know, however, that in practice this recitation is often made in deeds for other and different purposes, or it may be carelessly made without any purpose whatever. If the conveyance is in fact a gift, and the ancestor desires to qualify the estate conveyed, and control the line of descent, he can do so by inserting in the conveyance apt and conclusive words for that purpose. If the ancestor desires to make disposition of his property that shall take effect after his death, or to place limitations upon the title derived through him, he can accomplish these results through a gift of the property by will, and the law favors that method of making such posthumous limitations. It is not usual in practice to qualify the estate conveyed by so uncertain a method as recitations of consideration, and to adopt such methods would lead to uncertainties in titles to real estate. We think, therefore, the better reason is in favor of the rule which we have adopted.

CERRO GORDO COUNTY, Appt.,
v.
BOONE COUNTY.

(152 Iowa, 602, 133 N. W. 132.)

Pauper — aid — implied liability of county.

1. A county is under no implied duty to reimburse another county for expense incurred in relieving paupers who first become in need of aid within its borders.

Note. — Right to compensation from public for relief furnished poor person, in cases not provided for by law, or where there has been no compliance with statutory prerequisites.

It is well established in this country by the authorities that paupers are not a public charge unless made so by statute (see Saguache County v. Tough, 45 Colo. 395, 101 Pac. 411; Alton v. Madison County, 21 Ill. 115; Fox v. Bristol, 45 Ill. App. 330; Cooledge v. Mahaska County, 24 Iowa, 211; Blakesburg v. Jefferson, 7 Me. 125; Augusta v. Chelsea, 47 Me. 387; Newry v. Gilead, Same — voluntary aid — liability.

2. To render a county liable for aid furnished to a pauper it must be supplied at the instance of the officers designated by statute to have charge of the relief of the poor.

Same — casting pauper adrift — request for aid.

3. That a county in which a nonresident pauper was found in need of aid did not perform its statutory duty to furnish it, but furnished him with transportation into another county, does not amount to a request to the latter to furnish the aid at its expense, so as to render it liable to reimburse such other county for expense incurred in furnishing the relief.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Story County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the expenses incurred in the care and medical treatment of a nonresident pauper. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert M. Witwer, J. C. Robinson, and Fitchpatrick & McCall, for appellant:

Where the law provides that a quasi or municipal corporation shall give care and treatment to a poor person upon application, due request, in a proper case, creates an absolute legal obligation on the part of such corporation for the required relief and care.

Cincinnati Twp. v. Ogden, 5 Ohio, 23; relief furnished a needy person, the case must fall within, and the liability be created pursuant to, and in the manner prescribed by the statute (Coolidge v. Mahaska County, 24 Iowa, 211; O'Keefe v. Northampton, 145 Mass. 115, 13 N. E. 382); and however equitable a claim, there can be no recovery without compliance with the statutory prerequisites (Strafford County v. Rockingham County, 71 N. H. 37, 51 Atl. 677).

There are no equities between towns in respect to caring for and supporting paupers, but the whole matter is purely and strictly statutory; and where the statute imposes no liability there is none, and that is the end of it. Morristown v. Hardwick, 81 Vt. 31, 69 Atl. 152.

The obligations of municipalities in reference to the support of paupers result from the provisions of positive law, and have none of the elements of a contract, express or implied. There are no equitable considerations out of which presumptions will arise in favor of either party. Davis v. Milton Plantation, 90 Me. 512, 38 Atl. 539.

And in the absence of statutory provision a town is not obliged to reimburse a county for relief given to a former resident, who, before gaining a settlement in the county, became a poor person. Delaware County v. Delaware, 105 App. Div. 129, 93 N. Y. Supp. 954.

Since the liability of a town to support its poor is purely statutory, it is not liable for the support of the pauper by another town, where it provides a place of residence for the pauper in his own town, and offers to remove him and his effects to it, and there support him, and the pauper refuses to go, and threatens to prosecute any person who shall attempt to remove him. *Fox v. The liability of a town for the support of its paupers, being purely statutory, has in it none of the elements of a contract, express or implied; and therefore is not a proper subject of set-off in an action by one town against another for such support. Augusta v. Chelsea, 47 Me. 367.

As a consequence of the doctrine embodied in the foregoing decisions, it is uniformly held that the public cannot be held to make compensation for relief furnished to persons who have fallen into distress, except by virtue of a contract with the proper officers, or in a case specified by statute. See Nate ex rel. Chisholm v. Gold, 140 Ind. 60, 40 N. E. 55; Dalton v. Hinsdale, 6 Mass. 501; Rogers v. Newbury, 105 Mass. 133; Wilson v. Coos County, 72 N. Accordingly, a physician cannot recover for any portion of the medicines or medical services which were furnished a poor person prior to the time of his employment by the township trustees to attend such person. Mansfield v. Sac County, 60 Iowa, 11, 14 N. W. 73.

Statutory duty to furnish relief as basis of implied promise to compensate.

Notwithstanding some of the earlier decisions which apparently incline to the opposite view, but which need not be noticed here, having long since been disapproved, it is now well settled that the existence of a statutory duty on the part of a county or town L.R.A.(N.S.)

town to furnish relief cannot be regarded as the basis of an implied contract to compensate the person who or municipality which furnishes such relief. On this head it is said in Lamson v. Newburyport, 14 Allen, 30: "The obligation of cities and towns to furnish relief and support to paupers is created by statute. No moral duty rests on them to give aid to the needy and distressed, and no legal liability exists except such as is derived from positive legislative enactments. Consequently no promise or undertaking on their part can be implied to pay for anything which may have been bestowed on a person standing in need of relief, unless it is shown to have been afforded under such circumstances as to come within the statutory provisions by which towns are made liable for expenses incurred for such a purpose."

By the established construction of the statutes for the aid of the poor, they imply no promise by the county to pay for services rendered by a physician or surgeon, even in cases of emergency, if there has been no judicial ascertainment that the person cared for is a pauper. Cantrell v. Clark County, 47 Ark. 239, 1 S. W. 200.

No person can charge the county for the board of a poor person, whether known to be a pauper or not, unless such person is legally authorized to furnish the board at the county's expense. Knox County v. Jones, 7 Ind. 3.

A town is not liable to reimburse an inhabitant of another town for expenses incurred by him in such other town for the relief of one of its paupers. Conley v. Woodville, 97 Me. 240, 54 Atl. 400.

An individual undertaking to support a pauper has no right to compensation as against the town of the pauper's settlement, except as it is given by statute. Mitchell v. Cornville, 12 Mass. 333.

The fact that one cares for a person who is a proper subject for public relief does not create in his favor a legal demand against the county. Reynolds v. Alcorn County, 59 Miss. 132.

ice can arise against them for such support. Otis v. Strafford, 10 N. H. 352.

An action on the case will not lie against overseers of the poor for omitting or refusing to take the necessary measures to provide for paupers, in favor of an individual who, from motives of humanity, furnishes them with the sustenance and attention which their situation absolutely requires. Minklaer v. Rockfeller, 6 Cow. 276.

There is no implied obligation upon an overseer or county superintendent of the poor to compensate a person who has voluntarily relieved a pauper, and without request from the overseers of the poor. Smith v. Williams, 13 Misc. 761, 35 N. Y. Supp. 236.

No contract to pay for the support of a pauper can be implied from the statutory duty to provide for the poor. Salsbury v. Philadelphia, 44 Pa. 303.

No promise to pay for supplies furnished to a pauper can be implied from the existence of a statutory duty to provide for indigent persons, and from the fact that the officers charged with such duty neglected and refused to make any provision. Caswell v. Hazard, 10 R. I. 490.

An action will not lie at common law against a town for the support of their paupers by any other town, nor can it be maintained on the general provision in the statute declaring it to be the duty of each town to support its own paupers, where the statute points out in what particular cases a town shall be liable to any town for their support, and what steps must be taken to render it liable. Middlebury v. Hubbardton, 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 205; Jamaica v. Guilford, 2 D. Chip. (Vt.) 103.

The obligation resting on a town to provide for the poor is a statutory obligation, and no implied contract that a town will pay an individual for affording assistance to those who are destitute and who are in ice and wet his feet. Being unable to find a lodging place, after walking several miles, he crawled into a straw stack, and remained during the night. In the morning both feet were frozen. After walking two or three miles, he caught a ride into Boone. He then had but $1.50, and after procuring a lunch inquired for a physician. Being advised by the chief of police that the county physician was out of town, he remained at the police station until the next morning, and at about 11 o'clock A. M. was examined by the county physician, who seems to have properly dressed his feet, and said he "would have to get him into a hospital." Upon his return to the station, J. W. Keigley, a member of the board of supervisors to whom had been assigned the duty of looking after the poor in that vicinity, conversed with him concerning the care of his feet, and was told by Wood that the county physician had said he would get him into a hospital. To this the officer responded, fact paupers may be inferred from the nature of the obligation, however urgent or great may be the necessities of the case. Aldrich v. Londonderry, 5 Vt. 441.

No obligation aside from that imposed by statute rests upon towns to sustain their own poor. The obligation is altogether a matter of positive law, and the right of anyone to compel towns to pay for the support of their poor is one stricti juris, and cannot be enforced except in accordance with some statutory provision. Hence an obligation or a promise on the part of a town to pay for the support of its poor can never be implied. Castleton v. Miner, 8 Vt. 209.

The general statutory provision that each town shall provide for its own poor creates no liability except in the cases expressly specified. Baldwin v. Rupert, 8 Vt. 256.

There is no consideration for a promise on the part of an overseer of the poor to pay for medical services rendered to a pauper before application to the overseer, even though with the expectation that the town would pay for them. Farmer v. Salisbury, 77 Vt. 161, 59 Afl. 201.

Where the law imposes on a municipality the duty of maintaining poor persons, and designates officers thereof to act in its behalf in the performance of such a duty, their mere neglect will not operate as an implied request to a private party to supply a needy person's wants, upon which such party can act, and hold the municipality liable as upon an implied contract. Patrick v. Baldwin, 109 Wis. 342, 53 L.R.A. 613, 85 N. W. 274.

Existence of emergency as basis for implied promise to compensate.

Without one exception, the cases seem unanimously to hold that the existence of an emergency rendering relief necessary before proper steps can be taken to charge the

"Did he say that?" His feet were painful throughout the day (Sunday), and at about 11 o'clock A. M. Monday the county physician, in response to a message, opened one or two blisters and dressed his feet again, and upon ascertaining he had formerly lived in Wisconsin, inquired if he wished to return there, and said he would talk with the supervisor about it. At about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, the chief of police informed him, "We are going to send you away on the 5:30 train," took him to the depot, and gave him a ticket to Nevada, the county seat of Story county. Keigley paid the chief of police the 48 cents expended for the ticket, and thereafter was reimbursed by the county on claim presented. Upon reaching Nevada, Wood obtained food, and slept that night in a livery stable. In the morning the city marshal, after building a fire, took him to the city hall, where he was examined by a local physician and his feet dressed. In the evening, money was raised by the marshal, from which he bought him a ticket to Mason City, and furnished him money to pay his way to Wisconsin. He was put aboard the train, and arrived at Mason City the next morning in a condition such as to preclude proceeding farther. At the instance of the humane officers of that county, he was taken to a hospital, and accorded the consideration and given the care and treatment usually bestowed in civilized communities on the unfortunate.

The story reads like the parable of the man who was wounded and left by the wayside half dead. The priest and the Levite passed by on the other side; but the good Samaritan "had compassion on him, . . . bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, . . . and brought him to an inn, and took care of him."

It was found necessary to amputate both feet, and the expenses incurred by Cerro Gordo county for his treatment, surgical public, or the refusal of relief by public officers, gives a person furnishing relief no right to compensation in the absence of statutory provision for such case. But see Lee County v. Gilbert, 70 Miss. 791, 12 So. 523, infra.

Thus, a poor district is not liable for services rendered to a person in distress in a case of emergency, where no provision is made therefor by statute. Williams v. Mercer County, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. 525.

There is no such duty incumbent upon a town to furnish medical assistance to poor persons as to render the town liable for assistance furnished in an emergency before the overseers could be applied to. French v. Benton, 44 N. H. 28.

No action lies by a physician against overseers of the poor for services in attending upon a pauper, though upon the most pressing necessity, the services not being rendered at the request of the overseers, and they not having promised to pay. Gourley v. Allen, 5 Cow. 644.

There is no obligation to pay for medical services furnished to a pauper unless furnished at the request of the proper officials. Everts v. Adams, 12 Johns. 352.

A county is under no legal liability for a physician's services to a nonresident, furnished without any direction from any person having authority to act. Hamilton County v. Meyers, 23 Neb. 718, 37 N. W. 623.

No county, nor any subdivision thereof, is liable for the support of the poor, or medical attendance bestowed thereon, unless the legislature has so authorized. Gilligan v. Grattan, 63 Neb. 242, 88 N. W. 477; Rock County v. Holt County, 78 Neb. 616, 11 N. W. 366.

A county is not liable for care and medical attendance upon an indigent transient person, in the absence of statutory provision. Upshur County v. Yeury, 19 Tex. 126, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A county is not liable for medical treatment given to a poor person out of humanity, the physician employed by the county commissioners to attend upon the poor of the township having refused to give such person any attention at all, the method by which support and relief are to be administered being definitely pointed out by law. Morgan County v. Seaton, 122 Ind. 521, 24 N. E. 213.

Since towns are not liable by the common law to support paupers, no compensation can be recovered for a surgical operation performed on a pauper without application to the overseers. Miller v. Somerset, 14 Mass. 396. Even where the operation is immediately necessary. Kittredge v. Newbury, 14 Mass. 448; Hull v. Oneida County, 10 Johns. 259, 10 Am. Dec. 223.

But in Lee County v. Gilbert, 70 Miss. 791, 12 So. 593, it was held that the county should be held liable for the fees of a surgeon for services rendered in an emergency to a poor person, although no steps had been taken by any county officer or other person to have such person declared a pauper and removed to the poorhouse in the manner prescribed by law.

In the absence of statute, a town is under no obligation to reimburse another town by which expenses have been incurred in caring for a person resident in the former while ill with a contagious disease. Machias v. Wesley, 99 Me. 17, 58 Atl. 240.

There being no duty outside of statute to provide for the burial of paupers, a pauper's place of residence is not liable for his burial expenses. Davis v. Milton Plantation, 90 Me. 512, 38 Atl. 539; Duval v. Laclede County, 21 Mo. 396; Handlin v. Morgan County, 57 Mo. 114; Morristown v. Hardwick, 81 Vt. 31, 69 Atl. 152.

operations, and subsequent care amounted to $713.95. For this amount, judgment is sought against Boone county, on the theory that it was obligated, upon discovering the condition of this nonresident pauper, and having begun caring for him, to furnish him such care and treatment as was essential to restore him to health; and that, instead of discharging such obligation, its officers, at a cost of a few cents, compelled him to move on, and as a consequence plaintiff was at the expense stated. Upon showing the facts as recited, verdict was directed for defendant, and subsequently judgment entered thereon.

The showing as made was not at all complimentary to the officers of Boone county, but, as no evidence was introduced in its behalf, there may be circumstances somewhat extenuating their conduct in casting a helpless man, sorely in need of medical aid, adrift, in order to evade the expenditure of a few dollars. The statutes provide adequate relief for paupers applying for succor having settlement in a county of this state, and if this is afforded by a county other than of the pauper's settlement, recovery may be had of the latter. Code, § 2228. But the county only becomes liable upon compliance with the statutes; that is, the liability of any county is purely statutory. Coolidge v. Mahaska County, 24 Iowa, 211; Cerro Gordo County v. Wright County, 50 Iowa, 439; Otis v. Strafford, 10 N. H. 352; Mansfield v. Sac County, 60 Iowa, 11, 14 N. W. 73; Gawley v. Jones County, 60 Iowa, 159, 14 N. W. 236.

The care of the poor was not a municipal function at the common law. Matters of charity were thought more appropriate for the church. It was ordained by the ancient kings that "the poor should be sustained by parsons, rectors of the church, and by parishioners, so that none of them die for want of sustenance." Later, and supposedly about the time of Hen. VIII., the law seems to have made paupers a charge on certain municipalities. Blackstone, in 1765, said: "The law not only regards life and member and protects every man in the enjoyment of them, but also furnishes him with everything necessary for their support. For there is no man so indigent or wretched, but he may demand a supply sufficient for all the necessities of life from the more opulent part of the community, by means of the several statutes enacted for the relief of the poor." 1 Bl. Com. 10th Eng. ed. 131.

Undoubtedly, the legislature is endowed with power to create liability on the part of the county for the care of the poor, and to determine under what circumstances one county shall be liable to another. Fox v. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Kendall, 97 Ill. 72. But, in the absence of such provisions, the obligation to pay any expenses incurred, no matter how meritorious the claim, is not to be implied, for the corporation is under neither a moral nor legal obligation to care for the poor. "Whatever may be the duty of individuals, from religious or charitable considerations, it is certain the public is bound by no moral obligation to support the poor of the community. That duty being legal and of positive institution is to be carried no farther than the express provisions of the poor laws." North Whitehall Twp. v. South Whitehall Twp. 3 Serg. & R. 117.

The only statutory provision authorizing the relief of the transient poor is found in § 2225 of the Code: "A person coming from another state, and not having become a citizen of, nor having a settlement in, the state, applying for relief, may be sent to the state whence he came, at the expense of the county, under an order of the district court or judge; otherwise, he is to be temporarily relieved in the county where he applies." The manner of relief is prescribed in § 2230: "The township trustees of each township, subject to general rules that may be adopted by the board of supervisors, shall provide for the relief of such poor persons in their respective townships as should not, in their judgment, be sent to the county poorhouse. But where a city is embraced, in whole or in part, within the limits of any township; the board of supervisors may appoint an overseer of the poor, who shall have within said city or part thereof, all the powers and duties conferred by this chapter on the township trustees. The relief may be either in the form of food, rent, or clothing, fuel and lights, medical attendance, or in money, and shall not exceed $2 per week for each person for whom relief is thus furnished, exclusive of medical attendance." All moneys expended are to be paid out of the county treasury (§ 2232, Code), and "when relief is granted by a county to a poor person having a settlement in another county" recovery may be had of the latter for the reasonable expenses so incurred. Section 2228, Code. But reimbursement for aid extended to a transient pauper is not directed, and, if plaintiff is entitled thereto, this must be owing to an implied promise on the part of Boone county to repay Cerro Gordo county. Cases may be found where an individual who has furnished the necessities of life to a pauper, after a municipality has omitted to discharge such duty, has been permitted to recover the value thereof, but in most of these this was contemplated by the statute authorizing the relief.

Our statutes direct by what officers relief shall be furnished, and there is no ground for charging the county, unless it is supplied by these, or at their instance. Beetham v. Lincoln, 16 Me. 137; Hamilton County v. Meyers, 23 Neb. 718, 37 N. W. 623; Copple v. Davie County, 138 N. C. 127, 50 S. E. 574; Cantrell v. Clark County, 47 Ark. 239, 1 S. W. 200; Kittredge v. Newbury, 14 Mass. 448; Gourley v. Allen, 5 Cow. 644. See note to Sheridan County v. Denebrink, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1232; Patrick v. Baldwin, 109 Wis. 342, 53 L.R.A. 613, 85 N. W. 274; North Whitehall Twp. v. South Whitehall Twp. 3 Serg. & R. 117. As well said in Patrick v. Baldwin, supra: "While an implied contract is sufficient, as indicated, it must be established, if one endeavors to recover upon it, the same as any other implied contract. The statute creates a liability to relieve destitute persons, but not a liability to individuals who may voluntarily perform that service. It empowers appropriate agents of municipalities to make their liability effective by necessary contracts to that end, and imposes upon such agents the duty to exercise such power. If they refuse to do so, they are doubtless amenable in some way for such misconduct, but the law gives no private person the right to perform the duty of such officers. Otis v. Strafford, 10 N. H. 352. Performance of that duty by the person designated by law is absolutely essential to create a binding obligation upon the municipality to compensate one for relieving a poor person, legally entitled to relief at its expense. . . . There is no more reason for holding that a person may aid a pauper, upon the supervisors of the town in which such pauper has a legal settlement neglecting their duty, and hold such town liable therefor, than for holding that one may repair the highways of a town, because its supervisors neglect their duty in that respect, and recover of such town therefor. The duty of the municipality in both cases is regulated by statute, and in neither case can it be bound to a private person for services rendered, except by contract made as contemplated by law."

The cases holding to the contrary seem to overlook the circumstance that the relief is purely statutory; that the duty to extend relief is expressed in general terms, leaving the occasion, method, and extent of relief to the judgment and discretion of the local officers; and therefore, to create a binding pecuniary obligation, there must be a contract to that effect, or services must have been rendered at the request of officers authorized to enter into the agreement. See Seagraves v. Alton, 13 Ill. 366; Ogden City v. Weber County, 26 Utah, 129, 72 Pac. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

433; Shreve v. Budd, 7 N. J. L. 431; Cincinnati Twp. v. Ogden, 5 Ohio, 23.

Doubtless some provision for emergencies exacting quick action should be made, but that is a matter for the legislature, and not the courts. It is not pretended that anything was done for Wood at the instance of the officers of Boone county, so that a promise to pay is not to be implied. Undoubtedly Boone county should have given him proper medical treatment. Brock v. Jones County, 145 Iowa, 397, 124 N. W. 209; Taylor v. Shenango, 114 Pa. 394, 6 Atl. 475. He there became helpless and a fit subject for relief. The duty to extend it was then immediately cast upon the defendant. But from its failure or refusal to respond, as both the law and the dictates of humanity required, an obligation to pay another individual or county is not to be inferred. Public charity is bestowed in this state as a duty, rather than as a corporate obligation, and therefore the extent of relief, as well as its character, is left to the discretion and judgment of the officers charged with the care of the helpless. Such officers may not delegate that duty to others (Sloan v. Webster County, 61 Iowa, 738, 17 N. W. 168); and, as seen, because of their omission thereof, succor may not be given by another, not at their instance, at the public expense. That the officers of Boone county may have been neglectful of the dire needs of Wood, who had never before asked alms, did not charge it with the expense incurred by an individual or another county in giving him the care and treatment his condition required. Nor can the circumstance that its officers gave him a ticket to Nevada be construed as a request to Cerro Gordo county to furnish relief.

By casting the unfortunate adrift, they avoided a manifest duty; and, though this may have resulted in putting the burden on another county, it cannot be said to have been assumed at the request of the officers of Boone county. The cause differs from those relied on by appellant. In Pittstown v. Plattsburgh, 15 Johns, 436, the defendants procured an order of court, transferring a transient pauper to Pittstown, and, as a consequence, he was maintained by the overseers thereof. Subsequently the order was quashed, and the court held that recovery could be had against the overseers procuring the order, on the principle "that a burden has unjustly been thrown upon Pittstown by the procurement of the overseers of the poor of Plattsburgh; that, the pauper having no legal settlement in this state, it was their duty to have exonerated Pittstown from the burden they had cast on them."

In Sheldon v. Fairfax, 21 Vt. 102, several towns joined in maintaining a poor farm within the limits of Sheldon; each agreeing to pay its share of the expense. In 1837, the town of Fairfax sent a foreign pauper and family in need of relief there, and they, or a part of them, were cared for at the poor farm until the termination of the arrangement in April, 1846. The town of Fairfax failed to remove them, and refused to pay the expense of their care, but the court held it liable, saying: "The duty of the town of Fairfax to take the pauper away when the temporary purpose for which he was sent was accomplished is necessarily implied from the contract between the two towns; and the town of Sheldon, having suffered injury by the breach of that duty, is entitled to compensation. I apprehend there is no doubt but that, upon acknowledged legal principles, the plaintiff's claim is well sustained. It rests on the common doctrine that, when one party sustains an injury by the culpable misconduct or negligence of another, the party injured may recover compensation for it by an action on the case." There is nothing in the record to bring the case within the principle recognized in either of these decisions. The officers of defendant did no more than neglect and omit to perform the statutory duty imposed, and, nothing having been done by defendant at their instance or request, the court rightly held that there could be no recovery.

WILLIAM B. WOOD, Appt.,

v.

BOONE COUNTY et al.

Poor — failure to relieve — liability.

Neither a county nor its overseer of poor is liable for the loss by a transient pauper of his feet because it failed to give him

Note. — Liability to poor person for failure to furnish, or negligence in furnishing, relief.

There is a dictum in Flower v. Allen, 5 Cow. 654, that if the overseers of the poor wholly neglect their duty in providing for a pauper, he may, under some circumstances, maintain an action for the injury sustained by such neglect.

In Merrill v. Bassett, 97 Me. 501, 54 Atl. 1102, it was held that the liability of one employed by the overseers of the poor to remove a sick person from one town to another, under the pauper law, did not depend upon whether as a matter of fact the plaintiff was in a fit physical condition to be moved, but upon whether, in moving the plaintiff, he acted as a reasonably prudent and careful person would under like circumstances have done, by making proper inquiry as to whether the plaintiff was in a suitable physical condition, by selecting a day affording proper weather conditions, and by furnishing the poor person with suitable wearing apparel to protect her, considering her condition, from the weather, and a conveyance to and from the train

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Story County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure of defendants to furnish proper relief to plaintiff. Affirmed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Action at law to recover damages due to defendant's failure to furnish plaintiff, who was a transient poor person, proper relief. Defendant Keigley was a member of the board of supervisors of defendant county and overseer of the poor of that county. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, the trial court directed a verdict for the defendants and plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. E. H. Addison and Harpel & Cederquist, for appellees:

The duty of defendants to the plaintiff as a foreign pauper is prescribed by statute under the title of the "Police Power of the State," and it is governmental, discretionary, and quasi judicial, and does not extend beyond the granting of temporary relief.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There being no legal obligation at common law upon a county or any of the instrumentalities of government to furnish relief to the poor, plaintiff's action, if he has any, must be bottomed upon some statute of the state entitling him to relief. Coolidge v. Mahaska County, 24 Iowa, 211. His counsel think they find such duty in §§ 2225 and 2230 of the Code, reading as follows:

"A person coming from another state, and not having become a citizen of, nor having a settlement in, the state, applying for relief, may be sent to the state whence he came, at the expense of the county, under an order of the district court or judge; otherwise he is to be temporarily relieved in the county where he applies." Code, § 2225.

"The township trustees of each township, subject to general rules that may be adopted by the board of supervisors, shall provide for the relief of such poor persons in their respective townships as should not, in their judgment, be sent to the county poor-house. But where a city is embraced, in whole or in part, within the limits of any township, the board of supervisors may appoint an overseer of the poor, who shall have within said city, or part thereof, all the powers and duties conferred by this chapter on the township trustees. The relief may be either in the form of food, rent, or clothing, fuel and lights, medical attendance, or in money, and shall not exceed $2 per week for each person for whom relief is thus furnished, exclusive of medical attendance. They may require any able-bodied person to labor faithfully on the streets or highways at the rate of 5 cents per hour in payment for, and as a condition of, granting relief; said labor shall be performed under the direction of the officers having charge of working streets and highways. When medical services are rendered by order of the trustees or overseers of the poor, no more shall be charged or paid therefor than is usually charged for like services in the neighborhood where such services are rendered. No supervisor, trustee, or overseer shall be directly or indirectly interested in any supplies furnished the poor." Code, § 2230.

"The poor must make application for relief to the trustees of the township where they may be, and if the trustees are satisfied that the applicant is in such a state of want as requires relief at the public expense, they may afford such relief, subject to the approval of the board of supervisors, as the necessities of the person require, and shall report the case forthwith to the board of supervisors, who may continue or deny in a careful and prudent manner; and that he had discharged his duty by inquiring of plaintiff's attending physician as to whether her condition was such that she might be moved, and, receiving an affirmative answer, by selecting a day which was an average warm one for the time of year, and by furnishing such clothing as the plaintiff said she needed to keep her comfortable.

In Meier v. Paulus, 70 Wis. 165, 35 N. W. 301, an action against the keeper of the county poor farm, to recover damages for his neglect in not properly watching and caring for the plaintiff while he was in his charge, being then sick with pneumonia and temporarily deranged, it was held that, even though the plaintiff was brought to the poor farm without any authority from the proper officers of the county, and though the defendant was not required by law to receive the plaintiff into the poorhouse, or to take care of him there, yet, having received him into his house, and having undertaken to take care of him, he would be liable for neglect to give him proper care; and that where there was evidence tending to show that he knew of the nature of the plaintiff's disease, that he was not permanently insane, that the effects of the disease under which he was laboring rendered him for the time wholly incompetent to take care of himself, that he knew that in his delirium he was inclined to leave the house, that he knew that he had left the house the first night he was in his custody, and that about 2 o'clock A. M. on the second night he knew that the plaintiff had left the house again dressed only in his shirt and pantaloons, and with nothing but stockings on his feet, that the weather was very cold and the snow deep, and that the probabilities of his being injured by his exposure were very great, that nevertheless, he made no attempt to rescue him from this dangerous situation, nor did he request or direct any person under his control to make any attempt to rescue him, the court could not say as a matter of law that there was no evidence tending to show that the defendant had neglected his duty. As to liability of public for relief furnished by others to poor persons, see note to Cerro Gordo County v. Boone County, ante, 161.

relief, as they find cause. The board of supervisors may examine into all claims, including claims for medical attendance, allowed by the township trustees for the support of the poor, and, if they find the amount allowed by said trustees to be unreasonable, exorbitant, or for any goods or services other than the necessities of life, they may reject or diminish the claim, as in their judgment would be right and just; and this act shall apply to all counties in the state, whether there are poorhouses established in the same or not. This act shall apply to acts of overseers of poor in cities as well as to township trustees." Code, § 2234.

In addition to these sections, we quote the following as having some bearing upon the case:

"Persons coming into the state, or going from one county to another, who are county charges, or are likely to become such, may be prevented from acquiring a settlement by the authorities of the county, township, or city in which such persons are found, warning them to depart therefrom. After such warning, such persons cannot acquire a settlement except by the requisite residence of one year without further warning." Code, § 2226.

"Such warning shall be in writing, and may be served upon the order of the trustees of the township, or of the board of supervisors, by any person; and such person shall make a return of his doings thereon to the board of supervisors, which, if not made by a sworn officer, must be verified by affidavit." Code, § 2227.

"The trustees in each township, in counties where there is no poorhouse, have the oversight and care of all poor persons in their township, and shall see that they receive proper care until provided for by the board of supervisors." Code, § 2233.

"All claims and bills for the care and support of the poor shall be certified to be correct by the proper trustees, and presented to the board of supervisors, and, if they are satisfied that they are reasonable and proper, they shall be paid out of the county treasury. In no case shall a trustee, or either of the trustees, nor overseer of the poor, draw an order upon himself, or upon either of the board, for supplies for the poor, except such trustees or overseer has a contract to furnish such supplies." Code, § 2235.

"The board of supervisors may make contracts with the lowest responsible bidder for furnishing any or all supplies, medical attendance or services required for the poor, for a term not exceeding one year, or it may enter into a contract with the lowest responsible bidder, through proposals opened and examined at a regular session of the board, for the support of any or all the poor of the county for one year at a time, and may make all requisite orders to that effect, and shall require all such contractors to give bonds in such sum as it believes sufficient to secure the faithful performance of the same." Code, § 2238.

"The word 'poor' and 'poor person' as used in this chapter shall be construed to mean those who have no property, exempt or otherwise, and are unable, because of physical or mental disabilities, to earn a living by labor; but this section shall not be construed to forbid aid to needy persons who have some means, when the board shall be of opinion that the same will be conducive to their welfare and the best interests of the public." Code, § 2252.

Now, the charge in the petition is, in substance, that plaintiff was a foreign pauper; that he came into defendant county about January 25, 1908, with badly frozen feet, which needed medical attention; that defendant Keigley was a member of the board of supervisors of defendant county, and a committee on and the overseer of the poor; that plaintiff made application to the defendant through its proper officers for relief, and that defendant undertook to furnish him some relief, but that, after undertaking the same, it negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully withheld adequate or proper treatment, and on the 27th day of January "expelled plaintiff from Boone county," subjecting him to exposure, and depriving him of proper care until he reached Cerro Gordo county, on the 29th day of January, where he was received and taken care of by the proper county authorities. He claims that, by reason of the negligent and wrongful conduct of the defendant county and its agent Keigley, he lost both feet, and suffered great mental and bodily pain. The testimony shows that plaintiff arrived in the city of Boone at the time alleged; that his feet were frozen; that he went to the police station in Boone, and asked the chief of police where he could find a doctor. To this the chief responded that he would see. The mayor of the city was also present, and, after some cross-examination of plaintiff by these officials, plaintiff said to them that he was short of money and needed a doctor. The police officer told plaintiff he would give him a night's lodging, and accordingly housed him in the police station during the night. When plaintiff arose in the morning, he made inquiry as to the doctor, and the chief of police said he would see about it. About 11 A. M. plaintiff was taken to the office of the county physician, and there examined and given some treatment. The doctor then said to him that he would have to get him into a hospital. After plaintiff's return to the police station after seeing the doctor, he first met defendant Keigley, and he testified to the following conversation with him, Keigley: "He told me that the doctor said for me to keep my feet warm. He placed a chair for me to put my feet on near the radiator, and I made the remark to Keigley that the doctor said he would get me in the hospital. Mr. Keigley said, 'Did he say that?' and turned, and went out of the station." The doctor saw plaintiff on Sunday morning, and on Monday morning he again visited plaintiff, at his, plaintiff's, request, in company with defendant Keigley and the chief of police. The doctor dressed plaintiff's feet in the presence of the others, and remarked that they were looking good. At this time the doctor asked plaintiff where he lived, and was informed that he used to live in Wisconsin. He was then asked if he wanted to go there, and, in response, said that, if he had the means to go, he would like to. The doctor then said he would talk with defendant Keigley about it. On Monday afternoon the chief of police came to plaintiff, and said, "We are going to send you away on the 5:30 train." Making no protest, he started to walk to the depot, but was finally taken in a buggy by the chief to the railway depot, and given a ticket to Nevada, Story county, just as the train was about to start. When he arrived at Nevada, the following occurred: "The train reached Nevada about 6 o'clock, where I got off. A busman took me up to a restaurant. I got some supper there. After supper I walked on the street thinking to see the marshal, and, not seeing him, I went to a livery barn. My feet were very painful at this time, and I was more unwell than I was in the afternoon. At the livery barn the proprietor permitted me to sleep in the office. The next morning I saw Mr. Corbin, the marshal. . . the livery man found him for me. Mr. Clinton said for me to stop there, and he would go and build a fire at the city hall, and that I could then go there and lie down. About half an hour after that I walked over to the city hall. At the city hall that morning, Tuesday, about 9 o'clock, Dr. Chamberlain came to see me. My feet were very painful, and I was getting quite sick. The doctor dressed my feet. They were quite dark at that time. After that visit I did not walk any more. My feet had got so painful that I could not. I was there until the evening train went East. Mr. Corbin bought me a ticket to Mason City, and gave me money to go from there to Wisconsin, and there was a cot and there to Wisconsin, and there was a cot and there to Wisconsin brought in to me. The train left soon after 6 o'clock . . . the same number I came on from Boone." He pursued his journey through Marshalltown, and was taken off the train at Mason City, and there given attention by the public authorities.

That plaintiff lost his feet by reason of inadequate and untimely treatment a jury may well have found, but the vital and fundamental question in the case is the liability of the defendant county and the member of the board of supervisors, who is made a joint defendant.

In addition to what has already been set out, the following is the only testimony of plaintiff with reference to defendant Keigley's connection with the matter:

I told Dr. Nimms I used to live in Wisconsin, that I had a brother there that I used to make my home with, but he was not living there.

Q. Mr. Keigley was there?

A. Mr. Keigley and Mr. Jones. Whether they were in there at the time we had this conversation I don't know.

Q. Didn't you tell Dr. Nimms that you wanted to go to your relation in Wisconsin?

A. He asked me if I wanted to go, and I said: "If I had the means to go, I would go." I didn't tell him I wanted to go. My first talk with Mr. Keigley was shortly after seeing the doctor the first time. I was sitting on a chair near the window by the radiator, and he said, "The doctor says you must keep your feet warm," and he got a chair and placed it there for my feet.

Q. He spoke to you kindly?

A. Yes, that was when I made the remark to him that the doctor told me he would get me into a hospital, and he remarked, "Did he say that?" and went out.

Q. What did you say?

A. I said, "Yes, sir," and he went out. Mr. Keigley was in when the doctor was looking at my feet the next day. I don't call to mind that he made any remark in particular. That is the last time I saw Mr. Keigley.

However, the chief of police said that he purchased the ticket for plaintiff upon the advice of Keigley, and that he was reimbursed for the cost thereof by Keigley, and Keigley presented his bill to the board, and it was allowed. It should also be stated in this connection that there was testimony tending to show that with proper treatment at Boone plaintiff's feet might have been saved. Such is the record in its most favorable aspect for plaintiff, and we have to inquire whether or not there is any legal liability on the part of the defendants or either of them. It is argued that defendant Keigley may be liable, although the defendant county may not be, for the reason that he was under a personal duty of using

Such is the record in its most favorable aspect for plaintiff, and we have to inquire whether or not there is any legal liability on the part of the defendants or either of them. It is argued that defendant Keigley may be liable, although the defendant county may not be, for the reason that he was under a personal duty of using due care,—a care commensurate with the situation in which he found the plaintiff. Whatever the view of other courts upon this proposition, we are committed to the doctrine that, under the facts here disclosed, there is no liability on the part of Keigley, unless the county be held responsible. From Packard v. Voltz, 94 Iowa, 277, 58 Am. St. Rep. 396, 62 N. W. 757, we quote as follows, directly applicable to the facts disclosed by this record: "It must certainly be an anomalous doctrine that would exempt the corporation itself from liability for the doing of a lawful act in a negligent manner, upon the ground of its compulsory agency in behalf of the public welfare, and at the same time affix liability upon its agent for precisely the same acts done under express authority. We think an instance of such liability is not to be found. It must be a reason for the rule of exemption on the part of a political corporation that its agency is a public necessity, and it seems to us that the same law that would give it exemption from liability for negligence would protect from liability the servant through whom only the corporation can discharge its duty to the public." See also Beeks v. Dickinson County, 131 Iowa, 245, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 831, 108 N. W. 311, 9 Ann. Cas. 812.

So that we are brought at last to the controlling proposition: Is a county liable in damages for failure to furnish adequate and timely medical aid and assistance to a foreign pauper who may transiently be within its borders? A county is an instrumentality of government, and the furnishing of aid to the poor is a governmental function. The necessity for and the extent of such relief is largely, if not wholly, a matter of discretion, and is quasi judicial in character. The relief which may be granted a foreign pauper is temporary in character, and such persons may be prevented from acquiring a settlement in the county where found. Before one is entitled to relief under § 2234 of the Code, he must satisfy the overseer of the poor within a city that he is in such a state of want as requires relief at public expense, and even then this section does not require that such relief be furnished. Moreover, not only the overseer of the poor must be so satisfied, but the board of supervisors are also to look into the matter, and inquire as to the necessities of the case.

It is a general rule that, where a governmental duty rests upon a state or any of its instrumentalities, there is absolute immunity in respect to all acts or agencies. Peeks v. Dickinson County, supra. In this case it is said: "In so far as a municipality undertakes the duty of making and enforcing quarantine regulations and other laws for the promotion of the public health, it is performing governmental functions, and its officers are not agents for whose action or inaction it is liable, unless such liability is imposed by its charter or by the laws of the state under which it exists. . . . The remaining question is whether the members of the local board of health are individually liable for the loss of the plaintiff's crops. The statute makes it the duty of the health officers to quarantine against all 'infectious or contagious diseases dangerous to the public,' and it cannot well be questioned that the defendants were acting within the scope of their duty as such officers, and that in establishing the quarantine they were acting in a quasi judicial character. They were vested with the power to determine whether an infectious or contagious disease existed in the appellant's family, and, if found to exist, their duty under the statute required them to take proper steps to prevent its spread, and, had they neglected to do so, they would have been culpable in a high degree. They were therefore acting judicially, and it is the general rule that officers so acting are not liable for injuries which may result from such acts performed in the honest exercise of their judgment, however erroneous or mistaken the action may be, provided there be no malice or wrong motive present." See also McFadden v. Jewell, 119 Iowa, 324, 60 L.R.A. 401, 97 Am. St. Rep. 321, 93 N. W. 302: As supporting the same proposition, see Ogg v. Lansing, 35 Iowa, 495, 14 Am. Rep. 499; Kincaid v. Hardin County, 53 Iowa, 431, 36 Am. Rep. 236, 5 N. W. 589; Calwell v. Boone, 51 Iowa, 687, 33 Am. Rep. 154, 2 N. W. 614; Saunders v. Ft. Madison, 111 Iowa, 103, 82 N. W. 428; Lahner v. Williams, 112 Iowa, 428, 84 N. W. 507; Easterly v. Irwin, 99 Iowa, 696, 68 N. W. 919. A great number of cases announcing the same rule are to be found in 28 Cyc. 1305, 1306. Some cases seem to make an exception where the county undertakes to furnish relief, and in doing so negligently fails to use proper and necessary care. Such an exception seems to be made in Meier v. Paulus, 70 Wis. 165, 35 N. W. 301. But the contrary rule was announced in Lexington v. Batson, 118 Ky. 489, 81 S. W. 264; Twyman v. Frankfort, 117 Ky. 518, 64 L.R.A. 572, 78 S. W. 446, 4 Ann. Cas. 622; Richmond v. Long, 17 Gratt. 375, 94 Am. Dec. 461.

That the Wisconsin court did not intend to depart from the general rule is manifest from a consideration of a later case reported in 92 Wis. 263, 65 N. W. 1030, under the title of Kuehn v. Milwaukee. Again, in the Meier Case, the action was against a county poor master for his personal neglect, and it is clearly stated in the opinion that defendant was under no obligation to receive an insane patient, and could not have been held liable for failure to accept him as an inmate of a county house, but that, having received him, he was under the duty of exercising ordinary care for his safety. The question of liability for failure to exercise a governmental function was neither discussed nor decided. Conceding arguendo that the defendant Keigley might be personally liable for failure to exercise due care after undertaking to grant a relief, although the county itself would not be liable, this liability must be founded upon negligence, and it must be shown that he undertook to furnish plaintiff with proper treatment in virtue of his office, and that he either wrongfully or negligently failed to perform the duty. There is no showing that defendant did anything more than see the plaintiff when the county physician was treating him, and that he had no other part in securing his removal from the county than ratifying what the chief of police did by reimbursing him the amount paid for the ticket. It is very doubtful if this amounted to anything more than an attempt upon the part of defendant to get plaintiff out of the county, to which the plaintiff consented. But the greatest obstacle to recovery is the fact that there is no testimony tending to show that defendant Keigley knew it was dangerous to life or health to send the plaintiff away. The doctor who had charge of plaintiff for defendant county said, in the presence of both plaintiff and Keigley, that his, plaintiff's, feet were looking good. After that, plaintiff started to walk to the train, and was picked up by the chief of police and carried there in a buggy. There is a lack of testimony showing, or tending to show, that defendant Keigley had any knowledge or information of any danger involved in moving the defendant away from the county. The most that can be said is that the defendant wanted to rid the county of the expense of caring for plaintiff, and that he was seeking to avoid furnishing aid. Had it been shown, as in the Wisconsin case, that defendant Keigley knew of the plaintiff's condition, and that he was likely to suffer great injury if he were not cared for, there might, if we were to adopt the reasoning of the minority of the courts, be some ground of liability. But the record does not disclose such a situation. However, we are committed to the doctrine of absolute immunity in the performance of this governmental function, to both the county and its officials, and, if we are to adhere to this rule so many times announced, the other proposition need not be considered.

We cannot close, however, without suggesting that the practice of shifting foreign paupers from one county to another does not meet with our approval, and such a policy, as said in Mansfield v. Sac County, 60 Iowa, 14, 14 N. W. 73, is a disgrace to our civilization.

Our conclusion is that the judgment must be and it is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

GREENFIELD SAVINGS BANK, by Arthur B. Chapin, Bank Commissioner,
v.
ROBERT ABERCROMBIE et al.

(211 Mass. 252, 97 N. E. 897.)

Savings banks — loss of funds — personal liability of trustees.

1. Salaried trustees of a savings bank are personally liable for loss of its funds which they lend in excess of the statutory limit for the security furnished if, by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, they ought to have known that they were exceeding the limit.

Pleading — bill against savings-bank trustees — allegations of interest.

2. Allegations that loans were made to assist transactions in which defendants were interested, and that they received considerations for making them, are proper in a bill seeking to hold savings-bank trustees personally liable for losses of funds through loans made by them.

Savings banks — loans — statutory requirements.

3. Statutory requirements that, in lending money by a savings bank, only first mortgages shall be taken, after report on the value of the property, and that all applications for loans shall be in writing, are mandatory, and trustees will be personally

Note. — Liability of bank directors in case of bad loans or investments.

The early decisions on this subject are collected in a note appended to Bosworth v. Allen, 55 L.R.A. 751, covering the general subject of the liability of the directors of a corporation.

As to liability of bank directors for default or negligence of cashier, see note to Mason v. Moore, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 597.

As to liability of bank director for breach of duty as such when he acts for himself or for a third person in the transaction, see note to Hicks v. Steel, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 279.

On the general question as to jurisdiction of equity over suits by a corporation or its representative to hold the directors or officers liable for the losses of such corporation occasioned by the fraud, bad faith, responsible for money lost through loans made without observing these requirements.

Same — failure to observe by-laws — effect.

4. Trustees of a savings bank are personally liable for money lost through loans made without observing the limitations imposed by the rules and by-laws of the institution.

Limitation of actions — losses by savings-bank trustees — discovery by bank.

5. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against liability of trustees of a savings bank for money lost through loans made by them in contravention of statute and the rules of the institution, until the facts are learned by the institution.

(February 20, 1912.)

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Fairfield County for the opinion of the full bench of a demurrer to a bill filed to hold defendants liable for losses on certain specified loans of the plaintiff bank's money, alleged to have been made by defendants on certain described parcels of real estate, in violation of statute and the rules of the plaintiff bank. Demurrer overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

or negligence of such officers, see note to Emerson v. Gaither, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 738.

As shown in the early note, bank directors are bound to possess ordinary skill and capacity, and to exercise reasonable care and diligence in the exercise of the powers conferred upon them. To the same effect is Rankin v. Cooper, 149 Fed. 1010.

Some cases announce the rule that a bank director is required to exercise such reasonable care and diligence as a reasonably prudent man would exercise under like circumstances (Stone v. Rottman, 183 Mo. 573, 82 S. W. 76; Rankin v. Cooper, supra); while other cases have held that a bank director is required to exercise such a degree of care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise in his own affairs (Hanna v. Lyon, 179 N. Y. 107, 71 N. E. 778; Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co. 64 Misc. 303, 118 N. Y. Supp. 758; Hanna v. People's Nat. Bank, 35 Misc. 517, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1076; Kavanaugh v. Gould, 131 N. Y. Supp. 1059).

And it has been said that the degree of care required further depends upon the subject to which it is to be applied, and each case must be determined in view of all the circumstances; that if nothing has come to the knowledge to awaken suspicion that something is going wrong, ordinary attention to the affairs of the institution is sufficient; but if, on the other hand, directors know, or, by the exercise of ordinary care, should have known, any facts which would awaken suspicion and put a prudent man on his guard, then a degree of care commensurate with the evil to be avoided is required, and a want of that care makes them responsible. Rankin v. Cooper, supra.

In Stone v. Rottman, 183 Mo. 552, 82 S. W. 76, it is pointed out that there is a marked difference between the duty which the directors of a bank owe to the bank and that which they owe to strangers or creditors; that, aside from statutory liability, bank directors are not liable to creditors and depositors for mere nonfeasance, though they are liable to the bank or to its assignee or received for losses resulting from neglect of duty.

The national banking act, imposing certain express duties and liabilities, does not relieve the directors from the common-law 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

liability for failure diligently and honestly to administer the affairs of the bank. Allen v. Luke, 163 Fed. 1018.

Liability for loss resulting from acts in excess of their power.

As pointed out in the earlier note (pp. 758, 761), there is a distinction between the question as to the liability of directors for acts that are in excess of their power and their liability for acts and omissions with respect to matters within their authority.

At common law the liability of bank directors for resulting losses, where they knowingly exceed their authority, is established without reference to the question whether or not what they did might be justified on the principle of reasonable care.

And the rule imposing liability for losses from acts beyond their authority has been expressly adopted by statute—national banking act and statutes of various states.

Accordingly it has been held that where loss has resulted from excessive loans made in violation of the banking law, the only inquiry is whether the loans were knowingly made or assented to by the directors. City Nat. Bank v. Crow, 27 Okla. 107, 111 Pac. 210, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 647.

Directors of a national bank who engage in or knowingly permit the funds of the bank to be used in stock speculations are liable for the losses thus occasioned, stock speculation being no part of the business of a national bank. McKinnon v. Morse, 177 Fed. 576.

Liability for acts or omissions with respect to matters within their authority.

In Rankin v. Cooper, 149 Fed. 1010, it is held that it is incumbent upon bank directors, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, and as a part of their duty of general supervision, to cause an examination of the condition and resources of the bank to be made with reasonable frequency.

Accordingly it was held that the bank directors were personally liable for losses that could have been prevented by a proper discharge by them of their duties after they had been warned by the Comptroller of the Currency to eliminate all paper of a certain

More negligence is not a ground for making directors and persons holding similar positions responsible for losses due to an error in judgment, where that judgment has been honestly exercised.

character from the assets of the bank, and admonished that it was the duty of the board to meet more frequently. Ibid.

Bank directors and members of the executive committee are guilty of negligence rendering them liable to the bank for losses resulting from their failure to require all loans and investments to be reported to them for approval, where, under the by-laws, as well as the custom in well-regulated institutions in that vicinity, it was their duty to do so. Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co. 64 Misc. 303, 118 N. Y. Supp. 758.

Nor are the directors not members of the executive committee excused from liability because they committed their duties to the executive committee, and relied upon them to examine the loans and collateral, where, by proper vigilance, they could have acquired knowledge and prevented the wrongdoing and the resulting losses. Ibid.

Bank directors who, as members of the discount and examining committees of the bank, permit the cashier to loan the funds of the bank in the shape of paying over drafts of insolvent persons, without the approval of the discount committee, and without bringing the matter to the attention of the board of directors, are guilty of such negligence as to render them personally liable to the receiver for resulting losses. Stone v. Rottman, supra.

Under a statute imposing upon bank directors the duty of managing the affairs of the bank, and rendering them liable for intentional neglect or refusal to perform their duties, the bank directors are liable to creditors of the bank for losses which resulted from allowing the cashier to lend to one person and his various enterprises, without security, sums of money largely in excess of the capital stock of the bank, and to continue that course of dealing for a period of several years, which resulted in the insolvency of the bank. duties as trustees, would have learned that the affairs of the association were being mismanaged, and of the financial condition of the bank in which the funds of the association were on deposit, were liable to the depositors for losses due to the insolvency of the bank, notwithstanding the by-law of the association which exempted the trustees from responsibility for losses except such as resulted from their wilful misconduct. The court said: "In our judgment the duties and responsibilities of the trustees herein partake more of the character of ordinary trustees than of bank directors or of any other officer of an incorporated company. Whatever the responsibility, it must depend, as has been stated, largely upon the subject under consideration, and be determined in view of all the circumstances surrounding the transactions."

The president of a bank is personally liable for losses sustained through his conduct by personally permitting a depositor to overdraw his account and borrow money without security, without the knowledge and consent of the board of directors and advisory committee, which was daily on hand to pass on loans applied for. Western Bank v. Coldewey, 120 Ky. 776, 83 S. W. 629.

But bank directors are not guilty of neglect of duty making them liable to stockholders for a loss resulting from a loan made by the vice president and general manager surreptitiously and without their knowledge, while two of them were out of the state on important business, and the other was absent on account of ill health, where, upon discovering the transaction, they made all reasonable efforts to collect the amount involved. Warren v. Robison, 25 Utah, 205, 70 Pac. 980.

In First State Bank v. Morton, 146 Ky. 287, 142 S. W. 694, it was held that an unsalaried president of the bank, who was a mere figurehead of the institution, and not familiar with the banking business, was liable only for gross neglect in the management of the corporation, and was not liable to the bank for failure to prevent the cashier, who was given the entire management of the bank, from making illegal and excessive loans.

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill is brought in the name of the plaintiff by the bank commissioner, who, it is averred, has taken possession of the business and property of the plaintiff under the provisions of Stat. 1910, chap. 399, and is now administering its affairs. The defendants were five of the seventeen members of the plaintiff's board of trustees, constituted its investment committee, and two of them were respectively its president and vice president. The bill alleges that the defendants, in violation of their duties, have committed many acts of misconduct specifically set out in the bill, and seeks to hold them personally liable for large losses on certain specified loans of the bank's money, alleged to have been made by them on certain described parcels of real estate. It is averred that in making these loans the defendants violated the statutes then in force (Stat. 1894, chap. 317, §§ 21, 24), and also the by-laws of the plaintiff; and the particulars of such violations are set out in detail. It is charged that these investments were made contrary to law and in excess of the authority of the defendants, and that they resulted in the loss to the bank of large sums of money. The details as to the making of each one of these investments and as to the subsequent dealings of the defendants therewith are stated in the bill, and the alleged wrongful acts of the defendants and the losses resulting therefrom are fully set out. According to the averments, each of these loans was largely in excess of the value of the security taken, "as the defendants well knew, or, by the exercise of a reasonable degree of care and prudence, might have known;" most of them were made without any report or certificate of two members of the board of investment (Stat. 1894, chap. 317, § 21, cl. 1); in many instances no written applications for the loans were made and recorded, as required by § 24 of the same act; and in some instances money was lent on second mortgages. It is alleged also that the rules (which are specified in the bill) adopted by the board of trustees were not complied with in the respects specified in the bill. It is alleged that these loans were made to or for one Rich and one Dowlin, for the purpose of assisting them in certain real-estate transactions in which the defendants had an interest. Further manipulations of some of these properties are averred to have been made by the defendants by causing deeds of them to be given, and by making foreclosures, followed by other deeds, resulting in the defendants' taking for the bank new and larger mortgages upon the same properties which had been found to be insufficient security for the original and smaller loans.

Each of the defendants has demurred to the bill on many different grounds. It scarcely seems necessary to discuss these separately. It will be enough to consider the objections which have been stated in the elaborate argument made for the defendants.

They contend in the first place that the members of the investment committee of a savings bank, acting in good faith, are not liable for losses resulting from errors of judgment attributable to mere negligence in making loans within the scope of their authority. They say that the averments of the bill are not sufficient to show that they acted unlawfully by taking loans to an excessive amount upon property of insufficient value. Those averments are in substance that the loans were largely in excess of the statutory limit, "as the defendants well knew, or, by the exercise of a reasonable degree of care and prudence, might have known." It follows, of course, from the recognized rules of equity pleading, that such an averment in the alternative does not charge actual knowledge, but simply that the defendants, by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, ought to have known the fact. This they say is not sufficient; and they rely upon a large number of familiar decisions in which it has been held that the directors or managers of a business corporation conducted for profit are not to be made responsible for losses due to a mere error of judgment, where there has been an honest exercise of judgment. It is not necessary to refer to these cases in detail. They are almost without exception statements or illustrations of the rule laid down in Lyman v. Bonney, 118 Mass. 222, and Overend, G. & Co. v. Gibb, L. R. 5 H. L. 480, 42 L. J. Ch. N. S. 67. But these and similar decisions are not applicable to the case of a savings bank under the laws of this commonwealth. As was said in Gilson v. Cambridge Sav. Bank, 180 Mass. 444, 446, 62 N. E. 728, we have an "elaborate statutory system for the government and regulation of savings banks, which is intended to protect the interests of depositors." As to these depositors, for the encouragement of thrift by the allowance of interest upon small savings, they approximate somewhat to the character of charitable institutions. They are designed to help the poorer members of the community to help themselves by giving them an opportunity to make their small savings productive, and thus to confer upon them a greater and more lasting benefit than in many cases can be derived from mere eleemosynary assistance. Accordingly definite and rigid provisions have been made by our statutes for the administration of savings banks. Not to go outside the time here in question, see Stat. 1894, chap. 137, §§ 13 et seq. It is not without significance that in this statute, as in former and subsequent ones, the governing board of officers is given the name of trustees. Careful provisions are prescribed also for the investment of the deposits that may be received; and it is manifest upon the most cursory reading that the dominant purpose of the legislature has been to provide in this way for the safety of the money intrusted to savings banks, and to hold the officers intrusted therewith to a strict accountability. As was said in Lewis v. Lynn Inst. for Savings, 148 Mass. 235, 243, 1 L.R.A. 785, 12 Am. St. Rep. 535, 19 N. E. 365, 367: "The fundamental idea has never been departed from, that all the funds and investments of a savings bank are held exclusively for the benefit and security of the depositors. This idea was, and still is, the corner stone of the whole system. . . . To others, to third persons, the corporation can incur liabilities, in contract or in tort, for which the funds in its hands will be responsible. But to the depositors themselves, the undertaking of the corporation is that it will receive and combine the deposits, and manage and use them to the best practical advantage, according to the judgment of the trustees, and give to the depositors in just proportion among themselves the benefit of the result of such management." In other words, the savings bank and its managing officers or trustees are held to the same duty as ordinary trustees of a direct trust. See Re Newark Sav. Inst. 28 N. J. Eq. 552. For honest errors of judgment, while acting with ordinary skill and prudence, measured according to the demands of the duties or business which they have taken upon themselves, they are not to be held liable; but they cannot excuse themselves from the consequences of their misconduct or of their ignorance or negligence by averring that they have failed merely to exercise ordinary skill, care, and vigilance. And so are the decisions as to the trustees or managing officers of savings banks in New York and New Jersey, in which such banks are not commercial institutions having a capital stock and conducted in whole or in part for the gain of their stockholders, but occupy the same position and are intended to serve the same beneficent purposes as is the case in this commonwealth. It is held that the relation between the managing officers and the depositors, or the bank, as representing them, is that of trustees and cestuis que trust. Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 65, 37 Am. Rep. 546, in which it was held also that where loss has occurred from the failure of such a trustee to exercise ordinary care and judgment, he cannot excuse himself by claiming that he did not possess those qualities; for, by voluntarily assuming the position, he undertook that he did possess and would exercise them. Williams v. McKay, 40 N. J. Eq. 189, 53 Am. Rep. 775; Williams v. Reilly, 41 N. J. Eq. 137, 3 Atl. 692; Dodd v. Wilkinson, 42 N. J. Eq. 647, 9 Atl. 685, affirming s. c. Wilkinson L.R.A. (N.S.) son v. Dodd, 40 N. J. Eq. 123, 3 Atl. 360. And see Re Liverpool Household Stores Asso. 59 L. J. Ch. N. S. 616, 62 L. T. N. S. 873, 2 Megone, 217. As was said in Beasley, Ch. J., in Williams v. McKay, ubi supra: "The equitable rule which is applicable to persons holding official positions such as were held by these defendants is not in doubt. The duty belonging to such a position is a plain one,—to care for the moneys intrusted to them in the manner provided in the charter, and to exercise ordinary care and prudence in so doing. It is true that the defendants were unpaid servants, but the duty of bringing to their office ordinary skill and vigilance was none the less on that account, for to this extent there is no distinction known to the law between a volunteer and a salaried agent. These defendants held themselves out to the public as the managers of this bank, and by so doing they severally engaged to carry it on in the same way that men of common prudence and skill conduct a similar business for themselves. This is the measure of the responsibility of officers of this kind." This is the same rule of duty to which other trustees have been held,—that they must "exercise a sound judgment and a reasonable and prudent discretion." Re Davis, 183 Mass. 499, 502, 67 N. E. 604; Ashley v. Winkley, 209 Mass. 509, 95 N. E. 932; Pine v. White, 175 Mass. 585, 590, 56 N. E. 967. The same rule has been applied to officers and managers of other financial institutions, somewhat similar in character to savings banks; and the doctrine is applicable a fortiori to the case at bar. Types of such decisions are New Haven Trust Co. v. Doherty, 75 Conn. 555, 96 Am. St. Rep. 239, 54 Atl. 209, and Wallace v. Lincoln Sav. Bank, 89 Tenn. 630, 24 Am. St. Rep. 625, 15 S. W. 448.

We do not regard the allegation in the bill that the defendants "received salaries and fees from the complainant corporation for acting as its officers and trustees and members of its finance committee" as being in itself sufficient to hold them personally responsible for official misconduct and breaches of duty. But the averment is not made for that purpose. This is one of the existing circumstances in the light of which their conduct is to be judged. It is not necessary to aver the amount of their compensation or to show its adequacy. This allegation does not weaken the rest of the bill.

The same things may be said of the averment that the loans complained of, or some of them, were "made to assist in the real-estate transactions of said George N. Rich, in which transactions said respondents were interested." This also bears upon the character of the defendants' conduct, upon the honest exercise of their judgment, and their good faith. And the averments as to the personal dealings of some of the defendants with Dowlin and Rich, and as to the inducements, commissions, and gifts given by Dowlin and Rich to two of the defendants, are proper for the same reasons. We see nothing here repugnant to the rest of the bill. Assuming that it may be singled out for a separate objection, the demurrer to it cannot be sustained.

The statute already referred to (Stat. 1894, chap. 317, §§ 21, 24) requires also that only first mortgages of real estate shall be taken, and that "no loan or mortgage shall be made except upon the report of not less than two members of the board of investment, who shall certify to the value of the premises to be mortgaged, according to their best judgment, and such report shall be filed and preserved with the records of the corporation," and that "all applications for loans shall be made in writing, through the treasurer of the corporation, who shall keep a record thereof." The bill avers that the defendants failed to comply with these requirements. We have no doubt that these statutes are mandatory, and not merely directory. They are part of a series of careful provisions made to secure the interests of the depositors and to make it certain that the conduct of trustees in making loans upon mortgages should be not only honest and careful, but manifestly so, done with the concurrence of other officers, and spread upon the records of the corporation. These are restrictions placed by the legislature upon the power of the defendants. A loan made without the observance of these requirements may be valid as between the bank and the borrower or as to third parties (Gerrity v. Wareham Sav. Bank, 202 Mass. 214, 88 N. E. 1084); but as between the defendants on the one side and the bank and its depositors on the other side, their conduct in making loans in such a manner is ultra vires.

It is a wrongful diversion of the funds of the bank. And the decisions are practically uniform that for such a wrongful diversion, made in excess of their authority and in defiance of the statutory requirements, they are to be held responsible. The decision in Crocker v. Quayle, 1 Russ. & M. 535, rests on this ground, although there it was the directions of a private trust, not the requirements of a statute, that were violated. So in Worcester City Missionary Soc. v. Memorial Church, 186 Mass. 531, 72 N. E. 71. Even the decisions by which the directors of a private business corporation have been exempted from liability for bare errors of judgment or for mere ordinary negligence in the exercise of their authorized functions have almost invariably refused, when the question has been considered, to extend that exemption to acts which were ultra vires or in violation of law. See, for example, Overend, G. & Co. v. Gibb, L. R. 5 H. L. 480, 487, 42 L. J. Ch. N. S. 67; Turquand v. Marshall, L. R. 4 Ch. 376, 386, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 639, 20 L. T. N. S. 766, 17 Week. For such a wrongful diversion of the funds of the savings bank, followed by and resulting in a total or partial loss of the money thus wrongfully withdrawn, the defendants are prima facie responsible. New Haven Trust Co. v. Doherty, 75 Conn. 555, 96 Am. St. Rep. 239, 54 Atl. 209; Paine v. Barnum, 59 How. Pr. 303; Paine v. Irwin, 59 How. Pr. 316; Williams v. Riley, 34 N. J. Eq. 398; Dodd v. Wilkinson, 42 N. J. Eq. 647, 9 Atl. 685; Williams v. McDonald, 42 N. J. Eq. 392, 7 Atl. 866; Thompson v. Greeley, 107 Mo. 577, 17 S. W. 962; National Bank v. Wade (C. C.) 84 Fed. 10; Fyler v. Fyler, 3 Beav. 550, 5 Jur. 187; Re Sharpe [1892] 1 Ch. 154, 61 L. J. Ch. N. S. 193, 65 L. T. N. S. 806, 40 Week. Rep. 241; Re Lands Allotment Co. [1894] 1 Ch. 616, 63 L. J. Ch. N. S. 291, 7 Reports, 115, 70 L. T. N. S. 286, 42 Week. Rep. 404, 1 Manson, 107, 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 614.

The powers of the defendants were likewise, as between themselves and the bank or its depositors, limited by the terms of its rules and by-laws. This comes under the same general doctrine as limitations upon a trustee by the creator of a private trust, which already have been referred to. None of these matters affords ground for demurrer. As to them, the averments of the bill are sufficient. It was not necessary to allege the amounts of the assessors' valuations of the different parcels of real estate mortgaged, or to negative by anticipation any excuse or justification that the defendants may be able to set up for their illegal acts.

But the defendants insist that the statute of limitations is a bar to any remedy for most of their wrongful acts, because as to most of them more than six years had elapsed after their wrongful diversion of the plaintiff's money before the bill was filed. But this contention overlooks the fact, which has been sufficiently shown, that these defendants stood, as to the bank and its depositors, in the position of trustees of a direct trust. In such a case the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the cestuis que trust until they have learned of the trustee's wrongdoing or of his practical repudiation of the trust and of the duties thereby imposed upon him. Davis v. Coburn, 128 Mass. 377; Jones v. McDermott, 114 Mass. 400; Second Religious Soc. v. Harriman, 125 Mass. 321; Potter v. Kimball, 186 Mass. 120, 71 N. E. 308. Instances of the application of the rule to such cases as the one now before us are sufficiently numerous. Williams v. McKay, 40 N. J. Eq. 189, 53 Am. Rep. 775, reversing s. c. Williams v. Halliard, 38 N. J. Eq. 373; Williams v. Riley, 34 N. J. Eq. 398; Ellis v. Ward, 137 Ill. 509, 25 N. E. 530; National Bank v. Wade (C. C.) 84 Fed. 10; Brinckerhoff v. Roosevelt, 74 C. C. A. 498, 143 Fed. 478; Re Sharpe [1892] 1 Ch. 154, 61 L. J. Ch. N. S. 193, 65 L. T. N. S. 806, 40 Week. Rep. 241. In most of the cases relied on by the defendants the case was either governed directly by statute, as in Re Lands Allotment Co. [1894] 1 Ch. 616, 631, 63 L. J. Ch. N. S. 291, 7 Reports, 115, 70 L. T. N. S. 286, 42 Week. Rep. 404, 1 Manson, 107, 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 614, and Mason v. Henry, 152 N. Y. 529, 46 N. E. 837, or it was held that no direct trust relation existed between the parties. Such cases need not be considered. So far as they differ from our conclusions we have not been willing to follow them. Nor is it now necessary to determine whether a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action is sufficiently charged against the defendants.

We cannot say as matter of law that the alleged foreclosures of the mortgages or the other dealings with the mortgaged properties, or any entries that may have been made on the plaintiff's books and records, show knowledge in the plaintiff of the defendants' wrongdoings. See, as to this, Wallace v. Lincoln Sav. Bank, 89 Tenn. 630, 24 Am. St. Rep. 625, 15 S. W. 448. The bill expressly avers that the plaintiff had neither such knowledge nor the means of acquiring it until shortly before the bringing of the bill. We find nothing in the allegations necessarily repugnant to this averment.

The sixteenth paragraph of the bill might not of itself show any independent cause of action against the defendants, but, like some other averments which have been considered, the circumstance alleged may throw light upon some of the misconduct complained of. It is proper to give the defendants notice of the fact that this is one of the matters relied on by the plaintiff in determining the character of their acts. It is not repugnant to the seventh paragraph of the bill.

There is no such repugnance or uncertainty in other parts of the bill as to justify us in calling it bad. The grounds of demurrer which have not been specifically dealt with have all been examined; the able argument made by the counsel for the defendants and the supplementary brief which has been filed have been carefully considered; and we are satisfied that the order must be:

Demurrer overruled.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (Department No. 1.)

SUSIE STONE et al., Respts.,

HUNTER TRACT IMPROVEMENT COMPANY et al., Appts.,

(— Wash. —, 122 Pac. 370.)

Damages — injunction against constructing dwelling — measure.

1. The damages for wrongfully enjoining the erection of a dwelling on a parcel of real estate are the reasonable rental value of the property with the building upon it, during the time its enjoyment was prevented by the injunction, where the building would have been erected but for the injunction, and was actually built as soon as the injunction was dissolved.

Injunction — failure to move for dissolution — effect on damages.

2. One wrongfully enjoined from erecting a dwelling is not precluded from recovering damages therefor because he fails to move to discharge the injunction, where the whole controversy is over the right to erect the building because defendant is of negro blood, and the injunction is not merely ancillary to or in aid of the main issue.

Note. — Measure of damages for wrongful injunction restraining erection of building.

Although the damages recoverable for the wrongful suing out of an injunction are only such as naturally and proximately result therefrom, and do not include remote or speculative damages (22 Cyc. 1062), it seems clear, as held in STONE v. HUNTER TRACT IMPROV. CO., that, in the case of a wrongful injunction restraining the erection or completion of a building, where the building would have been erected or completed

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the wrongful suing out of an injunction to restrain plaintiffs from erecting a dwelling on land which had been assigned to them, pending the appeal of an action for the cancelation of the assignment. Affirmed.

Statement by Chadwick, J.:

Defendant Hunter Tract Improvement Company sold a lot in an addition platted by it to plaintiffs' assignor, and approved the assignment, but afterwards sued to cancel the assignment on the ground that its approval was made through mistake and without knowledge that plaintiffs were colored persons, and also sued out an injunction restraining plaintiffs from building a house thereon pending its appeal, claiming that plaintiffs could not build on the lot because they were colored persons.

Messrs. Hughes, McMicken, Dovell, & Ramsey, and Otto B. Rupp, for appellants:

The only damages which can be recovered upon injunction bonds in actions are such as arise from the operation of the injunction itself, and not such as are occa-

but for the injunction, and has been erected or completed in accordance with the original plans since the dissolution of the injunction, the reasonable rental value of the property with the proposed building upon it for such period as its use was prevented by the injunction, is a natural and proximate damage, and not remote or speculative.

So, the measure of damages sustained by reason of an injunction against the erection of a building which had actually been commenced is the rental value of the proposed building, for such period as the defendant was deprived of its use by the pendency of the injunction. Spears v. Armstrong, — Tenn. —, 42 S. W. 37.

And the measure of damages for the wrongful suing out of an order temporarily restraining the continuance of the erection of an addition to a dwelling house is the value of the use of the property for the whole period and season during which the owner was deprived of it as the direct result of the restraining order, which period is not necessarily limited to the time the order was in force. Hutchins v. Munn, 209 U. S. 246, 52 L. ed. 776, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504, affirming 28 App. D. C. 271. In this case, it appeared that it was the habit of the owner of the dwelling house involved, to occupy the house during the late autumn, the winter, and the early spring, which was the common season of occupancy of houses of like character in the place, and to live elsewhere during the remainder of sioned by the suit independent of the injunction.

2 High, Inj. § 1663; Donahue v. Johnson, 9 Wash. 187, 37 Pac. 322; White Pine Lumber Co. v. Aetna Indemnity Co. 42 Wash. 569, 85 Pac. 52; Collins v. Huffman, 48 Wash. 184, 93 Pac. 220; Southern R. Co. v. Pardue, 123 Tenn. 376, 131 S. W. 862.

Messrs. Andrew R. Black and Ralph Simon, for respondents:

Where a party is deprived of the use of property wrongfully by injunction or otherwise, he is entitled as damages to the value of the use; and in cases of property of real estate, the value of the use would, of course, be the reasonable rent of the property.

Spears v. Armstrong, — Tenn. —, 42 S. W. 37; 2 Sutherland, Damages, 70; 1 Sedgw. Measure of Damages, § 184.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for the wrongful suing out of an injunction which was continued pending an appeal to this court. Hunter Tract Improv. Co. v. Stone, 58 Wash. 661, 109 Pac. 112.

Under the rulings of the trial judge, the only question left in the case is whether a the year. The proposed addition was begun about July 1st, and was to have been completed within four months, and in time for occupancy of the house during the coming season. The work was wrongfully enjoined on August 14th, after the house had been rendered practically uninhabitable by the removal of some of its exterior walls, and the restraining order was dissolved on November 25th, after which the addition was not completed until April, and could not, at that time of the year, have been completed, if reasonable speed had been used, before March, after which time the property could not have been rented, and the entire rental season would have been lost. It further appeared that, if the owner, in November, had found and leased other property substantially the same in character, and desired to occupy it until her own residence could have been finished, she would have been compelled to pay the full season's or year's rent, so that the injury suffered by her in being deprived of her residence was practically consummated before the 1st of November. And under these circumstances, the court of appeals of the District of Columbia and the United States Supreme Court affirmed a decree ratifying and confirming an auditor's report, ascertaining and fixing the amount of damages sustained by the owner at $8,000, being three fourths of the annual rental value of the property.

In an action on an injunction bond, after the dissolution of an injunction prohibit-true measure of damages was given to the jury. Plaintiffs had begun the erection of a six-room dwelling house to cost $2,300, when the work was arrested by the lower court. After the case had been decided on appeal and the remittitur sent down, plaintiffs erected a dwelling costing less money than the one contemplated. The testimony shows that the contractor threw up the contract after a time on account of the delay and increased cost of wages and material. Plaintiffs set up several items of damage, all of which were denied by the court, except the reasonable rental value of the property during the time the case was pending. The court told the jury that they might find as damages the rental value of the property if the house had been built from the 15th day of May, 1909, the time when the building was to be completed, until the release of the restraining order. The plaintiffs' testimony is to the effect that $40 was a reasonable rental value, while the testimony of the defendant is that $25 is a fair rent. The jury returned a verdict for $525. From a judgment upon the verdict, defendants have appealed.

It is contended that only nominal damages should have been allowed, inasmuch as the law will not take care of damages which are remote, conjectural, or speculative; that no house was on the property during the time the injunctions were in force, and that the rental value of a house that had not been built was not a proper measure, it being admitted, or rather not denied, that the lot without the house had no rental value. Our first impression was that this theory had merit, but a more careful consideration of the principle involved impels us to hold that plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages for the loss of the use of the property, to be measured by the rental value, or what it would have been worth to respondents had they been allowed to build a house according to their original design.

The measure of damages in a case where a person is prevented by injunction from completing a house cannot be defined with any degree of accuracy. It may be said to be the just application of the rule of reason to the facts of a particular case; or, as stated by Mr. High: "In determining the amount of damages to be allowed upon the dissolution of an injunction restraining one from exercising acts of ownership over his real property, the courts are not governed by arbitrary rules, but proceed upon equitable principles; the defendant being entitled to such damages as are the necessary and proximate result of such deprivation." 2 High, Inj. 4th ed. § 1673; Sutherland, Dam- ing the completion of the erection of a cow stable, the damages recoverable are all such natural and proximate damages as have been actually and necessarily or directly sustained by reason of the injunction,—including the injury done to the plaintiff's cows, the decrease caused in their flow of milk, and the extra care and food required by their exposure to the weather; the loss to the plaintiff by reason of his being obliged to buy feed for his cows by the small quantity; and the difference between the cost of completing stable at the time when the building thereof was stopped by the injunction, and the increased cost at the time when the injunction was dissolved and the stable completed. Lange v. Wagner, 52 Md. 310, 36 Am. Rep. 380.

And where a person has commenced to tear down a building on his premises for the purpose of erecting a new building, the damages recoverable by him on account of a temporary injunction restraining him from interfering with the wall between his own and an adjoining building, whereby the completion of his new building is delayed, include the loss of rent of the building, increased cost of labor and materials, and counsel fees on motion to dissolve the injunction and on appeal from the order of dissolution. Roberts v. White, 73 N. Y. 375.

But in accord with the rule that "the only damages which can be recovered are such as arise from the operation of the injunction itself, and not such as are occasioned by the suit independent of the injunction" (High, Inj. § 1663), only nominal damages, and no rental at all for the use of the proposed building, can be recovered on the injunction bond, after dissolution of an injunction restraining the erection of a building, but only nominal damages, although the injunction itself was the cause of the failure to build the proposed structure, where the building contemplated when the injunction suit was begun was never constructed at all, but the project was finally and permanently abandoned after the injunction was dissolved. Ibid.

Nor can the rental value of the proposed building be recovered as damages on the injunction bond, after the dissolution of an injunction restraining the erection of a building, but only nominal damages, although the injunction itself was the cause of the failure to build the proposed structure, where the building contemplated when the injunction suit was begun was never constructed at all, but the project was finally and permanently abandoned after the injunction was dissolved. Ibid.

Many phases of the general subject of loss of profits as an element of damages are discussed in notes cited in the Index to Notes, under the title, Damages; loss of profits.

A. C. W.

ages, 3d ed. § 527; Rice v. Cook, 92 Cal. 144, 28 Pac. 219; Alexander v. Colcord, 85 Ill. 323; Hermann v. Allen, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 118 S. W. 794. Now, in this case, although it is contended on the authority of Southern R. Co. v. Pardue, 123 Tenn. 376, 131 S. W. 862, that damages cannot be recovered for the loss of rent for a building that was not built, we nevertheless believe that, where the facts show that the respondents were in the act of building, and, but for the act of the appellant, would have erected a building according to the plans which had been drawn for that purpose, and where they did actually build a house after the termination of the suit, and for the uses contemplated, the true measure of damages is the rental value of the property with the improvements as designed. Mr. High cites the case of Roberts v. White, 73 N. Y. 375, to sustain the proposition that loss of rent is an item of damages where a party was restrained from tearing down a wall alleged to be a party wall, intending to erect a building, where the result of the injunction was to interrupt and postpone the plans and purposes of the owner. The same rule is announced in Hutchins v. Munn, 209 U. S. 246, 52 L. ed. 776, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504. We see no difference in principle between this case and that of Hermann v. Allen, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 118 S. W. 794, where the plaintiff in the suit had been enjoined from removing a store building from a lot owned by the defendant. It was there contended that interest on the value of the building was the true measure of damages. But this was held to be wholly inadequate; the defendant knowing that the building could be rented, and being charged with notice of its reasonable rental value. Rent was allowed although the building was not removed, just as rent should be allowed in this case although the building was not built. It seems to be the purpose of the law in cases of this kind to allow a recovery of rent where the testimony shows that it might have been earned but for the injunction. The case of Ridpath v. Merriam, 22 Wash. 311, 60 Pac. 1120, in effect holds that, if a building can be moved so as to put it to use as such, the rental value is the measure of damages. That measure was denied solely upon the ground that the building could not be moved, and had no value to the owner except as knocked-down material.

As illustrative of the manner in which courts should approach the admeasurement of damages in this class of cases, Mr. Sutherland says: "In a case in which the party suing out the injunction was sought to be charged with the value of land for pasture, he was allowed the cost of fencing it for such use. If the land was unfenced when the injunction issued, and was fit only for pasture, and the defendant was not intending to use it for that purpose, or was not prepared to do so, he was not entitled to any compensation. If his intention was to use it and inclose it for use, he was entitled to the value of the use, less the expense of inclosing it. If he had procured materials to fence it, and was prevented from doing so, he was entitled to be reimbursed for any loss necessarily resulting." 2 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. § 527. Upon the same principle of equitable consideration, one who is kept out of the possession of his property is not restricted in a suit on the injunction bond to proof of the value of the use, but may recover for loss of crops. Edwards v. Edwards, 31 Ill. 474; Fleming v. Bailey, 44 Miss. 132. In the Pardue Case, after the injunction had been dissolved, the plaintiff built a house which was much larger than and cost five times as much as the one originally designed, and which was devoted to different uses. We think the court properly refused to allow the loss of rent as an item of damage in that case, for the subsequent conduct of the owner was in effect a declaration of benefit. The case turned on the finding that the plaintiff had abandoned his purpose, but the court had in mind the rule as we find it to be: "When the building is subsequently erected, after the restraint caused by the injunction has been removed, the court can then see that contingency has given place to achievement; but, when it is abandoned, the doubt based upon the contingency that necessarily attends all uncompleted projects is proven, justified, and confirmed." In the consideration of this case we have found the case of Bingham v. Walla Walla, 3 Wash. Terr. 68, 13 Pac. 408. It is there said: "The damage claimed by him is for prospective profits which he might have received as rent of the building had he been permitted to erect the same. We think this element of damage too remote." Standing alone, this would seem to negative all that we have said as to the measure of damage; but we think that case can be clearly distinguished under the authorities. The title was in real dispute, and in such cases, if it be shown that the owner would not have built while the title was in dispute, it has been often held that a recovery for the loss of rent will not be allowed. The statement that such damages are too remote is too broad, and will not be applied unless the facts warrant it.

Defendant invokes the rule that no damages can be recovered unless they are sustained because of the injunction; that inasmuch as respondents did not move to discharge the injunction in the former case, but were content to try the case on its merits its, or, in other words, bide the time until the doubt as to their title had been removed, their recovery is limited to nominal damages. Ordinarily no recovery will be allowed in such cases, but, strictly speaking, the former case was not a contest over title. Title has never been disputed. Defendant was selling what purported to be a good title, and plaintiff was willing to take the title offered. The real question was whether plaintiffs could use and occupy the lot, being of negro blood. In principle the former action was as if the vendor had brought suit to restrain a nuisance, and a defendant in such cases should not be held to the rule invoked unless the injunction is ancillary to or in aid of the real issue. Where a ruling upon the injunction would determine the case, where that is the whole controversy, a defendant should not be penalized because he treats it as in truth it is, as the essence of the controversy.

Finding no error, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STAR GROCER COMPANY

v.

W. BRADFORD et al., Plffs. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 74 S. E. 509.)

Principal and surety — bond — principal's nonexecution — effect.

1. Sureties in a bond are not released by omission of the principal to execute it, if he is bound by law or a collateral contract, recited in the bond, for the performance of the duty recited in the condition thereof.

Bond — incompleteness — effect.

2. Such technical incompleteness in the bond, under such circumstances, imposes upon the obligee no duty of inquiry as to whether it was delivered by the sureties on condition that the principal should execute it, nor to require him to do so, since the sureties suffered no substantial prejudice from such omission.

Evidence — admissions by principal — effect on sureties.

3. Receipts, statements, and other evidences of liability in the handwriting of the principal are admissible evidence against the sureties, and prove prima facie liability on their part.

Same — relation of witness to subject-matter.

4. Relation of a witness to the subject-matter of his testimony, such as his incumbency of an office in a private corporation on whose behalf, as a party to the suit, he is to testify, may be shown by his oral evidence.

Messrs. Kreps & Russell and Adams & Cooper for defendant in error.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bond constituting the basis of this action, and given by a traveling salesman to secure faithful performance of his written contract with his principal, contains, in the obligatory clause thereof, the name of the salesman, described as principal, and the condition recites his employment, his duty to collect accounts for his employer, and the existence of an article of agreement between them, giving its date, but is signed by the two defendants herein only as sureties. Its obligation as to them is denied on two grounds: (1) Its acceptance by the obligee in an obviously incomplete condition; and (2) acceptance thereof by the obligee with knowledge of its execution and delivery upon condition that other persons, who did not do so, were to execute it as sureties along with the defendants and the principal, one O. J. Wilson.

Incompleteness of a bond on its face, when tendered to the obligee, is sufficient to put him upon inquiry as to whether those whose signatures it bears intended to be bound by it in such condition. This is particularly and universally true when the names of persons, apparently contemplated as additional sureties, appearing in the body of the bond or elsewhere, have not been signed to it. Wendlinger v. Smith, 75 Va. 309, 40 Am. Rep. 727; Nash v. Fugate, 32 Gratt. 595, 34 Am. Rep. 780; Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801, 98 Am. Dec. 749; Hicks v. Goode, 12 Leigh, 479, 37 Am. Dec. 677. The apparent imperfection is suggestive of a delivery upon condition, and imposes upon the obligee the duty of inquiry as to whether there was such a qualified delivery, omission of which releases the sureties; and parol evidence is admissible to prove the condition, which diligent inquiry would have revealed.

Nothing on the face of this bond, however, indicates incompleteness as to the sureties, or failure of any person to sign as surety. But lack of the signature of the principal renders it in a sense incomplete, and this fact is relied upon as having the same effect as incompleteness in respect of sureties. As to whether lack of the signature of the principal raises the same duty on the part of the obligee, and discharges the sureties in case of omission thereof, the authorities are in conflict. In some jurisdictions and under some circumstances, the sureties are held not bound. Wood v. Washburn, 2 Pick. 24; Ferry v. Burchard, 21 Conn. 602; Bunn v. Jetmore, 70 Mo. 228, 35 Am. Rep. 425; Russell v. Annable, 109 Mass. 72, 12 Am. Rep. 665; Bryant v. Kinyon, 127 Mich. 152, 53 L.R.A. 801, 86 N. W. 531; Bean v. Parker, 17 Mass. 591; People v. Hartley, 21 Cal. 585, 82 Am. Dec. 758; Johnston v. Kimball Twp. 39 Mich. 187, 33 Am. Rep. 372; Lyman v. Williams, 84 Ill. App. 82. On the contrary, many cases hold the bond good and valid as to the sureties, without the signature of the principal, when the latter is bound by law or his special contract for the debt or default for which the bond was given. State use of The Treasurer v. Bowman, 10 Ohio, 445; Trustees of Schools v. Sheib, 119 Ill. 579, 59 Am. Rep. 830, 8 N. E. 189; Pima County v. Snyder, 5 Ariz. 45, 44 Pac. 297; Cockrill v. Davie, 14 Mont. 131, 35 Pac. 958; Mitchell v. Hydraulic Bldg. Stone Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 129 S. W. 148; Wright v. Jones, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 610, 120 S. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

W. 1139; Williams v. Marshall, 42 Barb. 524; St. Louis Brewing Asso. v. Hayes, 38 C. C. A. 449, 97 Fed. 859. The decided weight of authority throughout the country, and especially of the later cases, is that the sureties are bound by such an instrument, if the principal is bound by law or his special contract for the debt or default for which the sureties have obligated themselves.

The argument of inconvenience or violation of technical rules is answered by the court in State use of The Treasurer v. Bowman, cited, as follows: "Great reliance is placed upon the fact that, if the instrument is not executed by the principal, it will affect the remedy over against him by the securities. There would be great force in this argument if the remedy were destroyed; but it is not; the force and the extent of this liability to them are unimpaired. Whether they could use the bond, per se, as evidence of his liability, presents a question merely of convenience in the use of the right, but does not affect the right itself, any more than would the loss or destruction of the bond." That the sureties can recover from the principal what they have been compelled to pay on account of their suretyship in a bond, not executed by the principal, is asserted in Harnsberger v. Yancey, 33 Gratt. 527. This being true, the sureties are not, in any substantial sense, prejudiced by inability of the obligee to sue the principal along with them on the bond. The ground of their release, in case of the omission of a surety to sign, as contemplated by the parties, is the injury resulting to those who signed, in case they were bound, because of their inability to exact contribution from the omitted cosurety, since he is not bound at all. This result cannot be predicated of the omission of the principal to sign, when the law or another contract binds him as firmly and fully as the bond would have bound him, had he executed it, and for the benefit of the sureties under the law of subrogation, as well as that of the obligee. Every rule and exception is coextensive only with the reason underlying it; and, as there is no substantial reason for discharge of the sureties under such circumstances, they should be held liable. The equitable remedies for subrogation and indemnity are as fully available and efficacious as if the principal had executed the bond. In no substantial sense, therefore, are the sureties affected by the omission.

The record discloses no direct evidence of notice to the obligee of any agreement with the two defendants, the obligors in the bond, for additional sureties. The charge of such notice stands upon the theory of agency on the part of the principal debtor to obtain the bond. Having sought employment by the obligee, he had been required, as a condition, to give a bond with two sureties, to be approved by his employer. He submitted the names of the two defendants, but no others, so far as the evidence indicates, and they, after investigation as to their financial ability, were accepted. Then Wilson, the principal debtor, went and procured their signatures to the bond as prepared by the obligee. He obtained and gave this bond as a condition of his employment. Prior to that time, he had not been unconditionally employed, nor permanently employed at all. Obviously, therefore, the procurement of the bond was primarily his business, and not that of his employer, and accordingly he must be held to have acted for and on behalf of himself, and not of his prospective employer, in the procurement of it. No authority sustaining the contention of the plaintiffs in error for the theory of agency, under such circumstances, has been produced or found. Newlin v. Beard, 6 W. Va. 110, invoked for the purpose, does not do so. Before the principal debtor in that case was directed to obtain sureties on the bond, it had been accepted as complete, without any sureties on it. Here there had been no such acceptance. There the obligee, having completed a contract, made the debtor his agent to obtain sureties. Here the principal acted for himself, because no contract had been completed. He was making a contract for his own benefit. The facts here shown apply the rule stated in Lyttle v. Cozad, 21 W. Va. 183, declaring the principal to be the agent of the sureties.

Wilson defaulted and left the country. His successor, as salesman for the territory he had traveled, called upon the customers of his employer, and obtained from them evidence of the collections made by Wilson in the form of invoices received by him and checks in payment of invoices, made payable to his employer and collected by him, after his indorsement of his employer's name by him as agent. These receipted invoices and checks were admitted as evidence of liability on the bond. A statement in the handwriting of Wilson, showing a balance against him of $460.75, for which he gave his check, together with the protested check, were also introduced as evidence, supplemented by proof of lack of funds in the bank on which the check was drawn to pay it. In one instance, the customer testified to the payment of a bill not accounted for by Wilson. In all the instances in which checks appeared to have been given and indorsements made by Wilson, his handwriting was proved. In addition to this evidence, the bookkeeper of the employer, with the books in his possession and at hand, testified to the delivery and shipment of all the goods, the purchase money of which was shown to have been collected, as aforesaid. Admissibility and sufficiency of this evidence are challenged on account of its alleged secondary character. It is unnecessary to enter upon an inquiry as to the classification of evidence referred to in the brief. The receipts, checks, and statement in the handwriting of the principal constitute admissions by him, made within the period of his employment and in the course thereof, and are admissible against the sureties, according to all authority, and sufficient, in the absence of any contradiction thereof, to fix liability upon them. "Accounts, entries, and written statements by the principal are prima facie evidence against his sureties; in some states being conclusive." 32 Cyc. 137. See also Brandt, Suretyship, §§ 797-800; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 187, 188. To the admission in argument of the admissibility of this evidence against Wilson, if he were a party, we add these authorities, conclusively showing it to be likewise admissible against his sureties. Clearly admissible, covering the full amount of the recovery and wholly uncontradicted, it precludes any possible verdict other than the one rendered; and therefore the error, if any, in admitting the testimony of the bookkeeper as to the delivery of the goods, was obviously harmless. Hence there is no occasion for inquiry as to its admissibility.

The testimony of McConnaughey, president of the plaintiff company, was objected to for lack of documentary proof of his position as president. According to well-settled practice, his own evidence as to that was sufficient to establish it prima facie, because the fact was collateral in character. His office in the corporation was not in issue. The sole purpose of proof of his position was to show how or why he had done certain things and possessed certain knowledge. To establish such a status for such purpose, the highest and best evidence is not required. Generally, it is conceded. In qualifying experts, physicians and lawyers are not required to produce their licenses. Their oral testimony suffices everywhere.

These conclusions destroy the basis of all the numerous assignments of error. The court properly refused to set aside the verdict, and rendered judgment upon it. It did not err in holding the defendants liable on the bond. There was no error in admitting the receipts and checks to establish the liability and its extent. There was no error in permitting McConnaughey to testify. If there was any error in the admission of Brohard's testimony as to sales of goods, Wilson's written admissions and the testimony of a customer, all uncontradicted, covered all of that. Some of the instructions asked for by the defendants and refused were in direct conflict with the law as here stated, and others declared legal propositions having no foundation in the evidence. It would subserve no good purpose to quote and analyze them. From what has been said, it is apparent that there was no evidence of any fraud in the procurement of the bond. If there was any error in the rulings upon objections to evidence, it was harmless for the reasons herein stated. Practically all of such objections were based upon the untenable positions already disposed of.

Seeing no error in the judgment, we affirm it.

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the District Court for Leavenworth County in defendants' favor in an action to enjoin defendants from engaging in business in violation of the prohibitory laws. Reversed.

Statement by Johnston, Ch. J.:

In the foregoing cases the attorney general of the state and the county attorney of Leavenworth county filed petitions in behalf of the state, the averments in each being substantially the same. In the Rabinowitz Case it was alleged:

"(1) That at the time of the institution of this action, the above-named defendants were, and still are, residents and citizens of the city and county of Leavenworth, state of Kansas.

"(2) That for many months before the institution of this action, the said defendants were, and still are, engaged in the unlawful sale, barter, and delivery of intoxicating liquors within the said city and county of Leavenworth, state of Kansas, in the form and manner as hereinafter alleged and set forth.

"(3) That for many months before the institution of this action, the said defendants were, and still are, maintaining and operating a so-called storeroom or warehouse, or a shift, device, or subterfuge, at a place called Stillings, in Platte county, state of Missouri, just across the Missouri river, about 1 mile east of said city of Leavenworth, state of Kansas, at which place the said defendants at all of the times herein mentioned have been, and still are, temporarily unloading and storing intoxicating liquors for the express unlawful purpose, intent, and design of thereafter selling, bartering, and delivering the same wholly within said city and county of Leavenworth, state of Kansas, as herein more fully alleged and set forth.

"(4) That for many months before the filing of the original petition in this action, the said defendants have owned, maintained, used, and employed, and are still maintaining, using, and employing upon all the streets and alleys of the city of Leavenworth, Kansas, certain wagons, vehicles, and conveyances, with horses or mules hitched thereto and drivers thereon, for the express unlawful purpose of conveying or carrying said intoxicating liquors across said Missouri river from said town of Stillings, Missouri, to and within said city and county of Leavenworth, state of Kansas, and there selling, bartering, and delivering said intoxicating liquors to various persons and places whose names and location are now unknown to said plaintiff, with the express purpose, intent, and design on the part of said defendants of unlawfully aiding and abetting many of said persons, in the violation of the prohibitory laws of said state of Kansas, as herein more fully alleged and set forth.

"(5) That for many months before the institution of this action, the said defendants did, and do still, maintain and operate a local Leavenworth city telephone at their said so-called storeroom or warehouse, or said shift, device, and subterfuge, at said town of Stillings, Missouri, which said telephone at all of the times herein mentioned was, and still is, directly connected with residences and places of business within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, over which said telephone the said defendants, their agents, and employees, have at all of the times herein mentioned and still are taking and receiving telephone orders for said intoxicating liquors at said so-called storeroom or warehouse, or said shift, device, or subterfuge, at said town of Stillings, Missouri, and thereafter selling, bartering, and delivering said intoxicating liquors, so ordered, to said residences, persons, and places of business wholly within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, in violation of the said prohibitory Laws of said state of Kansas, as herein more fully alleged and set forth.

"(6) And plaintiff alleges that at all of the times herein mentioned it has been, and still is, the unlawful custom, habit, or system of the said defendants, their agents, and employees, to collect the sale price of said intoxicating liquors so delivered upon said telephone orders, as aforesaid, wholly and entirely within said city and county of Leavenworth, state of Kansas, in violation of the prohibitory laws of said state of Kansas.

"(7) Plaintiff further alleges that at all of the times herein mentioned, the said defendants have maintained, used, and employed a local Leavenworth city telephone at their residence at Second and Ottawa streets and No. 714 Miami street, respectively, in said city of Leavenworth, Kansas, over which said telephone the said defendants have, at all of the times herein mentioned, received, and do still receive, telephone orders for said intoxicating liquors from residences, persons, and places of business wholly within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, and thereafter delivered the same to said residences, persons, and places of business by means of said wagons, vehicles, and conveyances from said so-called storeroom or warehouse, or said shift, device, and subterfuge, at said town of Stillings, Missouri, or from said wagons wherever they may be on the streets and alleys of said city of Leavenworth, Kansas, and thereafter collect the sale price of said intoxicating liquors wholly within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, all in violation of the prohibitory laws of said state of Kansas.

"(8) Plaintiff further alleges that at all of the times herein mentioned, the said defendants have authorized, directed, and allowed, and do still authorize, direct, and allow, the drivers of said wagons, vehicles, and conveyances, who are in their employ, and also other agents and employees, whose names are unknown to said plaintiff, to solicit, take, and receive orders for said intoxicating liquors at residences, places of business, and of various persons whose names are unknown to plaintiff, wholly within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, and on the streets and alleys of said city, and upon such orders the said defendants have, at all of the times herein mentioned, delivered, and are still delivering, said intoxicating liquors to said residences, persons, and places of business from said so-called storeroom or warehouse, or said shift, device, or subterfuge, at said town of Stillings, Missouri, and from said wagons on the streets and alleys of said city of Leavenworth, Kansas, and thereafter collecting the sale price of said intoxicating liquors wholly within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, all in violation of the prohibitory laws of said state of Kansas.

"(9) And plaintiff further alleges that at all of the times herein mentioned, the said defendants have kept, and do still keep, said wagons, vehicles, conveyances, horses, mules, and drivers within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, especially at night, at places unknown to said plaintiff, and that frequently the said wagons, vehicles, or conveyances are kept loaded overnight with intoxicating liquors, which are delivered the next morning to various residences, persons, and places of business within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, and the sale price thereafter collected wholly within said city and county of Leavenworth, state of Kansas, all in violation of the prohibitory laws of said state of Kansas.

"(10) And plaintiff further alleges that a very large part or proportion of the said places and persons to whom or which said intoxicating liquors are sold, bartered, and delivered in the manner herein alleged, are thereafter selling, bartering, and delivering said intoxicating liquors in violation of the prohibitory laws of the state of Kansas; that said defendants well knew this to be a fact; that said defendants, at all of the times herein mentioned, have been, and still are, selling, bartering, and delivering said intoxicating liquors to them, as herein alleged and set forth, for the express unlawful purpose, and with the express unlawful intent and design, of aiding and abetting them in violating said prohibitory laws of said state of Kansas.

"(11) And plaintiff further alleges that the said defendants have adopted, employed, and used, and are now adopting, employing, and using, the said so-called storeroom or warehouse, at said town of Stillings, Missouri, and said wagons, vehicles, conveyances, horses, mules, drivers, telephones, and all other property and means employed, as herein alleged, purely and simply as devices, shifts, and subterfuges to attempt to avoid and violate the said prohibitory laws of said state of Kansas.

"(12) And plaintiff further alleges that said defendants have at all of the times herein mentioned pretended, and do still pretend, to be engaged in interstate commerce in selling, bartering, and delivering said intoxicating liquors, as herein alleged, but plaintiff alleges that they have been and are conducting said unlawful business, as herein alleged, wholly within said state of Kansas, and are not bona fide engaged in any interstate commerce business.

"(13) Plaintiff further alleges that at all of the times herein mentioned, the said defendants have received, and do still receive, said intoxicating liquors at their said so-called storeroom or warehouse, or said shift, device, or subterfuge, at said town of Stillings, Missouri, in original packages, and that said intoxicating liquors are then taken out of said original packages by the said defendants, and thereafter sold, bartered, and delivered to said residences, persons, and places of business within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas, in other than their original packages, suitable for the use and convenience of said residences, persons, and places of business within said city and county of Leavenworth, Kansas.

"(14) Plaintiff further alleges that this is an action in which the state of Kansas is entitled to an injunction, and that unless said defendants, their agents, and employees are restrained and enjoined from doing and performing the unlawful acts and omissions herein complained of, they will continue in the violation of said prohibitory laws of the said state of Kansas in the manner and form herein alleged and set forth.

"(15) Plaintiff further alleges that a reasonable attorneys' fee herein is the sum of $500.

"Wherefore, and because of all the matters and things herein alleged, said plaintiff prays and demands that a temporary injunction issue herein against said defendants, restraining them and their agents and employees from doing any of the unlawful acts herein complained of; that they be enjoined from conducting said unlawful business; that they be enjoined from maintaining, using, and employing said wagons, vehicles, and conveyances, horses, mules, telephones, and any other property in the unlawful manner herein alleged; that upon the final determination of this action, said injunction may be made permanent; that said wagons, vehicles, conveyances, horses, mules, telephones, and all other property used in said unlawful business, be declared common nuisances, and that the same be abated; that said plaintiffs have and recover its costs herein, including attorneys' fee of $500, and for such other and further relief as said plaintiff may be entitled to."

The defendants in each case filed a demurrer alleging that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which was sustained by the court. The state appeals.

Messrs. John S. Dawson, Attorney General, Lee Bond, S. M. Browster, and Arthur M. Jackson for the State.

Messrs. A. E. Dempsey and F. P. Fitzwilliam for appellees.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Accepting the averments of the petition as facts, was the state entitled to an injunction under either the general provision of the Code which authorizes the enjoining of a common nuisance, or the section of the prohibitory liquor law which provides for enjoining the maintaining of a place where intoxicating liquors are sold or given away in violation of law, or where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking such liquors?

If the provision of the prohibitory law for enjoining or abating nuisances was left out of consideration, or had never been enacted, there would still be sufficient authority for enjoining the nuisance in question. The Code specifically provides that "an injunction may be granted in the name of the state to enjoin and suppress the keeping and maintaining of a common nuisance." Civ. Code Proc. § 265 (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5859). This provision gives direct authority to the state for the injunction sought if the acts and things charged against appellees in the petition constitute a common nuisance. At the common law acts done in violation of the law, or which are against good morals or public decency, and which result in injury to the public, constitute a public nuisance. 1 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 17; Joyce, Nuisances, § 5; 6 Current Law, 828.

A nuisance is public if it affects the community at large, or if it affects a place where the public have a right to and do go, such as a park, street, or alley, and which nuisance necessarily annoys, offends, or injures those who come within the scope of its influence. That the illegal act is publicly, repeatedly, and persistently committed in the streets of a city, thus offending and injuring all who use the streets, and who necessarily come within the range of such an influence, is an important factor in determining whether it constitutes a common or public nuisance. For instance, it has been held that "street walking" might be stopped, as it was inhibited by the common law (Braddy v. Milledgeville, 74 Ga. 516, 58 Am. Rep. 443); also that the setting up of a menagerie and circus in a graveyard which had been dedicated to a municipality was a public nuisance (Kansas City v. Lemen, 6 C. C. A. 627, 12 U. S. App. 640, 57 Fed. 905); and that the exhibition of a stud horse on the streets of a town amounted to a nuisance (Nolin v. Franklin, 4 Yerg. 163). The singing of ribald songs in a loud and boisterous manner in the streets for ten minutes was held to be a nuisance (State v. Toole, 106 N. C. 736, 11 S. E. 168, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 608); and the same court held that the repeated use of profane and blasphemous language on the public streets in the hearing of many persons passing and repassing was a public nuisance (State v. Chrisp, 85 N. C. 528, 39 Am. Rep. 713). The discharge of fireworks and of heavily charged explosives on the public streets in a densely populated part of a large city was held to be a public nuisance. Speir v. Brooklyn, 139 N. Y. 6, 21 L.R.A. 641, 36 Am. St. Rep. 664, 34 N. E. 727; Landau v. New York, 180 N. Y. 48, 105 Am. St. Rep. 709, 72 N. E. 631. In addition to these considerations, it has been held by our own court that every place where a public statute is openly, publicly, repeatedly, continuously, persistently, and intentionally violated is a public nuisance. State ex rel. Vance v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 728, 42 Am. Rep. 182. In the present case it is alleged that the offensive and injurious acts were committed on the public streets and alleys of a large city, and these acts, it appears, are injurious to public morals, contrary to the policy of the state, and in direct violation of statute. It is further shown that the streets have been thus openly, persistently, and illegally used for a period of many months prior to the bringing of this action. It is clear that the charge made against appellees constitutes a common nuisance at the common law, and is one which may properly be enjoined under the general provisions of the Code.

The fact that the maintaining of a common nuisance is made a public offense, or that special provision is made for its abatement, is not necessarily a bar to the enjoining of a public nuisance by a court of equity. While courts of equity cannot be used to punish crime or enforce the criminal laws, still, if the acts done, and threatened to be done, are such as to bring them within the jurisdiction and power of a court of equity, its arm is not shortened by the fact that the same acts may be denounced as a crime. The mere criminality of an act, whether it be a public or private nuisance, will not deprive the injured party of his equitable remedies, nor shelter the wrongdoer from the judgment of a court of equity. In State ex rel. Vance v. Crawford, supra, it was said: "While it is unquestionably true that the keeping of the saloon in question is a criminal offense, and its operation involves the commission of many criminal offenses, yet we cannot think that these facts can possibly take away any of the jurisdiction which courts of equity might otherwise exercise." Page 735 of 28 Kan. The Supreme Court of the United States held in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 672, 673, 31 L. ed. 205, 214, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, 303, that "in case of public nuisances, properly so called, an indictment lies to abate them, and to punish the offenders. But an information also lies in equity, to redress the grievance by way of injunction." 2 Story's Eq. §§ 921, 922. The ground of this jurisdiction in cases of pre-emption, as well as of public nuisances, is the ability of courts of equity to give a more speedy, effectual, and permanent remedy than can be had at law. They can not only prevent nuisances that are threatened, and before irreparable mischief ensues, but arrest or abate those in progress, and, by perpetual injunction, protect the public against them in the future; whereas courts of law can only reach existing nuisances, leaving future acts to be the subject of new prosecutions or proceedings. This is a salutary jurisdiction, especially where a nuisance affects the health, morals, or safety of the community. Though not frequently exercised, the power undoubtedly exists in courts of equity thus to protect the public against injury."

The question was before our court in the recent case of State ex rel. Jackson v. Lindsay, 85 Kan. 79, 83, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 610, 116 Pac. 207, 208, where it was said: "Courts of equity are reluctant to use the process of injunction where the remedy by indictment or information is efficacious, but will not hesitate where the remedy is not adequate, and it is necessary to protect the rights of the public or an individual. A court is not powerless to prevent the doing of an act merely because it is denounced as a public offense." See also Re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 39 L. ed. 1092, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900; State ex rel. Crow v. Canty, 207 Mo. 439, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 747, 123 Am. St. Rep. 393, 105 S. W. 1078. 13 Ann. Cas. 787; Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 35 L.R.A. 772, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443, 44 N. E. 1077; Columbian Athletic Club v. State, 143 Ind. 98, 28 L.R.A. 727, 52 Am. St. Rep. 407, 40 N. E. 914; North American Ins. Co. v. Yates, 116 Ill. App. 217; Com. v. McGovern, 116 Ky. 212, 66 L.R.A. 280, 75 S. W. 261. It is said that the statutory remedy for the punishment and abatement of common nuisances is adequate, and therefore injunction is not necessary nor available. In the first place, the remedy by prosecution is only applicable to existing nuisances, and cannot reach future illegal acts and nuisances which the scheme of appellees contemplated. According to the averments in the petition, appellees are doing the illegal acts in many places throughout the city at the same time, and are moving up and down the streets of the city, rendering it difficult to trace their operations, and are conducting the business through so many agencies and in such devious ways that a multiplicity of prosecutions and proceedings would be necessary under the remedies provided by the prohibitory law. The migratory character of the nuisances, the number of them, the persistence of appellees in their unlawful action, and the various subterfuges, shifts, and devices employed by them in committing public nuisances, show clearly enough that criminal prosecution would be an inadequate remedy. It is a well-recognized rule that equity will take jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits. A court of equity can prevent threatened nuisances as well as restrain and abate existing ones. 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

It may in a single proceeding put an end to those in progress, and perpetually enjoin those in contemplation.

The ground of adequacy of legal remedies, however, is not a very strong or important consideration in cases like this, where the express right is given to the state to enjoin and suppress the maintaining of common nuisances. It was said in North American Ins. Co. v. Yates, supra, that, "independent of statute, the state may file a bill to enjoin a violation of its laws where the acts complained of are injurious to the public. And it is immaterial that such acts are punishable under the criminal statute, or that there is an adequate remedy at law, or that the complainant has suffered no injury." Pages 220, 221 of 116 Ill. App. In speaking of the jurisdiction of a court of equity in cases of this kind, it has been said that "this jurisdiction is founded upon the ability of equity to prevent irreparable mischief and vexatious litigation, and to furnish a more complete remedy than can be had at law. The remedy by indictment for a public nuisance is not an adequate remedy at law precluding the remedy by injunction." 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 703. There are sufficient grounds alleged for invoking the jurisdiction of a court of equity to enjoin and suppress public nuisances under the general provision of the Code, but we think that injunction will also lie under the provisions of the prohibitory law. It provides that "all places where intoxicating liquors are manufactured, sold, bartered, or given away in violation of law, or where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors as a beverage, or where intoxicating liquors are kept for sale, barter, or delivery in violation of the law, and all intoxicating liquors, bottles, glasses, kegs, pumps, bars, and other property kept in and used in maintaining such a place, are hereby declared to be common nuisances." Gen. Stat. 1909, § 4387. "The attorney general, county attorney, or any citizen of the county where such a nuisance as is defined in § 1. chapter 232, Session Laws of 1901, exists or is kept, or is maintained, may maintain an action in the name of the state to abate and perpetually enjoin the same," etc. Gen. Stat. 1909, § 4388.

The contention of appellees is that the averments of the petition of the state do not sufficiently describe the place, or, rather, do not describe such a place as is contemplated by the foregoing statute. They allege, in effect, that appellees carry on their unlawful business and create a nuisance on the streets and alleys of the city. It is true, as contended, that ordinarily such unlawful business is conducted and such nuilances are maintained in houses, apartments, and rooms, and in proceedings brought under the statute quoted, it has been said that the place should be so described that those interested can identify it. It is necessary that the description should be so definite that the parties can understand the scope of the judgment, and so that officers called on to abate the nuisance may be able to identify it, and so that all can know the extent of the place to which the injunction ordered applies. However, the statute does not provide that the place must be in a building or inclosure, nor does it fix any limit on the dimensions of such a place. It was held in State v. Walters, 57 Kan. 702, 47 Pac. 839, that such a nuisance might be maintained on open ground, and that two lots of a certain block in a city was a good description. In State v. Dykes, 83 Kan. 250, 252, 111 Pac. 179, 180, a nuisance proceeding, the defendant was enjoined from maintaining a place in a certain county, and it was held that this blanket judgment, although broader than the charge against him, was not void. It was alleged and shown that he sold beer kept in a barrel in an alley, and that part of the alley so occupied and used by him was held to be a "place," and the testimony sufficient to justify a finding that he was maintaining a nuisance within the meaning of the law. It was said: "The want of other 'paraphernalia' did not prevent the spot occupied from being a 'place' within the condemnation of the statute, nor did its location in an alley prevent his being its 'keeper,' so long as he used it for his own ends."

As the statute does not prescribe the character or extent of the place, the attorney general or county attorney in charging the maintaining of a nuisance may make the description of the place as extended or limited as the facts and circumstances of the case may warrant. It may be in a building or in a room in it, or it may be on an open lot or a block, or it may be in a field or a park. As we have seen, it may be in an alley, and therefore it may be in a street. It was undoubtedly the intention of the legislature that every place in which a nuisance was maintained, wherever located and whatever the size or extent, should be abated. Ownership of the ground on which the nuisance is kept is not essential to the exercise of the power of injunction, as the Dykes Case determined that the place might be on public ground. If the place of the nuisance is public, the court must adopt methods of abatement suitable to the place and the situation. There could, of course, be no lien obtained on the premises, the place could not be padlocked or closed, neither could it be removed nor destroyed. A nuisance may be abated by injunction or by some of the other processes mentioned. The injunction process is peculiarly applicable to the abatement of a nuisance kept in streets and alleys, or in any part of the public grounds of a city. The fact that a person moves back and forward in the described place in conducting his unlawful business will not serve to protect the culprit, nor deprive the court of the power to enjoin him from continuing the nuisance in any part of the place. An offender could not get beyond the reach of an injunction if he took a push cart loaded with intoxicating liquors, and moved it about from one place in a park to another while making sales; and in a proceeding brought against him, it would be sufficient to charge that he maintained a nuisance in the park. The same would be true if he made such use of a house boat which he moved up and down the river in the center of a city. And it would be clear that if he carried on his business from a wagon which he moved about in the busiest section of a city; that so much of the streets as he used might be described as the place of the nuisance. If the nuisance is of an ambulatory character, and the offender is moving it from point to point over the city, and is thus illegally using to some extent all the streets and alleys of the city, no reason is seen why such streets and alleys may not be described as the place of the nuisance, nor why the offender may not be enjoined from maintaining a nuisance on any street or alley of the city. Blanket injunctions covering a wide scope of territory, when the nuisance extends over only a small part of such territory, will not be issued, but the magnitude of the place and the range of the injunction must depend on the methods of the defendant and the circumstances of each case. In the case of State ex rel. Lyon v. City Club, 83 S. C. 509, 515, 65 S. E. 730, 732, cited by appellees in support of the contention that an injunction cannot reach so extended a place as that described, it was held that a general blanket injunction covering the whole of the state was not warranted, but it also recognized that it might be as extended as the devices and operations of the defendant in conducting the unlawful business and in keeping the nuisance. After deciding that there was no error in refusing an injunction restraining sales of liquor throughout the state, and independently of the place where the nuisance existed, the court said: "Possibly circumstances may be such as would justify the court in enlarging the sphere of its injunction, as where the court has reason to believe the offender, after injunction, will shift his nuisance to another place, so as to render the injunction practically useless. The court might prefer not to chase the offender from place to place, but might head him off by a broader restraining order." The allegations of appellant show such conduct and circumstances in this case as were forecast in the cited case, and they afford good grounds for enlarging the sphere of the injunction to the extent of the place described in the petition. The restraining power of the court as given by the statute is broad enough to reach the wrongdoer, whether he is in motion or stationary within the described place, and however large the place of his operations.

It is suggested that the sales of liquor taken from a warehouse in Missouri and brought into Kansas, where it was sold and delivered to purchasers, cannot be enjoined, as it would be an interference with commerce between the states. It appears from the petition that the sale and delivery of the liquor was made by the appellees themselves, and that the delivery was made and the sales consummated within the state. The appellees were therefore punishable under the laws of the state, and the nuisance maintained by them in Kansas was subject to the restraining power of the district court. Parties cannot escape the condemnation of the law by storing liquors beyond the state line, and then carting them back into the state, making periodical or occasional trips to certain places where the liquors are sold, and delivering them to persons on this side of the state line. They cannot peddle the liquors up and down the highways of the state without subjecting themselves to the penalties of the prohibitory law and the restraining power of courts of equity. According to the averments of the petition, the appellees are resorting to a number of cunningly devised shifts and subterfuges, intended to baffle the officers and defeat the enforcement of a law enacted for the protection of public morals, public health, and public safety. Knowing the policy of the state and the prohibition of a traffic that is conceded to be the greatest source of vice and crime and poverty and sorrow, they employ the tricks and fraudulent means enumerated to bring in and sell the prohibited liquors. They flagrantly undertake to thwart the policy of the state, and contemptuously defy the law and its officers; but the courts will look through such pretenses and subterfuges, and hold them responsible for their real intent and acts. Under the averments of the petition, they are to be regarded as outlaws who are selling and delivering liquors and creating common nuisances within the state, and, if the nuisances are shown to exist as 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) alleged, it is the manifest duty of the court to perpetually enjoin them.

The demurrers should have been overruled in each of the cases. The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the causes remanded for further proceedings.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

ROBERT COLEMAN, Appt.,

v.

SALLIE COLEMAN.

(147 Ky. 383, 144 S. W. 1.)

Divorce — restoration of property — transfer to defraud creditors.

Property transferred by a man to his wife to defraud his creditors is not within the operation of a statute providing that in case of divorce any property which either party may have obtained from the other during marriage, in consideration or by reason thereof, shall be restored to the party from whom it was obtained.

Note. — Applicability of statutory provision for restoration of property in case of divorce, to voluntary gifts or conveyances.

This note is limited to the bearing of the statutes upon voluntary gifts or conveyances, and does not include cases upon the restoration of property which came to the husband by force of the marriage. Cases relating to community property or homestead rights, or "settlements" under the English statutes permitting the court to vary settlements, are excluded, as are also cases where the statute permits the court in decreeing a divorce to make such division of the property as may be equitable.

As to right to join prayer for return of plaintiff's property with prayer for divorce, see the note to Singer v. Singer, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 819.

For marital misconduct of one spouse as avoiding gift by other spouse, see note to Thomas v. Thomas, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 124.

Voluntary gifts and conveyances are not affected by statutes relating to property obtained "in consideration of" or "by reason of" or "by virtue of" the marriage. McNutt v. McNutt, 78 Ark. 346, 95 S. W. 778; Spurlock v. Spurlock, 80 Ark. 37, 96 S. W. 753; Flood v. Flood, 5 Bush, 167; Phillips v. Phillips, 9 Bush, 183; Chase v. Phillips, 153 Mass. 17, 26 N. Clay, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, Robert Coleman, and appellee, Sallie Coleman, were married on March 21, 1883. On December 3, 1904, in an action brought by appellee, they were divorced by a judgment of the Harrison circuit court. The judgment, following § 425 of the Civil Code, provided as follows: "Any property not disposed of at the commencement of this action, which either party may have obtained, directly or indirectly, from compromise was made of an action for divorce, in which it was agreed that there should be a perpetual divorce from bed and board, the husband setting aside a considerable property in trust for the use of the wife and her children after her death, and the wife married again, whereupon the husband, having divorced her a vinculo, brought an action to have the deed of trust canceled and the property returned to him. In denying this application, the court said: "Our statute requires that all the property remaining in kind which one party may have obtained from or through the other, during the marriage, in consideration of or by reason thereof, shall be restored on granting a divorce. (2 Stanton, Rev. Stat. 21.) But here she did not get the property in consideration of or by reason of her intermarriage with him, but because they could not live in the proper conjugal relations, and were severing the same."

In Phillips v. Phillips, 9 Bush, 183, where the husband, in a decree of divorce in his favor, was granted land which he had conveyed after marriage to a trustee for the separate use of his wife for her life, and with remainder to her children, the court, in holding that this decree was erroneous, said: "Section 6, article 3, chapter 47, Revised Statutes, provides that 'upon final decree of divorce from the bond of matrimony, the parties shall be restored such property not disposed of at the commencement of the suit, as either obtained from or through the other, before or during the marriage, in consideration or by reason thereof.' The 462d section of the Civil Code of Practice differs therefrom in this: It limits the property to be restored to property obtained during the marriage. It may well be doubted whether it was intended by the adoption of this provision of the Code to supersede the statute quoted. The design seems to have been to regulate the mode of enforcing the right of restoration, and not to establish or define such right. Williams v. Gooch, 3 Met. (Ky.) 486. But, however this may be, the Code makes no provision as to property acquired before marriage, and therefore the statute 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) remains in force as to such property. It is apparent from the language both of the statutes and the Code, that the mere fact that property was obtained by one of the parties from or through the other, before or during the marriage, does not entitle the party from or through whom it was obtained to have it restored upon final judgment for a divorce. If such had been the legislative intention, the condition found in each of the two sections, that it must have been obtained 'in consideration or by reason of the marriage,' would have been omitted as superfluous."

In McNutt v. McNutt, 78 Ark. 346, 95 S. W. 778, it was held that a husband obtaining a divorce for his wife's misconduct could not recover any of the property, real or personal, which he had assigned and conveyed to her after marriage, under the Arkansas statute, the court holding that, as the statute had been copied from the Kentucky Code of 1854, where the word "consideration" in the statute had been held to mean "the act of marriage, or some agreement or contract touching or relating to the act of marriage," and the expression, "by reason thereof," "to relate to such property as either party may have obtained from or through the other by operation of the laws regulating the property rights of husband and wife," the statute could not relate to the conveyances in question. (The court points out that a later change in the Kentucky Code, in 1876, was not copied by their legislature.)

So, in Spurlock v. Spurlock, 80 Ark. 37, 96 S. W. 753, supra, where a wife had, with her own earnings, paid off a mortgage on her husband's property, in case of a divorce, for her adultery, it was held, following the McNutt Case, that this was not within the Arkansas statute. But the court held that in equity the wife should be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee.

So, in Thomas v. Thomas, 27 Okla. 784, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 124, 109 Pac. 825, 113 Pac. 1058, supra, it was held that a gift of property made during the existence of marriage, by a husband to his wife, is not such "property" as is provided for in § 1856, Ind.

or through the other during marriage, in consideration or by reason thereof, shall be restored to the party from whom it was obtained." This action was brought by appellant against appellee to recover a tract of about 35 acres of land, which, he alleges, was paid for by him and conveyed to appellee during their marriage and in consideration thereof. Among the defenses interposed by appellee was that the land was conveyed to her by appellant, or was caused to be conveyed to her by him, with the fraudulent intent to cheat his creditors, and to prevent them from subjecting the land to the payment of their claims against him. Proof was taken, and upon submission of the case the chancellor denied appellant the relief prayed for. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It appears from the evidence that the tract in controversy is a part of a larger tract which was purchased by appellant at decretal sale. Appellant was unable to execute bond for the purchase price, so he assigned his bid to W. T. Lafferty. Lafferty agreed that enough land should be sold to pay the bonds and a reasonable fee, and that the remainder of the land should belong to appellant. The land was sold, with the exception of the tract in controversy, and there was realized from the sale a sum sufficient to pay the sale bonds and all of Lafferty's fee except $65. The land was conveyed to appellee by deed reserving to Lafferty a lien for the balance of his fee.

Terr. Anno. Stat. (Mansfield's Dig. § 2568), which is similar to the Arkansas statute.

A similar result was reached in Chase v. Phillips, 153 Mass. 17, 26 N. E. 136, supra. In that case a woman, having conveyed to her husband through a third party certain personal property, brought a suit in equity to recover it, which was settled, she making a deed of settlement in his favor to certain trustees. Later, the parties were divorced on account of the husband's adultery. In an action thereafter, brought by her to set aside the deed of settlement, it was held that the statute authorizing the court, after a divorce, to make a decree restoring to the wife "the whole or any part of her personal estate that has come to her husband by reason of the marriage," did not cover the case, and that the property which came to the husband under the trust deed made by his wife, in settlement of their differences, did not come to him "by reason of the marriage," within the meaning of the statute.

In Bufe v. Bufo, 88 Mo. App. 627, it was held that the wife had not forfeited her rights under an antenuptial agreement, by reason of the statute providing that in cases of divorce "the guilty party shall forfeit all rights and claims under and by virtue of the marriage." The court said: "The effect of its provisions is, in case of divorce, to forfeit all the guilty party's rights and claims under and by virtue of the marriage. But the plaintiff's demand against the estate was acquired by the antenuptial agreement, that is, by grant, and not 'under and by virtue of the marriage.'"

Under this statute, in Cockrill v. Woodson, 70 Fed. 752, supra, where the plaintiff attempted to convey real property directly to his wife, and thereafter the parties were divorced by the fault of the husband, it was held that, as the operation of the conveyance when made was to leave the legal title in the husband, and the equitable title in the wife, he held as trustee for her, and that upon the divorce, under the statute, his trusteeship ceased, and she became seised of the fee of the property. The court states that in this respect it follows the construction of the statute by the Missouri court, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) referring especially to Pitts v. Sheriff, 108 Mo. 110, 18 S. W. 1071, where the same question was similarly decided.

But in Raney v. Raney, 128 Mo. App. 167, 106 S. W. 577, where the wife, at the request of the husband, had lent money to his relatives, for which promissory notes were taken to the joint order of her and her husband, secured by deeds of trust, it was held that upon a divorce for his fault, she was entitled to these notes as her separate property, the court not stating whether this was decided under the statute or merely as equitable relief.

Under a statute providing that upon the dissolution of a marriage, the court may make a further decree restoring to the wife the whole or such part as it shall deem just and reasonable of the personal estate that shall have come to the husband by reason of the marriage, or awarding to her the value thereof, to be paid by the husband in money, this provision immediately following a section providing that when a decree of divorce shall be granted, the wife shall be entitled to the possession of her real estate in like manner as if her husband were dead, it was held that these two provisions "had reference to the property rights of a husband as they existed at common law, and that their object was to restore the wife to her property rights on dissolution of marriage, and prevent the husband from retaining the personal property and possession of the real estate thereafter," and that the statute did not cover personal property inherited by the wife during the marriage, from her father, and with which she had paid a debt of her husband, as it came to the husband by gift or loan, and not by reason of the marriage. Dillon v. Starin, 44 Neb. 881, 63 N. W. 12.

General provision for return of property owned at marriage.

In Tyson v. Tyson, 54 Md. 35, where the statute gave the court power, upon granting a divorce, "to award to the wife such property or estate as she had when married, or the value of the same, or of such part there-

Appellant's purpose in having the land conveyed to his wife is shown, not only by the evidence of others acquainted with the facts, but by the allegations of his second amended petition and his own account of the transaction. Thus the amended petition contains the following averment: "That plaintiff was in debt to some extent at that time, and this was done [the conveyance of the property to appellee] to give him a chance to pay his debts and secure a home for himself and his children."

In answer to the question, "State what about the contract with your wife?" appellant answered as follows: "I was bound up, and Judge Lafferty said he thought he could straighten it, and make the deed over to my wife, and he said, 'Any time you want to change it, you can change it.' He said, 'When you get straightened up, we can change the deed,' and we went on and wrote the deed." On cross-examination, in answer to the question, "Why did you not have this deed made to you by Judge Lafferty, instead of to your wife?" appellant answered: "I was a little behind in some indebtedness, and I knew there was enough coming out of my brother's estate to pay it, but they wouldn't settle up. I owed Mr. William Webber $130, I think, and Mr. William of as may have been sold or converted by the husband, having regard to the circumstances of the husband at the time of the divorce, or such part of any such property as the court may deem reasonable," it was held that the statute had no relation to an absolute gift of personal property made by the wife to the husband during the marriage.

In Reed v. Reed, 109 Md. 690, 130 Am. St. Rep. 552, 72 Atl. 414, where a woman, alleging that she had been granted by the English court an absolute divorce from her husband, asked for a decree of the Maryland court that real property in Maryland bought with her money during the marriage, and which she caused to be conveyed to her self and her husband "as tenants by entireties," be adjudged to be her sole property, the court, in holding that, without further allegations and proof showing the transaction to be against her will, she could not recover, said: "The theory on which the bill was filed is that the appellant having been divorced from the appellee, the mere fact that the property was paid for out of money belonging to the appellant is sufficient to authorize a court of equity, either under the authority of art. 16, § 37, of the Code, or independently of that section, to restore the property to her. Without considering or determining whether said section, which confers upon the court granting the divorce 'power to award to the wife such property or estate as she had when married,' has reference only to the court decreeing the divorce, or whether courts of equity, apart from the statute, have such power, it is clear from the decisions in this state that, where a wife during coverture voluntarily, and without any fraud or undue influence on the part of the husband, conveys her property to him, the effect of a decree for divorce is not to vest in her an equitable title to such property. . . . Assuming that the Code confers on the court the power of awarding the wife all the property she had during coverture, as well as that possessed prior and at the time of the marriage, that power must be qualified by the rights acquired by the husband, or others through him, claiming with her privy and consent." (The court stated that the effect of the divorce itself was to change the title into a tenancy in common.)

General provision for return of property "derived from husband."

In Gallagher v. Gallagher, 89 Wis. 461, 61 N. W. 1104, it was held, where property was purchased in the wife's name, with money which was held to be the husband's, that such property was "derived from the husband," under the statute which provided: "Upon judgment of divorce the court may finally divide and distribute the estate, both real and personal, of the husband, and so much of the estate of the wife as shall have been derived from the husband, between the parties, and divest and transfer the title of any thereof accordingly."

As illustrating a division, under this statute of "the estate," part of which was in the wife's name and derived from the husband, see Hoernig v. Hoernig, 109 Wis. 229, 85 N. W. 346.

In Martin v. Martin, 112 Wis. 314, 87 N. W. 232, 88 N. W. 215, a decree of divorce was reversed because the court, in separating the property, had evidently overlooked the fact that a valuable piece of land owned by the wife had been deeded to her by the husband without any consideration and wholly as a gift or gratuity.

And in Brenger v. Brenger, 142 Wis. 26, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 387, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1050, 125 N. W. 109, 19 Ann. Cas. 1136, a judgment was reversed because the court below had decreed that the wife pay the husband a monthly sum, which would require her to resort to property not derived from the husband. The court, however, directed that, in adjusting the matter, the property conveyed by the husband to the wife directly should be returned to the husband.

But where the husband's father deeded property to the wife on which the husband built a house, and it appeared that the wife had spent more than the value of the house in paying taxes and interest on mortgages on the property, it was held that this property was not "derived from the husband," within the terms of the statute. Frackelton v. Frackelton, 103 Wis. 673, 79 N. W. 750.

Later Kentucky statute.

Subsequently to the Kentucky cases cited supra, the Code of Kentucky was amended to read: "Every judgment for a divorce Terry a note, and, let me see, I owed another note to somebody. Bob Clifford was the one, and they all wanted their money." Judge Lafferty testifies that, at the time of the conveyance to appellee, appellant was involved, and the deed was made to appellee, because it was understood by all present that, if the land was conveyed to appellant, his creditors would take it for their debts. James Coleman, appellant's son and witness, testifies that he understood that the land was deeded to his mother to prevent its being subjected to the payment of his father's debts.

It would be difficult to find a case where the intention of the grantor was made clearer. He and all his witnesses admit that the land was conveyed to appellee to prevent it from being taken away from him by his creditors. Counsel for appellant insist, however, that the proof is not sufficient to justify the conclusion that the conveyance was caused to be made by appellant for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, because the whole transaction was a matter of record, and never attacked, which is conclusive that the rights of no creditor were affected. This contention was made in the cases of Carson v. Beliles, 121 Ky. 294, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1007, 89 S. W. 208, and Lankford from the bond of matrimony shall contain an order restoring any property not disposed of at the commencement of the action, which either party may have obtained, directly or indirectly, from or through the other, during marriage, in consideration or by reason thereof; and any property so obtained without valuable consideration shall be deemed to have been obtained by reason of marriage." (The rest of the section is as to method of proceeding, etc.)

Under this amendment, voluntary gifts and conveyances will be restored upon divorce, without regard to the guilt of the respective parties. Irwin v. Irwin, 107 Ky. 24, 52 S. W. 927; Grow v. Grow, 134 Ky. 816, 135 Am. St. Rep. 440, 121 S. W. 654; Thomason v. Thomason, 142 Ky. 176, 134 S. W. 161; Hawkins v. Northern Coal & Coke Co. 145 Ky. 118, 140 S. W. 48; Bayer v. Fusche, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 832; Bennett v. Bennett, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1243, 43 S. W. 247; Duvall v. Duvall, — Ky. —, 144 S. W. 78; Maynard v. Maynard, 145 Ky. 197, 140 S. W. 156.

The rule has been applied by requiring restoration of:

—land conveyed to a wife through a third party. Thomason v. Thomason, 142 Ky. 176, 134 S. W. 161;

—real estate purchased with the proceeds of a lottery ticket bought by the husband, which won $15,000 which was deposited in bank to the wife's credit and later invested in real estate in her name. Irwin v. Irwin, 107 Ky. 24, 52 S. W. 927;

—money which the husband had obtained from the wife, and acknowledged her claim to. Duvall v. Duvall, — Ky. —, 144 S. W. 78;

—a paid-up life insurance policy for which the husband had furnished the money. Bennett v. Bennett, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1243, 43 S. W. 247.

Where, on sale of property by reason of failure of the husband to make a deferred payment, the wife bought it in, in her own name, and later, on sale of a part of it, the amount she had paid was repaid to her, on a subsequent divorce the property was decreed to the husband. Maynard v. Maynard, 145 Ky. 197, 140 S. W. 156.

marriage, the parties lived on the wife's farm, on divorce in her favor it was held, the husband having brought about $400 of personal property to the farm, which ought to have increased to $500 at the time of the divorce, that he should receive the amount of $500 from the stock and personalty on hand when the parties separated.

In Pope v. Pope, — Ky. —, 146 S. W. 410, where it was claimed by the wife after a divorce that the husband, in contemplation of an immediate separation, had given her $500, and had thereafter forcibly taken the money from her, it was held that, under the pleadings, she was not entitled to receive the money back, the court stating that it did not appear from the pleadings that the money was given to her in settlement of any of her property rights, in which case a different question would have been presented.

But in Dollins v. Dollins, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1036, 83 S. W. 95, where upon a divorce it appeared that the woman, against whom the divorce was granted, had, when the parties separated, a horse, a cow, some furniture, and a note upon her husband for $150, all of which she sold or collected before the decree, and that on her marriage she owned real estate worth $150, afterwards sold, and that the husband at the time of the divorce was worth not more than $375, it was held that the court properly refused to compel the husband to restore to her the property which he had obtained from her during the marriage, evidently referring to the real estate.

In Harris v. Harris, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 930, 104 S. W. 387, where the husband had in his possession a note of a third party to the order of his wife, and the evidence was that this was her own property, and upon a divorce from bed and board, the note itself could not be found, it was ordered that he should pay her the amount of this note. To the objection that the statute permitted the restoration of property only in the event of a final divorce, the court stated in effect that the statute had nothing to do with the note, as, at the time, the wife's property did not belong to the husband, so that there was no question of restoration, but simply of a finding that the note was the absolute property of the wife.

v. Lankford, — Ky. —, 117 S. W. 962, and held to be without merit. In the former case, the court said: "Suppose, for an example, one conveys his property on secret trust for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and then should afterwards pay all his debts; would the fact that no credit-—where consideration is a valuable one.

Where the consideration for the conveyance is a valuable one between the parties, the statute does not apply. See Dunker v. Schuff, 134 Ky. 192, 119 S. W. 742.

—conveyances in fraud of creditors.

The decision in COLEMAN v. COLEMAN, that the statute will not enable the husband to recover property which he caused to be conveyed to his wife for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, is supported by Lankford v. Lankford, — Ky. —, 117 S. W. 962, where the court pointed out that the statute relates only to conveyances made by reason of the marital relation, and therefore does not apply to those made to defraud creditors. The court there said: "It is the contention of appellant that the house and lot in question were conveyed to his wife by reason of their marital relation, and that, a divorce having been granted in this action, appellant is entitled, under § 228 of the Civil Code of Practice, to have restored to him the property so conveyed. The question whether or not appellant is entitled to restoration of his property depends altogether upon the fact of whether or not it was conveyed to appellee by reason of their marital relation, or whether it was conveyed for the fraudulent purpose of defeating his creditors. . . . Without giving the evidence in detail, we may say that there is no doubt in our minds that the conveyance to Skidmore, and from Skidmore to appellee, was made to defeat appellant's creditors. That being the case, it was not obtained by appellee by reason of the marital relation, but was obtained by her by reason of the fact that appellant thereby sought to defraud his creditors. If, as we hold, it was so conveyed, then it necessarily follows that appellant is not entitled to restoration of the property."

Gifts not "settlements" under English divorce statutes.

In Chalmers v. Chalmers, 68 L. T. N. S. 28, 1 Reports, 504, where a wife had assigned certain property to her husband, she asked, upon a decree dissolving the marriage, that the property be reassigned to her in place of maintenance, as thus varying a post-nuptial settlement, or that it be reassigned to her as maintenance, and the court, finding great difficulty in holding the assignment to be a "settlement," did not pass on that question, but ordered that the 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or was actually injured enable him to recover from his vendee? Or suppose one, having no creditors, should convey his property for the purpose of becoming indebted, and of then defrauding his dupes by being insolvent, but should repent before the fraud was committed; could it be main-husband "secure to the petitioner, as maintenance, the value of the property in question."

The question was definitely decided, however, in Hubbard v. Hubbard, [1901] p. 157, 70 L. J. Prob. N. S. 34, 84 L. T. N. S. 441, where a husband after marriage assigned a leasehold to a trustee who on the same day assigned the same to the wife, the object being to make a provision for the wife, and it was held that this was not a "settlement" under the English statute giving the court power to vary settlements, and that, upon the nullity of the marriage being declared, the court had no power to vary the assignment.

This case is not referred to in Stedall v. Stedall, 86 L. T. N. S. 124, 50 Week. Rep. 320, 18 Times L. R. 254, where a tontine life policy was payable in the event of the husband's death before the end of the tontine, to his wife, if living, and the court, on a divorce by her fault, was inclined to think the policy was a "settlement," but it was held that the wife should be compelled to assign her interest for the benefit of her husband and children, under the provision of the statute of 1857, that in such a case property of the wife in possession or reversion might be so settled.

Miscellaneous.

In Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 3 L.R.A. 781, 12 Am. St. Rep. 58, 20 Pac. 715, where a husband declared a homestead on his separate property, and later made a deed of it to his wife, and they were subsequently divorced without any mention being made of the property, the court held that the effect of the conveyance was not to divest the property of its character as a homestead, but simply to convey it to the wife in fee subject to the homestead, as the California statute provided: "If a homestead has been selected from the separate property of either, it shall be assigned to the former owner of such property, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the innocent party," and, as it appeared that the plaintiff was not the innocent party in the divorce suit, and had made no request to have the property set off to him for any time in that suit, that it must be deemed to be the property of the wife in fee from the decree in the divorce suit.

In Dean v. Richmond, 5 Pick. 461, where the statutes regarding divorce a mensa et thoro provided that the wife be restored to all her lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and that she should have reasonable allowtained that, because he had paid his creditors in the first case, and never had any in the second, he could recover the property so conveyed? We think both these questions should be answered in the negative." And in the case of Lankford v. Lankford, supra, where the husband, after divorce, was seeking the restoration of certain property on the ground that he conveyed it to his wife in consideration of marriage, relief was denied because it appeared that the conveyance was made by the husband for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, though none of his creditors were actually defraudance of alimony out of her husband's estate, having regard to the personal property which she carried to the husband, a wife after her marriage joined her husband in the conveyance of certain real estate of which she was seized at the time of the marriage. A part of the consideration was a promissory note, and it was agreed at the time of the sale by the husband, that the wife should retain the note as her own property and should receive payment of it to her own separate use, and she ever since retained it. On a divorce from bed and board the court ordered that her real and personal estate, which came to the husband by the marriage, should be restored to the wife, and she thereafter brought action upon the promissory note, and it was held that she could not recover, as the statutes in regard to divorces a mensa et thoro did not give the court any authority to restore to the wife personal property.

In Myers v. Myers, 88 Neb. 656, 130 N. W. 254, where the statute did not allow the court to make an equitable division of real estate in divorce, the appellate court was of the opinion that real estate bought with money which was the accumulation of the joint industry and frugality of both husband and wife ought to be held to belong to both of them; but it declined to disturb the finding of the trial court that the property, which seemed to be thus acquired and which stood in the wife's name, was really the property of the husband. And permanent alimony of half its value having been decreed to the wife by the trial court, this decision was affirmed.

In Tolerton v. Williard, 30 Ohio St. 579, the court evidently approved the plan of giving a wife a gross sum as "alimony as well as repayment" of money received from or through her, secured on land in which such money was invested, where the statute provided that when a divorce is granted by reason of the aggression of the husband, the wife shall be restored to all her lands, tenements, and hereditaments not previously disposed of, and shall be allowed such alimony "as the court shall think reasonable, having due regard to the property which came to him (the husband) by marriage;" and this alimony is to be "allowed to her in real or personal property, or both, by decreeing to her such sum of money, payable either in gross or instalments, as the court may deem just and equitable."

In McAllister v. McAllister, 10 Heisk. 345, where the statute (§ 2471 of the Code) provided that a wife should have the exclusive dominion and control (subject to rights of creditors before the decree) of land owned by her at the time of a decree dissolving the marriage, the court, in ordering a divorce from bed and board, with a direction that the case should remain on the docket, and that if a reconciliation should not take place in a reasonable time, the chancellor should have power to dissolve the marriage, said, as to land conveyed by the wife to the husband through a third party: "Shall we regard the land as the property of the defendant, and assign to the complainant a part thereof in lieu of alimony, or shall we regard it as complainant's land, and restore it to her in accordance with § 2471 of the Code? We think the latter course must prevail. Although the legal title be vested in defendant, yet, in a court of equity, as between the husband and wife, we must regard the latter as the real owner. We cannot sanction the means by which he obtained the title. We decide nothing as to creditors. The title to the land will be restored to the complainant. In one event the life estate of the defendant may be restored to him." But it should be stated that another section of the statute gave the court power, in case of a divorce from bed and board, to decree to the wife such part of the husband's real and personal estate as it thought proper, and that in so doing it might take into consideration property received by him from her, as well as that secured to her, by marriage contract or otherwise.

In Saunders v. Saunders, 144 Mo. 482, 46 S. W. 428, where the husband had conveyed property to his wife through a third party, the deed to her being in consideration "of the relinquishment and release of all claims of dower" in and to his personal and real estate, and he obtained a divorce on account merely of her desertion of him, and the statutes provided that if the husband be divorced from the wife for her fault or misconduct, she should not be endowed, and further that in case of an abandonment with adultery, the wife should lose both her jointure and dower, it was held that the conveyance here was in the nature of jointure, and that the husband could not have the deeds canceled.

There is an obiter dictum in Hinds v. Hinds, 7 Mackey, 85, that a statute providing that the court might restore to the wife all the separate property that she had at the date of her marriage, and that she could retain her dower, and that the court might restore to her the whole or any part of her separate property, however acquired, would not authorize the court to disturb a settlement made by the husband voluntarily upon the wife before the cause of the divorce accrued, she being the innocent party.

ed. In discussing this phase of the case, the court said: "This court has held in a long line of decisions that property will not be restored to a grantor who himself conveyed it for the fraudulent purpose of defeating his creditors. The transaction is one which involves moral turpitude in the intention in which it is done. What actually happens may be immaterial. It matters not whether the creditor was actually injured or not, if, as a matter of fact, the debtor makes a conveyance for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. He who doth fraud may not borrow the hand of the chancellor to draw equity from a fountain his own hath polluted. Carson v. Beliles, supra; Southwood v. Southwood, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 307, 98 S. W. 304."

It follows that, under the foregoing authorities and the facts of this case, appellant is not entitled to recover the land in controversy.

Judgment affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WISCONSIN

v.

EDWARD BOWEN et al.

(— Wis. —, 135 N. W. 494.)

State — boundary — change of channel of stream.

The boundary and jurisdiction of a state which has been along the main channel of a stream is not changed by the construction by a railroad company, of a dam which throws the main channel to the other side of an island for the purpose of convenience in the construction of a bridge.

(April 3, 1912.)

CERTIFICATION by the Circuit Court for LaCrosse County to the Supreme Court of a question arising upon conviction of defendants of taking fish in violation of law. Negative answer returned.

Statement by Vinje, J.:

The defendants were charged with a violation of the provisions of § 4560d, Stats., being chapter 525 of the Laws of 1909, in this: That they did, on the 15th day of April, 1911, in the county of La Crosse and state of Wisconsin, unlawfully set, place, and use in an inland water of this state, to wit, in the Mississippi river, one certain net which was not then and there a landing net. The respective parties, by their attorneys, stipulated in open court that a jury be waived, and that the case be tried and determined by the court. The judge found the facts as follows: "That on the day charged in the complaint the defendants were fishing with a seine and trammel net in what is known as the east channel of the Mississippi river, and west of the thread of the stream of said channel, and at a point opposite to the county of La Crosse, Wisconsin, and east of Minnesota island, contrary to the provisions of § 4560d of chapter 525, Laws of 1909. That said east channel lies between the Wisconsin

Note. — Change of channel as change of state boundary.

The rule laid down with practical unanimity by the courts is that, in case of a gradual shifting of the channel of a stream which constitutes a boundary between states, the boundary will change with the channel (Bellefontaine Improv. Co. v. Niedringhaus, 181 Ill. 426, 72 Am. St. Rep. 269, 55 N. E. 184; Buttenuth v. St. Louis Bridge Co. 123 Ill. 535, 5 Am. St. Rep. 545, 17 N. E. 439, dictum); but that, while a gradual change in the channel will have this effect, a sudden change or avulsion will not (Nebraska v. Iowa, 143 U. S. 359, 36 L. ed. 186, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396; Missouri v. Nebraska, 196 U. S. 23, 49 L. ed. 372, decree, 197 U. S. 577, 49 L. ed. 881, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580; DeLoney v. State, 88 Ark. 311, 115 S. W. 138; Coulthard v. McIntosh, 143 Iowa, 389, 122 N. W. 233; McBride v. Steinweden, 72 Kan. 508, 83 Pac. 822; Fowler v. Wood, 73 Kan. 511, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, 117 Am. St. Rep. 534, 85 Pac. 763; Rees v. McDaniel, 115 Mo. 145, 21 S. W. 913; Holbrook v. Moore, 4 Neb. 437; Bouvier v. Stricklett, 40 Neb. 792, 59 N. W. 550; Moss v. Gibbs, 10 Heisk. 283; Collins 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

v. State, 3 Tex. App. 323, 30 Am. Rep. 142; Rodriguez v. Hernandez, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 78, 70 S. W. 343).

Thus, a change in the channel of the Mississippi river whereby it abandoned 20 miles of its former channel in less than two days was held to leave the boundary between the states of Arkansas and Tennessee in the center of the old channel. State v. Muncie Pulp Co. 119 Tenn. 47, 104 S. W. 437; Stockley v. Cissna, 119 Tenn. 135, 104 S. W. 792; Stockley v. Cissna, 56 C. C. A. 324, 119 Fed. 812.

It follows as a matter of course that a change in the channel of a river by artificial means does not change the boundary. State v. Young, 46 Vt. 565; James v. State, 10 Ga. App. 13, 72 S. E. 600.

And in Indiana v. Kentucky, 136 U. S. 479, 34 L. ed. 329, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1051, it is held that the filling up of the channel of the Ohio river, partly by natural and partly by artificial causes, so that the river now runs on the Kentucky side of a former island, does not separate that land from the state of Kentucky.

In Norton v. Whiteside, 188 Fed. 356, it is held that a boundary between states was changed by an artificial straightening of main shore and what is known, and designated upon the government maps, as Minnesota island. That, prior to 1876, said east channel of the Mississippi river was the one usually navigated by steamboats, and was designated as the main channel of the Mississippi river by the surveyors who surveyed La Crosse county in 1854. That about the year 1877 the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railroad Company constructed a bridge from the mainland in La Crosse county across said east channel, and across said Minnesota Island; and to the main Minnesota shore. That, prior to the construction of said bridge, and in 1876, the said Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railroad Company constructed a dam across said east channel of the Mississippi river near the head of said Minnesota island, thus diverting the said main channel of the river from the east side of Minnesota island to the west side thereof, in order to avoid constructing a drawbridge across said east channel, and to throw and divert the channel of said river through the drawbridge constructed by it on the west side of said Minnesota island. That since the construction of said dam the main navigable channel of the Mississippi river has been to the west of said Minnesota island, and since said date the said east channel has not been navigable for steamboats. That the construction of said dam, diverting the said channel, was with the consent of the War Department of the government of the United States. That the said Minnesota island was surveyed by the government of the United States as a part of the state of Minnesota; and the taxes upon the same have been ever since assessed and collected by the authorities of the state of Minnesota." As a conclusion of law, the judge found the defendants guilty as charged in the complaint; but, being of the opinion that a question of law arose on the trial which was so important as to require the decision of the supreme court thereon, and the defendants consenting thereto, he reported the following question for the decision of this court: "Upon the foregoing findings of fact, was the circuit court of La Crosse county jurisdiction of this prosecution?"

Messrs. James Thompson, L. H. Bancroft, Attorney General, and Russel Jackson, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Mr. F. E. Withrow for defendants.

the channel, but no cases are cited in support of the holding, and it appears to be at variance with all the authorities.

Robert v. Michelsen, 82 Neb. 48, 116 N. W. 949, furnishes a striking illustration of the rules as to the effect of gradual and sudden changes in the course of a stream which forms a state boundary. In that case it appears that the land involved was situated on the west side of the Missouri river in the state of Nebraska, but that during a period of three years the current gradually shifted so that it became entirely submerged and the channel changed to the westward of it. Thereafter, the land was restored by accretions to the eastern bank, so that, as restored, the land, according to the rule as to gradual change, was in the state of Iowa. Still later, by a sudden change, the channel was transferred to the eastward of the land, but, as a sudden change does not alter the boundary, the land in question was held to be a part of Iowa, although the river had returned to substantially its original location with reference to such land.

Where there is a sudden change in the course of a river, so that the boundary remains the same, it runs along the center of the main channel as the river formerly ran, unless there is an absence of evidence as to the location of the main channel, in which case it will be the center of the old bed located from bank to bank. State v. Keane, 84 Mo. App. 127.

of a boundary river does not change the boundary between the states, it does have the effect of limiting the jurisdiction of the states to the actual boundary in the former bed of the stream, where formerly it was concurrent over the whole stream. Cooley v. Golden, 52 Mo. App. 229.

Whether the shifting of the channel of a stream is such as will change the boundary is a question of fact for the trial court to determine. Plummer v. Marshall, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 126 S. W. 1162.

But the change in the course of a boundary stream may be considered to be gradual, though it is at times visible and perceptible. Denny v. Cotton, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 634, 22 S. W. 122.

In Missouri v. Kentucky, 11 Wall. 395, 20 L. ed. 116, which was a contest as to the jurisdiction over an island in the Mississippi river, the court says that if the river changed its course with reference to the island subsequently to the fixing of the boundary, the boundary was not changed thereby, but no distinction is made between gradual or sudden changes.

And in Washington v. Oregon, 211 U. S. 127, 53 L. ed. 118, on rehearing 214 U. S. 205, 53 L. ed. 969, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631, where the boundary between Oregon and Washington was fixed at the center of the north channel, it was held that it was not changed to the south channel by a gradual filling up of the north channel and its abandonment for navigation purposes in favor of the south channel. R. L. S.

Vinje, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Roberts v. Fullerton, 117 Wis. 222, 65 L.R.A. 953, 93 N. W. 1111, it was held that the jurisdiction of a state for the enforcement of its fish and game laws is coextensive with and limited by the boundaries of the state, even though they consist of the thread of a navigable stream over whose waters the adjacent states have concurrent jurisdiction for other purposes. The answer to the question reported, therefore, depends upon whether or not the boundary of the state of Wisconsin changed from the thread of the channel east of Minnesota island to the thread of the channel west thereof, by reason of the construction of the bridge and dam of the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railroad Company about 1877, which diverted the waters into the west channel to such an extent that it afterwards became the main channel, and the only one navigable by steamboats.

The district attorney of La Crosse county relies upon the cases of Franzini v. Layland, 120 Wis. 72, 97 N. W. 499, and Iowa v. Illinois, 147 U. S. 1, 37 L. ed. 55, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 239, to sustain the contention that the boundary changed with the change of channel. Those cases established the rule that, within the limits of the main channel, the boundary follows the "mid channel" or thread of the stream as it changes, from time to time, owing to the gradual shifting of sand banks, or other causes. But they do not hold that the creation of a new and different main channel shifts the boundary from the old to the new. And such is not the law. For the purpose of determining the boundary between states, where that is declared to be the center line or thread or middle of the main channel of a stream separating them, the conditions existing at the time of their creation govern as to what channel is meant. The then main channel, except as it may be changed by erosion or accretion, will forever contain within it the declared boundary line, though not necessarily in the same place at all times. Nebraska v. Iowa, 143 U. S. 359, 36 L. ed. 186, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396; Missouri v. Nebraska, 196 U. S. 23, 49 L. ed. 372, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155; Washington v. Oregon, 211 U. S. 127, 53 L. ed. 118, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 47, s. c., 214 U. S. 205, 53 L. ed. 969, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631; 1 Farnham, Waters, 40; Gould, Waters, § 159.

In Nebraska v. Iowa and Missouri v. Nebraska, supra, it is held that, where a stream which is the boundary between two states from any cause suddenly abandons its old bed and seeks a new one, such change in the channels results in no change in the boundary. That remains in the center of the old bed or channel, even though it may be dry. In each of those cases, the change was caused by avulsion. In the present case, the change was caused by the construction of a dam. It is obvious that any change wrought in the flow of the water by means of a dam cannot affect the question of state boundary any more than can such change produced by avulsion. It is only where the change takes place by the slow process of erosion or accretion that a change in boundary is effected. Missouri v. Nebraska, 196 U. S. 23, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155, 49 L. ed. 372. States and individuals alike are subject to the losses and gains of erosion and accretion; but neither can have the boundaries of his domain changed by avulsion, or by the diversion of the water effected by human agencies. New Orleans v. United States, 10 Pet. 662, 9 L. ed. 573. Such being the law, a negative answer to the question reported for decision is required. It is due to the attorney general to add that, for reasons stated in his brief, he argues that no change in the state boundary was effected by the construction of the dam and consequent diversion of the water into the western channel.

The question reported is answered: No.

HIRAM J. ALLEN LUMBER COMPANY,

(129 La. 899, 57 So. 166.)

Master and servant — negligence — defective appliances.

1. A mill hand operating a cut-off saw was struck upon the arm by a strip of wood carelessly thrown by another hand, who was working with another machine, with the result that his arm was knocked against the saw and his hand cut off; and this court finds that, save for the blow upon the plaintiff's arm, there would have been no accident, and, even with the blow, there would probably have been none, if the saw had been provided with its usual and proper

Note. — While no other case has been found involving the question whether the amount of damages to be awarded a plaintiff can be affected by the fact that the defendant is insolvent, so that the plaintiff will be able to realize only a portion of the amount awarded, it seems clear, as held in ROGERS v. HIRAM J. ALLEN LUMBER Co., that the amount to which the plaintiff is justly entitled cannot be increased, or a greater amount awarded or allowed, on the equipment. Held, the mill owner was guilty of negligence in employing a careless or incompetent hand and in failing to provide plaintiff with a reasonably safe place and reasonably safe appliance in and with which to do the work to which he was assigned, and plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and did not assume the risk of defendant's negligence, or of that of its careless or incompetent hand, who was not plaintiff's fellow servant within any rule that has been recognized by this court, since he and plaintiff were not engaged in the same work, and plaintiff had not seen enough of his carelessness to warrant the belief that he realized the danger therefrom to himself.

Damages — loss of hand — amount.

2. Where a young man nineteen years of age, who is dependent upon his physical labor for his livelihood, loses his right hand through the negligence of his employer, this court feels justified in allowing him $7,500 as damages.

Same — receivership — effect.

3. The amount to be awarded plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injury cannot be affected by the suggestion or consideration that the defendant company has been placed in the hands of a receiver, and is paying but 10 cents on the dollar to its creditors.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Bienville in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Barksdale & Barksdale and Hall & Jack, for appellant:

In the absence of proof of negligence in the employment of incompetent and careless servants, an employer is not responsible for damages resulting to a servant from the carelessness of a fellow servant.

ground that, by reason of the insolvency of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot, in any event, realize the full amount to which he is entitled, but will be obliged to accept only a percentage of whatever amount is awarded or allowed. All that a jury or court can properly do is to determine and award the amount of damages to which the plaintiff is entitled, regardless of whether he will be able to realize that amount upon execution of his judgment, and in case the defendant is insolvent, the plaintiff should share in his estate on the same basis with other creditors.

It seems, however, under the general rule that evidence of the pecuniary condition and financial circumstances of a defendant is 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

relevant and admissible as bearing upon the amount of punitive or exemplary damages which may be awarded (13 Cyc. 211), that, in cases where such damages are in issue, evidence of the insolvency of the defendant might be admissible to diminish the amount of the award of such damages, though it seems that this general class of evidence is admitted, not for the purpose of showing the defendant's mere ability to pay, but rather to aid in determining what amount will constitute a proper punitive award, under all the circumstances. And where no punitive damages are in issue, and only compensatory damages are recoverable, such evidence is inadmissible (13 Cyc. 212).

Messrs. Richardson & Richardson for appellee.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee has moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no bond for appeal has been filed. There is none in the record.

Appeal dismissed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Monroe, J., on January 2, 1912, handed down the following additional opinion:

(1) Plaintiff, being a little more than nineteen years of age, had his right hand severed from his arm by a cut-off saw which he was operating whilst in defendant's employ, and he attributes his injury to defendant's negligence, and prays for damages. Defendant pleads contributory negligence, assumption of risk, and fault on the part of a fellow servant; and it has appealed from an adverse judgment for $10,000. The story of the accident, as told by the witnesses, is substantially as follows: Plaintiff was operating a cut-off saw, his position being in front of, and facing, the saw, to which he fed the slab that he was cutting with his left hand, whilst he pulled the saw towards him, and against the slab, with his right hand, by means of a lever, which was attached to the frame to which the saw was fastened and which projected through the table or roller bed, upon the right and above the level of the upper edge of the saw. When the slab was cut through, he would push the lever from him, and the saw would be carried into a box or casing, which ordinarily served as a protection to the operator and to passers-by; but it appears that at the time of the accident an iron lever which belonged to the machine, and which was curved in such a way as to furnish a convenient handle whereby the operator could move the saw backward and forward, and yet keep his hand and arm in a comparatively safe position, had been broken, and that there had been substituted for it a straight piece of scantling (say 2x2 or 2x4), the hold upon which was less secure and placed the hand and arm of the operator in a position where, in the event of an accident such as happened, they were more likely to be injured. The accident consisted of plaintiff's being struck upon his right arm by a strip (of wood) which a young man by the name of Upshur had pulled from a near-by "edger" table, and which it was his business to throw into a conveyer trough behind him, but which he carelessly threw against plaintiff's arm, knocking it against the saw just as plaintiff was in the act of pulling the saw forward, with the result that plaintiff's right hand was cut off. Another unusual condition was that, for the accommodation of the substitute wooden lever, the top of the box or casing from which plaintiff was pulling the saw had been knocked off, so that the saw was more exposed than it would have been if the iron lever had been in use.

It is shown that Upshur had been employed by defendant for three days (or nights, as he and plaintiff were working on the night shifts), and that plaintiff had seen him at work on the night before that upon which the accident occurred, and had observed that he handled the strips that it was his business to remove from the "edger" table rather carelessly. It is also shown that immediately after the accident defendant caused the iron lever to be replaced and the casing of the saw to be repaired.

Our conclusions from the whole testimony are that, save for the blow upon plaintiff's arm from the strip thrown by Upshur, there would have been no accident, and that even with the blow there would probably have been none, if the equipment of the saw had been in its usual and proper condition. We find that defendant was negligent in employing Upshur and in allowing the saw to be operated whilst the equipment was out of repair. We fail to find that Upshur was the fellow servant of plaintiff within any rule that has been recognized by this court, since the work that he was doing had no connection with that which plaintiff was doing. And we fail to find that plaintiff was guilty of any negligence that contributed to the accident, or that he assumed the risk of Upshur's negligence, or of the negligence of defendant in failing to furnish him with reasonably safe appliances and a reasonably safe place with and in which to do the work for which he was employed.

We are given to understand through the briefs of the counsel (and there is some evidence to that effect in other proceedings before this court) that the defendant company has been placed in the hands of a receiver; that it is paying 10 cents on the dollar to its creditors; and that $1,020 has been set aside to meet this claim,—from which it is argued that the judgment for $10,000 in favor of plaintiff should be affirmed, even though in itself it should be considered excessive, as he will, in no event, realize more than the $1,020, and will get less than that in proportion as the amount allowed by the district court may be reduced. The situation is deplorable, but we cannot meet the difficulty in the manner suggested. All that we are authorized to do in this case is to determine the amount to which plaintiff is entitled. Whether he will be able to realize that amount upon the execution of his judgment is altogether another matter. We are of opinion that the amount awarded by the district court should be reduced, but we think, in view of the decrease within the past few years in the purchasing power of money, that we are justified in allowing in a case of this kind as much as $7,500. Summers v. Crescent City R. Co. 34 La. Ann. 139, 44 Am. Rep. 419; Peniston v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. 34 La. Ann. 777, 44 Am. Rep. 444; Davis v. Houston & S. R. Co. 106 La. 81, 30 So. 250; *Dyer v. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the amount awarded by the District Court be reduced to $7,500, and that, as thus amended, the judgment appealed from be affirmed, the costs of the appeal to be paid by plaintiff.

ERROR to the District Court for Le Flore County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor and an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged unreasonable search instituted maliciously and without probable cause by defendant's agent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs C. O. Blake, H. B. Low, R. J. Roberts, and Day & Dubois, for plaintiff in error:

An action for malicious prosecution will not lie for preferring an accusation before a magistrate charging plaintiff with a criminal offense, if he was not apprehended and no process was issued for his arrest.

Cooper v. Armour, 8 L.R.A. 47, 42 Fed. 215.

As the defendant is a corporation and can act only through its agents, its liability must be fixed by the agency created.

Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Brown. 57 Kan. 785, 48 Pac. 31; Laird v. Farwell, 60 Kan. 513, 57 Pac. 98; Govaski v. Downey, 100 Mich. 429, 59 N. W. 167; Baltimore & Y. Turnp. Road v. Green, 86 Md. 161, 37 Atl. 642; Pressley v. Mobile & G. R. Co. 4 Woods, 569, 15 Fed. 199.

The prosecution must have been instituted without probable cause.

But where no search is made thereunder, one who swears to a search warrant to recover stolen property suspected to be concealed is not liable for malicious prosecution, and this though want of probable cause and malice be shown. Ton v. Stetson, 43 Wash. 471, 86 Pac. 668, 10 Ann. Cas. 369.

In Flora v. Russell, 138 Ind. 153, 37 N. E. 593, judgment in an action for malicious prosecution was affirmed where a search warrant was issued upon an affidavit based upon a mere suspicion communicated to affiant, that one had stolen property missed and had secreted it in his home.

In Krehbiel v. Henkle, 142 Iowa, 677, 121 N. W. 378, in holding that neither actual arrest or seizure, nor express charge of larceny, is essential to a right of action for maliciously suing out a search warrant, the court said: "The essence of the wrong done to him [plaintiff] was the unreasonable invasion of his home, which wrong was aggravated by the charge that stolen goods were there secreted,—thus, at the very least, casting upon him the suspicion of complicity in larceny."

And in Spangler v. Booze, 103 Va. 276, 49 S. E. 42, 1 Ann. Cas. 995, in holding untenable the contention that in an action for malicious prosecution for causing a search warrant to be issued, that plaintiff must aver that he had been tried before a court of competent jurisdiction and been fully acquitted on the merits of the crime with which he is charged, the court said: "When the stolen goods are not found upon the execution of a search warrant, that prosecution is ended. The warrant has served its purpose and falls to the ground. It is, upon its face, conditioned upon the goods alleged to have been stolen being found. Not being found, as in the case at bar, the prosecution inaugurated by the defendant ended, and no further proceedings could be had thereunder."

Recovery cannot be had in an action for malicious prosecution without proof that one, in making a complaint, acted maliciously and without any reasonable or probable cause, where the charge and nature of the complaint is such as does not authorize 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

or justify a justice of the peace in issuing the search warrant. McNellis v. Garthouse, 2 U. C. C. P. 464.

To sustain an action for malicious prosecution in procuring a search warrant to be issued, it is necessary to show want of probable cause, malice, and that criminal proceedings had been determined in favor of plaintiff or abandoned. Ton v. Stetson, 43 Wash. 471, 86 Pac. 668, 10 Ann. Cas. 369.

And in Willis v. Knox, 5 S. C. 474, it was held that in an action for maliciously and without probable cause charging one with larceny, and procuring a search warrant to be issued, and causing the room to be searched thereunder, express malice and actual damage must be proved.

But malice may be inferred from want of probable cause. Carey v. Sheets, 67 Ind. 375.

A corporation may be liable to an action for malicious prosecution where its agent causes a search warrant to be issued without probable cause. Masse v. Dominion Bridge Co. Rap. Jud. Quebec 38 C. S. 429; Flora v. Russell, 138 Ind. 153, 37 N. E. 593; Gulsby v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 167 Ala. 122, 52 So. 392.

Error of magistrate in issuing.

One who merely states the facts of the case to a magistrate, and states them fairly, is not liable in damages for the erroneous view of the magistrate that he had jurisdiction to issue a search warrant. Pring v. Wyatt, 5 Ont. L. Rep. 505, 7 Can. Crim. Cas. 60.

And in Lucy v. Smith, 8 U. C. Q. B. 518, it was said by Robinson, Ch. J., that one who laid a complaint for a search warrant would not be liable for any mistake by a justice in acting upon his information; but Burns, J., in the same case, said, in concurring in the judgment: "I desire, however, not to be understood as deciding as that the action is not sustainable because the defendant went to the magistrate rather as asking his advice and relating to him the facts and placing the matter upon his judgment, whether a warrant should issue or not. . . . If the defendant maliciously

On petition for rehearing

To support an action for a malicious criminal prosecution, the plaintiff must prove, in the first place, the fact of prosecution, and that the defendant was himself the prosecutor, or that he instigated its commencement, and that it finally terminated in acquittal.

He must also prove that the charge preferred against him was unfounded, and that it was made without reasonable or probable cause, and that the defendant, in making or instigating it, was actuated by malice.

Wheeler v. Nesbitt, 24 How. 544, 16 L. ed. 765; Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 117; El Reno Gas & Elec-set the magistrate in motion, I do not see that the want of jurisdiction, and that the magistrate erred, should excuse the defendant from the consequences."

In Hope v. Evered, 16 Cox, C. C. 112, defendant laid an information before the magistrate that she had grounds for believing that plaintiff was detaining in her house her daughter for immoral purposes, and on this information the magistrate issued a search warrant under the crimes act, which authorized such procedure where information is made on oath by one who appears to be acting bona fide in the interest of any woman or girl; and in an action for malicious prosecution, it was held that such acts vests in the justice a judicial as well as a ministerial function, and that if the justice upon the bona fide information of an applicant decides that there are reasonable grounds for suspicion, and issues a search warrant, no action for malicious prosecution will lie against applicant for having given the information to the justice. Lord Coleridge, in his opinion, said: "I do not, however, for a moment suggest that if a person acts in a false and fraudulent manner, or for purposes of malice or oppression, and the magistrate is persuaded that there are reasonable grounds for granting a search warrant, an action would not lie. But if the applicant is acting bona fide, and if the matter is stated fully and fairly to the magistrate, and he comes to the conclusion that there are reasonable grounds for issuing the warrant, then the course taken by the magistrate is a complete answer to any proceedings of this sort."

And Hope v. Evered was followed in Lea v. Charrington, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 461, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 45, 61 L. T. N. S. 222, 16 Cox, C. C. 704, 37 Week. Rep. 736, 54 J. P. 39, where, acting upon information supplied by another, defendant had laid information before a magistrate that he had grounds for believing that plaintiff was detaining in her house a young girl for immoral purposes.

Krehbiel v. Henkle, 142 Iowa, 680, 121 N. W. 378.

And in Olson v. Tveta, 46 Minn. 225, 48 N. W. 914, it was held that proof of a thorough search and the official return to the warrant that the property was not found, and evidence that plaintiff had for a long time borne a good reputation in the community for honesty and integrity, made a prima facie case of want of probable cause.

Notorious bad character for honesty is admissible in evidence to prove probable cause. Miller v. Brown, 3 Mo. 127, 23 Am. Dec. 693.

Messrs. White & Hale, for defendant in error:

The petition states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

It is no defense to this action that the affidavit of the party by whom it was secured did not in law authorize the issuance of the warrant.

Defendant was liable for the acts of its agent.

Robertson, C., filed the following opinion:

This case presents error from the district court of Le Flore county. On February 22, 1909, the defendant, James E. Holliday, who was plaintiff below, and who will hereafter be designated as plaintiff, commenced an action in the district court of Le Flore county against the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, defendant, and hereinafter designated as such. The petition, omitting the caption, is in words and figures as follows:

"Comes now James E. Holliday, the plaintiff herein, and for cause of action against defendant, Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, alleges and states: First. That plaintiff is a resident of Howe, Le Flore county, state of Oklahoma, and that defendant is a foreign corporation, operating lines of railroads through and across Le Flore county, Oklahoma, and having therein an office for the transaction of business, and an agent of the aforesaid company. Second. That said plaintiff, James E. Holliday, is a true and honest citizen of said state and county, and as such has always behaved and conducted himself, and has never been guilty, or until the committing of the grievances by the said Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, hereinafter mentioned, been suspected to have been guilty, of felony or of any other crime; and that before the committing of the several grievances by the said Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, as hereinafter mentioned, the said plaintiff had deservedly obtained and acquired the good opinion and credit of all his neighbors; yet the said Chicago, Rock Island, & less and in disregard of plaintiff's rights. Krehbeil v. Henkle, — Iowa —, 129 N. W. 125.

But in Gulsby v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 167 Ala. 122, 52 So. 392, it was held that a charge that the jury "are authorized to award such damages over and above actual damages, as will be punishment to defendant and serve as example to him and others in the future," was not erroneously refused.

An action can be sustained for an injury done to the character by a malicious application, without probable cause, for a search warrant on the ground that goods had been stolen and were concealed within the person's inclosure. Miller v. Brown, 3 Mo. 127, 23 Am. Dec. 693. The court said: "This action is to redress any damages the plaintiff may have sustained either in his reputation by the scandal, in his person, by imprisonment, or in his property by expense incurred; and it would have well lain upon the mere affidavit of the defendant if made with malice and without probable cause; for, assuredly, an application for a search warrant upon the ground that goods have been stolen and are concealed within the person's inclosure is a sufficient scandal to the reputation, to sustain an action as to this ground."

Twenty-five hundred dollars is not excessive in an action for maliciously causing a search warrant to be issued, which resulted in compelling plaintiff, a young woman, to disrobe herself before a constable and to let him rummage with his fingers in her hair. Doane v. Anderson, 39 N. Y. S. R. 913, 15 N. Y. Supp. 459. J. H. B.

Pacific Railway Company, acting by and through its officers and agents, and more particularly through one J. M. Grimes, well knowing the premises, but contriving and maliciously intending to injure said plaintiff in his good name, fame, and credit, and to bring him into public scandal, infamy, and disgrace, and to impoverish, oppress, and ruin him, heretofore, to wit, on the —day of January, 1909, without any probable cause whatever, charged him, the said James E. Holliday, before J. M. Rooney, justice of the peace within and for Howe township, said county and state, with feloniously stealing certain meat belonging to said defendant, and with having said stolen articles concealed in the house where said plaintiff dwelt; and that said defendant, Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, acting by and through its officers and agents, maliciously and without probable cause, procured said justice to grant a warrant to search the house of plaintiff. Third. That said justice issued said warrant accordingly, and that during the absence of plaintiff herein, and in the presence of plaintiff's wife and small children, plaintiff's house was searched by one George Barlow, constable of said township, assisted by one —. Fourth. That after said diligent search had been made, and none of the goods searched for found, said George Barlow, constable, as aforesaid, departed from plaintiff's premises, and since that time neither defendant, Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, nor any other person, has further prosecuted plaintiff, and has abandoned said prosecution, and in no wise made reparation for injury done plaintiff. Fifth. That by means of the premises plaintiff has been injured and damaged in the sum of $1,999. Wherefore, the premises considered, the plaintiff prays that he have judgment against said defendant, Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, for said sum of $1,999, and his reasonable costs herein laid out and expended."

The defendant answered as follows: "(1) Defendant denies each and every material allegation in said petition contained. (2) Defendant, further answering, alleges that the said J. M. Grimes had no authority to represent the defendant in matters and things in plaintiff's petition alleged to have been done by him, and that said defendant is in no way responsible therefor. (3) Defendant further alleges that neither it, nor any person authorized to represent it in that behalf, caused the process mentioned in plaintiff's petition to be issued or served. Wherefore defendant prays judgment."

Upon the issues thus joined, trial was had, which resulted in a verdict in favor of the L.R.A. (N.S.)

plaintiff in the sum of $1,494.50. Motion for new trial was filed, argued, and overruled, and judgment was entered for plaintiff in the sum found by the jury, and the defendant brings this appeal to reverse said judgment, and relies upon five assignments of error, which, in their order, are as follows: "First. The petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Second. The court erred in admitting the search warrant in evidence. Third. The petition did not charge facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to prevail in an action for malicious prosecution. Fourth. The court erred in overruling defendant's motion to direct a verdict in its favor. Fifth. The court erred in overruling defendant's motion for new trial."

Inasmuch as the first and third assignments embrace practically the same propositions, they will be treated together. The first question presented in the combined first and third assignments of error challenges the sufficiency of the petition. Was the petition sufficient to charge malicious prosecution? In order to properly state a cause of action for malicious prosecution, the petition must allege, first, that a prosecution was commenced against the plaintiff; second, that it was instituted or instigated by defendant; third, that it was malicious; fourth, that it has been legally and finally terminated in plaintiff's favor; fifth, that it was without probable cause. Schrieber v. Clapp, 13 Okla. 215, 74 Pac. 316; Jones v. Finch, 84 Va. 204, 4 S. E. 342; Newell, Malicious Prosecution, page 297. A careful examination of the petition shows that it contains, clearly and succinctly, each and every allegation required by the rule as above laid down by our own supreme court, and is therefore amply sufficient as against the objections urged by the plaintiff in error, and no error was committed by the court in refusing to sustain defendant's motions.

The next assignment urged is that "the court erred in admitting the search warrant in evidence." The only objection made by the defendant to the introduction of the search warrant at the trial was: "The defendant objects to the introduction of the search warrant, for the reason that there was no legal affidavit filed upon which to base the search warrant." Record, page 6. We do not understand that such an objection can be made in a case like this.

In Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. vol. 25, p. 150, it is said: "It is no defense to such an action that the affidavit of the party by whom it was secured did not, in law, authorize the issuance of the warrant."

"A party who maliciously and without probable cause prosecutes another upon a criminal charge cannot . . . avoid his liability by showing that the information or indictment was defective or insufficient, either in substance or form, as that the complaint upon which the plaintiff was arrested did not, in law, charge a criminal offense." Shaul v. Brown, 28 Iowa, 37, 4 Am. Rep. 151.

"In an action on the case for maliciously suing out an attachment against the plaintiff, the defendant cannot raise the objection that the affidavit which he made to procure the attachment, and on which the writ was issued, was insufficient to authorize the issuance of an attachment." Forrest v. Collier, 20 Ala. 175, 56 Am. Dec. 190.

"Procuring a search warrant to be issued may be made the foundation of an action for malicious prosecution, notwithstanding the affidavit on which such search warrant was issued does not charge a crime." Harlan v. Jones, 16 Ind. App. 398, 45 N. E. 481.

And in Cooney v. Chase, 81 Mich. 203, 45 N. W. 833, it was held that the complaint and warrant were admissible, though irregular in form.

The great weight of authority is to the effect that the defendant in an action for malicious prosecution for a wrongful search of a dwelling house will not be permitted to show at the trial that the affidavit or complaint upon which the search warrant issued was defective or insufficient. See, in support of this principle, in addition to the foregoing: Stancilff v. Palmeto, 18 Ind. 321; McCullough v. Rice, 59 Ind. 580; Schattgen v. Holnback, 149 Ill. 646, 36 N. E. 969; Matlick v. Crump, 62 Mo. App. 21; Dennis v. Ryan, 65 N. Y. 385, 22 Am. Rep. 635; Collins v. Love, 7 Blackf. 416. In the case at bar, no objection to the form or sufficiency of the search warrant was made, and the court did not err in permitting it to be introduced in evidence.

The introduction of the search warrant shows, as plaintiff had a right to show, that defendant charged that a burglary had been committed from a car in which certain goods and merchandise in custody of the defendant had been taken, and that the officer to whom it was directed was commanded to search plaintiff's house, and to arrest plaintiff if the goods were found in his possession, and the return of the officer on the back of the warrant showed the time and manner of its execution, together with the result of the search, and the warrant and return thereon were properly identified by the officer who served the same.

By the introduction of the search warrant, the genuineness of which was not in any way disputed, the fact that a search of plaintiff's house had been made by the officer, the authority upon which the search was made together with the result of the search, were made clear. What better way of providing these matters did plaintiff have, and how was defendant prejudiced thereby? The admission of the search warrant in evidence tended merely to establish certain facts alleged in the petition. If this had been the only evidence offered by plaintiff in support of those allegations, objection might well have been made, and, no doubt, the ruling of the court would have been different. It was competent evidence, and went to the jury for what it was worth, together with all the other facts and circumstances appearing in evidence at the trial, and under proper instructions by the court. The jury gave it such weight and credit as it was entitled to, and no error was committed by the court in permitting it to be identified and introduced.

"To show the institution of the proceedings complained of, the original record, or a duly certified copy thereof, is admissible, and is in general the only competent evidence of the fact, unless a foundation is laid for secondary evidence. For this purpose, and also to show the defendant's connection with the prosecution, the affidavit or complaint on which the warrant issued and the warrant itself are frequently introduced." 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 694.

"In an action for malicious prosecution against the prosecutor and the justice before whom the proceedings were instituted, the affidavit and warrant issued thereon are competent evidence." Cooper v. Turrentine, 17 Ala. 13.

"In an action for maliciously prosecuting the plaintiff for a criminal offense, the affidavit on which the warrant for the arrest issued is admissible evidence for the plaintiff, if it authorized the warrant." Turpin v. Remy, 3 Blackf. 210.

"A charged B before a justice with having committed perjury on a trial between them in a justice's court, upon which charge a warrant issued against B, and he was thereon arrested. For this arrest, B brought an action of malicious prosecution against A. Held, that the original affidavit and warrant were admissible evidence for the plaintiff." Conduit v. Dicken, 3 Blackf. 216.

"In a suit for malicious prosecution, the petition alleged the arrest, etc., of plaintiff under process issued upon affidavit and complaint of defendant charging plaintiff with knowingly cutting and carrying away timber from land not his. . . . Upon the trial, the affidavit was introduced, and, over objection, the capias and bond in the case, in which plaintiff was charged with theft. Held, that there was no variance, . . . as affecting the liability of the party making the complaint that the proceedings may not have been strictly regular." Cooper v. Langway, 76 Tex. 121, 13 S. W. 179.

Nor do we agree with counsel for defendant that the introduction of the search warrant was for the sole purpose of proving the result of the criminal proceedings against plaintiff. The rule announced in Sweeney v. Perney, 40 Kan. 102, 19 Pac. 328, also in Casey v. Sevaton, 30 Minn. 516, 16 N. W. 407, correctly states the law, but in both cases cited the judgment of acquittal was urged and relied upon by the plaintiff as a final adjudication of the controversy in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant. No such contention is made in this case, but the question of the determination of the prosecution was submitted to the jury, with other questions; and, while the evidence thereon is not as strong and satisfactory as it might have been yet the jury was satisfied, and, no objections to the instructions of the court in thus submitting it having been made, we are not disposed to disturb the finding of the jury on the subject, nor to criticize the action of the court in admitting the search warrant in evidence.

The fourth assignment of error, to our mind, presents the only real question in this case, viz.: "Did the court err in overruling the defendant's motion to direct a verdict in its favor?" Defendant insists that the refusal to direct a verdict was error, because: "(1) That no such agency was shown to exist between the defendant and witness J. M. Grimes as to fix liability upon the defendant for his actions. (2) That it was not shown that there was a want of probable cause. (3) That the existence of malice was not established by the evidence. Let us examine these grounds in their order.

The testimony of the agent Grimes, which is all the testimony in the record bearing on the question of agency, is as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. White: Q. State your name.

A. J. M. Grimes.

Q. Where do you live?

A. I live at Howe.

Q. What is your business?

A. Well, I am agent of the C. R. I. & P. Railroad Company.

Q. Agent for the Chicago, Rock Island Railroad Company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You were agent of the Rock Island Railroad Company during the month of January of this year, Mr. Grimes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that your signature? (Handing witness original information. Witness examines affidavit.)

A. Yes, sir.

Q. As agent for the C. R. I. & P. Railway Company, what are your duties?

A. Well, I have various duties. I don't know as I could tell you all the duties I do have.

Q. The station is in your charge, is it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. The goods of the company are transferred under your charge, and under your protection?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. The goods in transit in the freight yards are under your care and supervision?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In what capacity for yourself, or for the C. R. I. & P. Railway Company, did you make that affidavit? (Defendant objects. There is no proof that he was authorized to make that affidavit by his employers, or that it came in the scope of his authority.)

By the Court: You might as well settle that now.

By Mr. White: Q. Whose goods were you attempting to recover on the 26th day of January? (Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.)

By the Court: I will let him answer the question. (Objection overruled. Defendant excepts.)

A. The goods belonged to Dawson and Echols, of Little Rock.

Q. In whose care and custody were these goods at the time they were stolen?

A. They were in mine, I suppose, as agent of the C. R. I. & P. Railway Company.

Q. They were goods in transit, being shipped by the C. R. I. & P. Railway Company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, then, for whom were you attempting to recover the goods that had been stolen?

A. Well, do you want me to state the case?

Q. I want you to state, in other words, were the goods for your own personal use, or to be returned to the Rock Island Railroad Company?

A. To be returned to the C. R. I. & P. R. Co.

Q. I want to ask him now for whom he signed the original affidavit? It is signed by him as agent of the C. R. I. & P. Railway Company. (Defendant objects to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, for the reason it is not proof to show what his authority was.)

By Mr. White: We can also show that he was at that time engaged, as he thought, in the service of the company. Now we have shown that in his official capacity as agent of the C. R. I. & P. Railway Company he has the property charged to have been stolen in his possession as agent; that he has charge of that property, and it is his duty to protect that property.

By the defendant: He is not charged with that.

By the Court: He is agent of the company, and if he hasn't testified to it already he possibly would.

By Mr. Day: Q. Do you say you had the meat at the station?

A. In a car out in the yard.

By the Court: Q. Was that car registered when it passed through your station? Did you register it, or take any list of it, or anything of the kind?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You did that?

A. Yes, sir.

By the Court: I think I will let you ask the question. (Defendant excepts.)

By Mr. White: Q. By whom and in what capacity did you sign that affidavit?

A. Well, I signed it in the capacity as agent, but I had no authority from my superior officers to do it. I signed it as agent of the company. I had no authority for that.

Q. You had no written authority to do it.

A. No, sir. I had no written authority.

Q. But, if I understand your statement, you did that as agent of the C. R. I. & P. Railway Company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And not for yourself?

A. No, sir; not for myself.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Day: Q. You say you had no authority whatever from your superior officers to make that affidavit to search for that meat?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have any other kind of authority, written or otherwise?

A. No, sir; I didn't have any written authority of any kind, only what I found.

Q. What was that?

A. The salt I found.

Q. You didn't understand my question, Mr. Grimes. Did you have any authority of any kind? You said you had no written authority from your superior officers. Did you have any authority of any kind to institute searches for the company?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did that come within the scope of your authority?

A. No, sir; I don't think it did. We have circulars from the company with information of that kind.

Q. Does not come within the scope of your authority?

A. No; legal matters do not.

Q. Then I understand you say you had no authority to institute searches, make complaints against the railroad company?

A. I didn't have any in that case.

Q. Have you in any case, unless the authority comes special?

A. I don't think I would on an occasion like that.

Q. And you were given no authority to do that?

A. No, sir; I wasn't given any authority.

This evidence, if it proves anything, shows that Grimes was the agent of the defendant at Howe; that as such agent the goods of the defendant, transferred and in transit, were in his care, custody, and supervision; that he was engaged, at the time the search warrant was issued, in the service of the defendant; that the goods had been stolen from the company, and said goods, at the time they were stolen, were in his care, custody, and supervision, and at the time he caused the search warrant to be issued he was trying to locate and recover back for the defendant company, not for himself personally, the goods, which it was his duty, as such agent, to care for and protect. These salient points are nowhere in the record denied; in fact, they stand admitted. Now, was he acting within the scope of his duties when he signed the affidavit as the agent of the defendant company?

We are not unmindful of the difficulties to be encountered in the solution of this question. There is an amazing lack of uniformity in the decisions of courts on this question, yet, after a critical examination of the cases, we are inclined to the view presented by counsel for defendant in error that there is in all the reported cases "a marked distinction, in the liability of the master for the act of his servant, between those cases wherein the result of the act of the servant was to inflict punishment upon the offender, or to vindicate justice, and those cases wherein the servant was attempting to protect the master's property, which was under his care and supervision, or to recover this property back after it had been taken." Defendant in error's brief, page 8.

"The later decisions, however, incline to the rule making the principal liable for acts of the agent done within the scope of his employment, though they be wanton or malicious." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1156, and the many cases there cited. Also: "It seems to be the better doctrine that, where a prosecution which is maliciously instituted by an agent of a corporation is in the line of his duty, for the purpose of benefit to his principal, and not for any object personal to himself, the corporation will be held responsible." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1157.

It has been held in Missouri that, where an express agent, charged with the duty of protecting property and collecting charges thereon, attempts to collect charges on property unlawfully taken without payment of the charges, and in such attempt, as agent, mistakenly institutes a criminal prosecution without probable cause, the principal will be liable in an action for malicious prosecution, though, where the agent acts as a citizen, and for the purpose of vindicating justice, the rule is otherwise. Cameron v. Pacific Exp. Co. 48 Mo. App. 99; Gillett v. Missouri Valley R. Co. 55 Mo. 315, 17 Am. Rep. 653.

"A private corporation, like an individual, is liable for the acts of its agents in instituting a malicious prosecution authorized or ratified by the corporation, or within the scope of the authority conferred." Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Assn. v. Stewart, 167 Ind. 544, 79 N. E. 490; Cooley, Torts, pp. 200-205; 10 Cyc. 1203, 1208, 1211, 1217; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 691, 692; Pennsylvania Co. v. Weddle, 100 Ind. 138; American Exp. Co. v. Patterson, 73 Ind. 430; Markley v. Snow, 207 Pa. 447, 64 L.R.A. 685, 56 Atl. 999; Carter v. Howe Mach. Co. 51 Md. 290, 34 Am. Rep. 311.

There is a marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony or recovering it back, and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for that which has already been done. 1 Clark & S. Agency, p. 1087.

In Staples v. Schmid, 18 R. I. 224, 19 L.R.A. 824, 26 Atl. 193, the supreme court of the state of Rhode Island, in discussing this subject, says: "It remains to apply these principles to the case at bar. The servant in this case was left with an assistant in charge of his master's store. His ordinary duties undoubtedly were to show goods, and to sell them to customers. It was, however, equally his duty to protect his master's property from pilfering. The acts complained of were evidently done with that intention. The arrest was for the purpose of searching for and recovering the master's property, not with the object of punishing crime against the public. The establishment was not a railroad station, where the multiplicity of employees confines each one to a narrow round of duties, where special officers are stationed to preserve order and detain criminals; nor a large dry goods emporium, where detectives and watchmen are employed to guard against thieves. The servant here was salesman and custodian in one. Whatever the master might do in the protection of his property, he expected his servant to do in his absence. If the servant had seen the plaintiff take up and secrete the package of spoons in question, and had allowed her to walk away with them unmolested, could anyone say that he had not been derelict in his duty to his master? If, in the performance of this duty, he mistook the occasion for it, or exceeded his powers, or employed an improper degree of compulsion, the mistake and the excess must be answered for by the master." And, following the rule as announced, the supreme court of Minnesota, in Smith v. Munch, 65 Minn. 256, 68 N. W. 19, says: "While there is much conflict in the decisions as to when a master is liable for the intentional torts of his servant, yet the tendency of the modern authorities is to extend the liability of the master in such cases; and the general rule may now be said to be that a master is responsible for the torts of his servant done with a view to the furtherance of the master's business, whether the same be done negligently or wilfully, but within the scope of his agency. The fact that the servant, in committing the tort, may have exceeded his actual authority, or even disobeyed his express instructions, does not alter the rule. We think that the facts of the present case bring it within this rule."

The supreme court of North Carolina, in Jackson v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 139 N. C. 347, 70 L.R.A. 738, 51 S. E. 1015, says: "In this case the jury have found that the defendant, by its servant, caused the plaintiff to be unlawfully arrested, for the purpose of putting him out of the way, so that its agents and servants might erect telephone and telegraph poles on his land. If this is not an act done in the course of the employment, and in the furtherance of the master's business, for his benefit and advantage, it would be hard to conceive of one which would come under that class."

And a case very much in point is Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Boyce, reported in 36 Kan. 350, 59 Am. Rep. 571, 13 Pac. 609, wherein the rule in this class of cases is stated as follows: "To make the corporation responsible, it is not necessary, as plaintiffs in error contend, that the principal should have directly authorized the particular wrongful act of the agent, or should have subsequently ratified it. Judge Story, in treating of the liability of principals for the acts of their agents, says that 'the principal is held liable to third persons in a civil suit for the frauds, deceits, concealments, misrepresentations, torts, negligences, and other malfeasances or misfeasances and omissions of duty of his agent in the course of his employment, although the principal did not authorize or justify or participate in, or, indeed, know of, such misconduct, or even if he forbade or disapproved of them,' and to sustain this [case] he cites numerous authorities. 'In all such cases,' he says, 'the rule applies, respondeat superior, and it is founded upon public policy and convenience, for in no other way could there be any safety to third persons in their dealings either directly with the principal, or indirectly with him through the instrumentality of agents.' Story, Agency, 452." See, also, Moore v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 26 Okla. 682, 110 Pac. 1059.

The third ground of the motion to direct a verdict is "that the existence of malice was not established by the evidence." Malice may be inferred from want of probable cause. It is an inference which the jury may or may not draw from the want of probable cause. To be sure, there was no express malice shown, but plaintiff was not required to prove express malice, in the ordinary significance of the term. To prove malice sufficient to warrant a verdict, the ill-will, hatred, or resentment of defendant toward plaintiff may be inferred by the jury from want of probable cause, or other good reason. The question was fairly submitted to the jury under proper instructions by the court. By the verdict, the jury found that there was malice in the bringing of the criminal prosecution, and it is not for us to say that they were mistaken.

The fifth assignment of error raised by defendant in its brief, "that the court erred in overruling defendant's motion for a new trial," is, in our opinion, untenable; the only serious contention of counsel seeming to be that the finding of the jury was made under the influence of passion and prejudice. This we do not think is the case. Plaintiff, as shown by the testimony, was an honest, law-abiding citizen; he had never been charged or accused of a crime before this; he was by this proceeding subjected to great humiliation and disgrace, and his house was put into great disorder and confusion by the unwarranted search; suspicion among his friends and neighbors was necessarily cast upon him by the wrongful acts of defendant; the privacy of his home was interfered with, and his family made to endure the shame and disgrace which always attend such acts. The damages assessed doubtless exceeded the injury done to the goods; but the jury, as it has a right to do, assessed the damages with reference to the feeling of plaintiff and the disturbance of his family. Plaintiff made out at least a prima facie case, and the questions were submitted to the jury under proper instructions by the court, and 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

no objections were made in defendant's brief to the same, and it is presumed, therefore, that they were satisfactory to it.

After a careful investigation of the whole record, we fail to find error which would warrant a reversal, and the judgment of the District Court of Le Flore County should therefore be affirmed.

DR. J. C. MINOR, Appt.,

v.

C. W. MAPES.

(— Ark. —, 144 S. W. 219.)

Automobile — speeding past standing street car — negligence.

1. The driver of an automobile may be found to be negligent in running his machine at a speed of 10 or 12 miles an hour, on the parallel track past a street car which he has overtaken after it has stopped to discharge passengers from the front door, without taking precautions to ascertain if passengers will attempt to cross in front of the car, where there is a space of 60 feet between the car and the curb which the driver might have used.

Highway — crossing past street car — lookout for vehicles.

2. The jury must determine whether or not a passenger who alights from a street car is negligent in attempting to cross the street in front of a standing car without looking to see if vehicles are coming on the parallel track which may render the crossing dangerous.

Husband and wife — liability for wife's negligence — driving automobile.

3. A man riding with his wife in her automobile, which she is driving, is answerable for injuries negligently inflicted by her upon pedestrians.

Appeal — nonjoinder of parties — first objection.

4. Failure to join a woman in an action to hold her husband liable for injury inflicted by her in driving an automobile cannot be questioned for the first time on appeal.

Kosminsky v. Goldberg, 44 Ark. 401.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee sued appellant in the circuit court of Garland county to recover damages on account of personal injuries resulting from alleged negligence on the part of appellant in driving an automobile, or causing it to be driven, along Central avenue in the city of Hot Springs. Appellant and his wife were in the machine at the time, the latter driving. Appellee alighted from a street car, at the front end of it, which was customary, and started across the track in front of the car to go to the opposite side of the street. He hesitated at first, but the motorman told him to go ahead, and he proceeded to cross. As he stepped beyond the end of the car, the automobile, which was running at a speed of 10 or 12 miles per hour, struck him and knocked him down. He was just stepping on the other track, about 4 feet from the street car, when the automobile struck him. It was a rainy day, and he had his umbrella raised and was walking rapidly. He testified that the street car obstructed the view down the street, and that as he passed the car he looked down the street, but did not see the automobile approaching, and failed to see it until too late to get out of the way. There was a space of 60 feet between the street car and the other side of the street. Appellant testified that he purchased the machine and gave it to his wife for her own use; that she drove it herself, and that he never attempted to drive and knew nothing about handling a machine of that kind. There was testimony to the effect that appellant paid the city vehicle license fee for operating the machine. The verdict was in appellee's favor for recovery of damages.

It is insisted that the evidence fails to establish negligence on the part of appellant, and that the undisputed evidence shows negligence on the part of appellee which bars recovery. We think that on both of those issues the verdict is sustained by sufficient evidence.

The machine was being operated at a rapid rate of speed, unnecessarily near the street car, though there was abundant space further out in the street for the machine to pass along. It was customary for passengers to alight from the front end of street cars, and it was reasonably to be anticipated that they might pass in front of a car going to the other side of the street. The jury was warranted in finding that it constituted negligence for an automobile driver to run the machine at a rapid speed so near a street car which had stopped for passengers to alight. Automobilists and the drivers of other vehicles have the right to share the streets with pedestrians; but they must anticipate the presence of the latter, and exercise reasonable care to avoid injuring them. Care must be exercised commensurate with the danger reasonably to be anticipated. Gregory v. Slaughter, 124 Ky. 345, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1228, 124 Am. St. Rep. 402, 99 S. W. 247.

The question of contributory negligence on the part of appellee was one for the jury, and was properly submitted. It cannot be held that the failure of a pedestrian upon a public street to look up and down the street before crossing constitutes, under all circumstances, negligence as a matter of law. There is no statute or rule of law which raises a presumption of negligence from the failure of a pedestrian, on a public street, not at a railroad crossing, to look. The rule is that a pedestrian, having equal rights with others to the use of the streets, must exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and this is generally a question for the jury to say whether such care has been exercised. Millsaps v. Brogdon, 97 Ark. 469, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1177, 134 S. W. '632.

It is next insisted that, according to the undisputed evidence, appellant did not own the machine or control it, but was merely riding therein with his wife, who was driving, and that for that reason no liability on his part is established. It is contended in other words, that, it being shown affirmatively that the wife was not acting under the compulsion of the husband, he is not responsible for negligence on her part which caused the injury. In this contention learned counsel are mistaken as to the law on the subject. At common law the husband was liable for torts committed by the wife, whether committed in or out of his presence, or whether committed at his command or not. Such is the law in this state now. Kosminsky v. Goldberg, 44 Ark. 401; Jackson v. Williams, 92 Ark. 486, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 840, 123 S. W. 751. The only difference is that, where the tortious act is committed in the immediate presence and under the direct compulsion of the husband, the wife is not liable and the husband alone is liable. In other instances, where the tort is committed in the absence of the husband, or, if in his presence, without any control or compulsion on his part, the husband and wife are jointly liable and 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) must be joined in the action; the liability of the husband ceasing upon the dissolution of the marriage relation. Kosminsky v. Goldberg, supra.

No question was raised below as to the failure to join the wife as defendant in the action, and that question must be deemed as waived, and cannot be raised here for the first time. Townsley v. Yentsch, 98 Ark. 312, 135 S. W. 882.

But aside from the question of the husband's common-law liability for torts of the wife, we are of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding negligence on the part of appellant. The rule is that where one who rides in a public conveyance, or merely upon the invitation of some third party, and exercises no control over the driver, and is not guilty of any positive act of negligence, the negligence of the driver cannot be imputed to him so as to render him liable for injuries to another person. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. McFall, 75 Ark. 30, 69 L.R.A. 217, 86 S. W. 824, 5 Ann. Cas. 161; 1 Thomp. Neg. 502; Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 652, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Steinbrenner, 47 N. J. L. 161, 54 Am. Rep. 126. This rule cannot, however, be extended so as to afford an avenue for the husband's escape from liability on account of negligent act of his wife or minor child with whom he is driving in an automobile or other vehicle. He is presumed to exercise some control over them under those circumstances, at least to the extent of preventing an act of negligence which is calculated to result in injury to other persons, and it is his positive duty to do so. In this instance the husband was sitting beside his wife, who was driving the machine, and whatever danger there was in driving too near the street car was as obvious to him as it was to her. He needed no knowledge or experience in the operation of the machine in order to apprise him of such a danger. To say that the husband was not liable for the negligent act of the wife committed under those circumstances would be to absolve him entirely from any duty to fellow travelers.

The court gave an instruction which is in conflict with some of the views we here express; but as it was in appellant's own favor, and the verdict, notwithstanding that, was against him, he cannot complain of it.

We are of the opinion that the verdict was supported by the evidence, and it is not contrary to any rule of law applicable to the facts of the case.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

LUCY PAYNE.

(— Ark. —, 146 S. W. 487.)

Negligence — pathway — alteration — duty to licensee.

A railroad company in cutting, for drainage purposes, a ditch across a path on its right of way, which has been used by the public for many years, is under no obligation to leave it safe for licensees, so as to render it liable for injury to one who, in attempting to use the path in the dark, falls to his injury from a pile of dirt left in the path.

(April 15, 1912.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Logan County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been due to the negligent construction of a ditch across a pathway which plaintiff was attempting to use. Reversed.

Statement by Wood, J.:

Appellant, in order to drain its right of way, dug a ditch across a footpath on its right of way that had been used by the public with appellant's permission for ten years. Appellant put piles of dirt in the roadway 5 or 6 feet wide and 2 or 3 feet high. The appellee on the night of the injury had walked to church on the pathway and had crossed over the piles of dirt, and noticed same. On her return she was afraid of getting hurt at the place where the dirt was piled, so she went down the railroad track till she got past where she thought the dirt was, but she was mistaken, and went down off the railroad track on top of the dirt, and fell off the pile and was injured. The night was extremely dark, and there were no lights there.

Appellee sued appellant for damages on account of the injury, alleging that appellant was negligent in failing and refusing to level down the piles of dirt, and in failing and refusing to place lights or other signals to warn appellee of the danger, and that appellee's injury was caused by such negligence. Appellant admitted that there was a trail on its right of way, but denied that it owed the public any duty to keep it clear of dirt. It admitted that for some considerable time there had been piles of dirt in the pathway, but denied that appellee was unaware of it, and denied that it owed her any duty to advise her of it. Appellant alleged that, if appellee was injured, her injury was the result of her own negligence.

The court gave the following instructions on its own motion:

"If the public, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant, used for a long

Note. — Duty of owner of land which licensees are accustomed to cross, to guard against injuries in consequence of changes in the conditions.

As to duty to member of public on private way used by public generally, see notes to Stevens v. Nichols, 15 L.R.A. 459, and Bowler v. Pacific Mills, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 976.

As to duty of owner of premises to protect licensee against hidden danger, see notes to Watson v. Manitou & P. P. R. Co. 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 916.

As to duty to trespasser with respect to excavations maintained on uninclosed land near highway, see notes to Lepnick v. Gaddis, 26 L.R.A. 686, and Johnson v. Paducah Laundry Co. 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 733.

The earlier cases on this subject are collected in the note appended to Habina v. Twin City General Electric Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1126.

In Brinilson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 144 Wis. 614, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 359, 129 N. W. 664, it was held that a railroad company is liable to a mere licensee who is injured by falling into a steam pit which it maintains under a wooden pathway which the public is accustomed to use, where it permits a hole to remain in the covering, through which users are likely to fall, which 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) is obscured from general observation by the steam emerging through the cracks.

So a landowner who, without objection, has permitted the public to cross his lands by a well-defined path for a long period of time, and with knowledge that people were accustomed to travel over it both by day and night, is liable for injury to one who after dark attempts to cross it and falls into an unguarded excavation. Hanson v. Spokane Valley Land & Water Co. 58 Wash. 6, 107 Pac. 863; Phipps v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 161 Fed. 376.

But in Fox v. Warner-Quinlan Asphalt Co. 204 N. Y. 240, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395, 97 N. E. 497, it was held that the landowner was under no duty to guard an excavation near the path, though it rendered the way unsafe for travelers.

And in East Hill Cemetery Co. v. Thompson, — Ind. App. —, 97 N. E. 1036, a right of action was denied for injuries sustained by reason of the defective condition of a bridge in a cemetery which plaintiff entered for the purpose of inspection and pleasure at a time when the rules of the cemetery association provided that the gates should be open for visitors to enter, on the ground that the cemetery association owed plaintiff no duty except to protect him from active negligence. A. L. R.

time a road or path along, across, and near its right of way, and with the knowledge, permission, and acquiescence of the defendant was doing so at the time of the injury complained of, and if the defendant caused or allowed its servants to negligently deposit and leave in such road or path a large pile or large piles of dirt, so as to make such road or path dangerous to persons using the same with due care, then, if plaintiff was traveling along said road or path, and using due care for her own safety, and was caused to fall and suffer injury by reason of such pile or piles of dirt in the road or path, if any, you should find for the plaintiff, otherwise you should find for defendant.

"The defendant is not an insurer of the safety of persons traveling along, across, or upon its right of way and premises, and owes them no duty except not to wilfully or wantonly injure them, unless such persons are invited or licensed by defendant to be there. In such latter case it owes them the duty of exercising ordinary and reasonable care for their safety."

Also the following prayer of appellee:

"If the defendant permitted the public to use a road or pathway along and upon its right of way for a long period of time with its knowledge and acquiescence, and had not revoked such license, then the plaintiff, while traveling such road or pathway, would be there upon the implied invitation of the defendant, and it would owe to her ordinary care to prevent her from being injured while traveling such road or pathway."

The court refused to instruct a verdict for appellant.

Appellant duly reserved its exceptions to the rulings of the court, and duly prosecutes this appeal from a judgment in favor of appellee.

Messrs. Thomas S. Buzbee and George B. Pugh, for appellant:

Even if appellee had been a licensee by invitation, she would not be entitled to recover if she knew of the obstruction.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Forbes, 63 Ark. 427, 39 S. W. 63; Bruker v. Covington, 69 Ind. 33, 35 Am. Rep. 204.

The mere use of the pathway on the appellant's right of way by the public, for its own convenience and benefit, without any benefit to the appellant, even though continued for a long time, cannot be said to be by invitation.

Schuessler*, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 410, 120 S. W. 1149.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The undisputed evidence shows that appellee was a mere or bare licensee. She was using the footpath upon appellant's right of way for her own convenience, and not for any purpose connected with the business of appellant, or for the common interest or mutual benefit of appellant and appellee. Appellant did no affirmative act to compel or induce appellee to use the footpath upon its right of way. It merely acquiesced in such use by appellee and the public. Under such circumstances, it cannot be said that there was any implied invitation upon the part of appellant for the use of its right of way by appellee. Appellant therefore did not have to exercise ordinary care to make the pathway safe for appellee. As appellant had done nothing that could be construed as an invitation to appellee and the public to use its right of way for a footpath, appellant was not negligent because, in draining its right of way, it failed to exercise ordinary care to make and leave the footpath safe for appellee. In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Dooley, 77 Ark. 561, 92 S. W. 789, we said: "The bare permission of the owner of private grounds to persons to enter upon his premises does not render him liable for injuries received by them on account of the condition of the premises." In Arkansas & L. R. Co. v. Sain, 90 Ark. 278, 285, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 910, 119 S. W. 659, 662, we said: "To bare licensees railroad companies owe no affirmative duty of care, for such licensees take their license with its concomitant perils." Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Pankhurst, 36 Ark. 371; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 57 Ark. 16, 18 L.R.A. 110, 38 Am. St. Rep. 217, 20 S. W. 545; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Tomlinson, 69 Ark. 489, 64 S. W. 347; Holart-Lee Tie Co. v. Keck, 89 Ark. 122, 116 S. W. 183; Wright v. Boston & A. R. Co. 142 Mass. 296, 7 N. E. 866; Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463, 31 N. E. 128; 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1249; Galveston Oil Co. v. Morton, 70 Tex. 400, 8 Am. St. Rep. 611, 7 S. W. 756. The cases of St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Dooley, 77 Ark. 561, 92 S. W. 789, supra; Missouri & N. A. R. Co. v. Bratton, 85 Ark. 326, 108 S. W. 518, and Moody v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 89 Ark. 103, 131 Am. St. Rep. 75, 115 S. W. 400, relied upon by appellee, do not support her contention.

As we have seen, the opinion in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Dooley recognizes the rule here announced, and in that case the judgment was sustained because there was evidence to warrant the finding that the railway company had invited the plaintiff to use the defective steps that caused her injury. The steps were erected by the defendant for the use and convenience of the public, and had been kept in repair by it to a period "as late as six months before the accident." In Missouri & N. A. R. Co. v. Bratton, 85 Ark. 326, 108 S. W. 518, Bratton had just debarked from the train as a passenger, and was going along the track where passengers had been accustomed to go since the road was built. The roadbed and dump extended to a creek, and a bridge over the creek extended part of the way on the dump of appellant's road. In that case we said: "The jury therefore were warranted in finding that Bratton was on the track of appellant at least by sufferance, if not by implied invitation, and that he was not a trespasser." The facts were sufficient to warrant a finding that Bratton was using the track by implied invitation. In the case of Moody v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. there was evidence tending to prove that the defendant company had obstructed the natural drainage of water from the street, causing it to overflow the sidewalk, which compelled footmen to use the railroad as a path for a number of years. The court excluded the evidence. In holding that the testimony was admissible, we said it would tend "to show that the public was using the railroad track as a highway by at least the implied invitation or permission of appellee," railway company. But in that case the railway company by its affirmative act had compelled the public for a number of years to abandon the sidewalk, and to use its roadbed instead. In Missouri & N. A. R. Co. v. Bratton and Moody v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. supra, the plaintiffs were injured while on the railway track. Since the passage of the act of April 8, 1891, railway companies owe to persons on their tracks, whether there by invitation, or as licensees or trespassers, the duty to exercise ordinary care to keep a lookout for them, but it does not abolish their contributory negligence. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Dingman, 62 Ark. 245, 35 S. W. 219; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Leathers, 62 Ark. 235, 35 S. W. 216. The court, in using the particular language relied on by appellee in the above last mentioned cases, did not have in mind, and was not discussing, the duty of railway companies to persons off of their tracks, but was passing on the question of whether or not the plaintiffs were trespassers, and whether or not their injuries were caused by their own negligence. The facts in the case at bar are entirely different from the facts in those cases.

The court erred in its instructions. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause is dismissed.

The death pending appeal, of one of several attorneys who have agreed to share a contingent fee to be earned by the successful prosecution of a suit, will not deprive his estate of his share of the fee in case the judgment in favor of their client is affirmed, without allowance to the successors for their labor in the appellate court.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Webster County in defendant's favor in an action brought to determine and fix the amount due to the estate of Thomas D. Healy, deceased, out of a contingent fee paid for attorneys' services for the prosecution of a suit. Affirmed.

Note.—The general question of a partner's right to compensation for services rendered to the partnership is covered in the note to Williams v. Pedersen, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 399, cases relating to law partnerships being covered at pages 402, 405.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

This is a controversy over the distribution of attorneys' fees growing out of a contract for a part of the recovery in the case of Wells v. Western Union Teleg. Co. which case finally reached this court, and was disposed of by an opinion reported in 144 Iowa, 605, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1045, 138 Am. St. Rep. 317, 123 N. W. 371. The trial court made a division according to the terms of the contracts entered into between the attorneys, and plaintiffs appeal.

Messrs. Maurice O'Connor and W. L. Bliss for appellants.

Messrs. Healy & Healy, for appellee: A joint undertaking, or joint adventure, or joint enterprise, is not, strictly speaking, a partnership.

Consaul v. Cummings, 222 U. S. 262, 56 L. ed. 192, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 83.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs are attorneys at law, and at the time this controversy arose Senneff lived at Britt, and Kelleher at Ft. Dodge. Thos. D. Healy, now deceased, was also a 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

lawyer living at Ft. Dodge. Plaintiff Senneff was employed by one Wells to prosecute a suit against the Western Union Telegraph Company under an arrangement substantially as follows: "The said plaintiff, John A. Senneff, undertook the prosecution of a suit to be brought for said A. Judson Wells against the Western Union Telegraph Company and B. G. Lyman, and undertook and agreed to prosecute the said suit to a final determination, and, together with such attorneys as he might select to be associated with him, to render and perform all services required in the trial, preparation thereof, appeals, and all other proceedings in any manner connected with such suit, until the final termination of the litigation. By the terms of the said agreement, the said Senneff was to have the right to associate with him such other attorneys as he might select, he informing the said Wells, through his said agent, and representative, that he intended associating with him Thomas D. Healy and D. M. Kelleher; and said Senneff and Wells further so agreed in parol that for all services of attorneys they should be paid the equivalent of one third of the net amount finally recovered or collected in said litigation. The said fee to be so paid to be contingent upon the successful termination of the suit and final recovery and collection of the claim of said Wells for which the suit was to be brought." After making this contract with Wells, Senneff, through correspondence and in various interviews, arranged with Kelleher and Healy to assist in the litigation, with the understanding among all that each should share equally in the contingent fee in the event of ultimate recovery.

The case in which these attorneys were employed had a somewhat remarkable history. The action was first brought by Schriver Brothers and the Commercial Bank of Britt against the telegraph company, in the Federal court for the northern district of Iowa, the law firm of Healy Brothers being the sole attorneys for the plaintiffs therein. Judgment was obtained in the lower court, which was later reversed by the United States circuit court of appeals. Some time during the pendency of this suit, Mr. Kelleher became a partner in the law firm of Healy Brothers and he immediately went to work upon the case. After the reversal the case was again tried in the Federal district court, resulting in a verdict and judgment for plaintiffs. Again the case was appealed, and again there was a reversal. The firms of Healy Brothers and of Healy Brothers & Kelleher did a vast amount of work upon the case, both in preparation for the trial nisi and upon the appeals. After the second reversal, the case rested quietly for a time and during its quiescent stage the firm of Healy Brothers & Kelleher dissolved, Kelleher retiring. About this time Schriver Brothers and the Commercial Bank assigned their claim against the telegraph company to A. Judson Wells, a resident of the state of New York, preliminary to the institution of an action in the state court. Thereupon plaintiff Senneff was employed by Wells to prosecute the action in the local courts under the agreement hitherto set out, and Senneff made the arrangements with Kelleher and Healy as before indicated. Both Kelleher and Healy were very familiar with all the propositions of law and fact involved in the case, because of their prior connection with it. It had been thoroughly briefed for the two appeals, and but a single new question remained open, as will be observed from the opinion disposing of the case in this court. The case went to trial in the district court of Webster county, Iowa, at its January, 1908, term, resulting in judgment for Wells in the sum of $12,000. Upon this trial the case was handled largely by Kelleher and Healy, because of their familiarity with the record and the legal propositions involved. Thereafter the telegraph company appealed the case to this court, and during the pendency of the appeal Thos. D. Healy died, his death occurring in January of the year 1909. Senneff and Kelleher followed the case to this court, preparing an amended abstract, writing the arguments, and making oral arguments here. As will be noticed, the appeal was unsuccessful, and the judgment was affirmed. On July 30, 1908, the attorneys for Wells filed in the office of the district court of Webster county a notice of an attorneys' lien in the sum of $6,000. After the affirmance here, the defendant paid to the clerk of the Webster county district court the sum of $13,420.94, in satisfaction of the judgment against it. The attorneys' lien was released by the surviving attorneys, and the entire fee withdrawn from the clerk's office. After the beginning of this suit, which was to settle the rights of the respective attorneys or their representatives to the fund, one third of the fee going to all, to wit, $1,491.62, was deposited with the clerk to await the decision of the case. Mary L. Healy, the executrix and sole beneficiary under the will of Thos. D. Healy, deceased, was made a party defendant, and as such she insisted that she was entitled to the full one third of the contingent fee, pursuant to the arrangement and agreement between the parties, notwithstanding the death of her husband, Thos. D. Healy, during the pendency of the appeal. On the other hand, plaintiffs say that she is not entitled to the whole thereof, but that it should be charged with some offset, or be subject to some diminution, because of the work done by them after the death of Healy. These are the only questions in the case.

Plaintiffs, who are appellants, insist upon the following propositions:

(1) "Where performance of contract for service of an attorney is interrupted by his death, there can be no recovery on the contract, or for more than that proportion of the contract price which the services rendered bears to the whole services contracted for."

(2) "Where a contingent fee contract is made for services of two attorneys, and one dies, even though the survivor carries on and successfully concludes the litigation with other assistants that he employs, will not entitle a recovery on the original contract. Such contract terminated upon the death of either lawyer whose services were contracted."

(3) "There was no partnership relation between the plaintiffs and Thos. D. Healy, deceased. There was therefore no basis to impute an obligation or duty upon the part of the plaintiffs to perform the services contracted to be rendered by Thos. D. Healy, for the benefit of his estate."

(4) "The award made to the appellee by the lower court was affirmative relief granted on her claim to the full fee, and was unwarranted by the facts."

The main thought underlying each of these propositions is that, as Healy died before the case was finally decided upon appeal to this court, neither he nor his representative is entitled to the full one third of the contingent fee, but that it should be divided in the light of the services performed by plaintiffs after Healy's death. It is true, of course, that these attorneys were not a copartnership; but it is equally clear that after the recovery of the judgment in the trial court, which was before Healy's death, they were jointly interested in that judgment,* and each and all desirous of sustaining it for his own individual benefit. There was at all times a joint adventure, which did not amount to a partnership, but which is governed in many respects by the rules applicable to partnerships. This thought is well expressed in Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N. J. Eq. 185, 74 Atl. 130; Berry v. Colborn, 65 W. Va. 493, 64 S. E. 636, 17 Ann. Cas. 1018; Runkle v. Burrage, 202 Mass. 89, 88 N. E. 577; Botsford v. Van Riper, — Nev. —, 110 Pac. 705.

What, then, are the respective rights of the parties to a joint adventure such as this under the facts disclosed? Did the death of Healy, after the recovery of the judgment, operate to diminish the amount to which he would have been entitled had he lived and presented the case to this court upon appeal? In other words, should the amount which his representative is to receive be diminished because the surviving parties to the joint adventure went ahead with the work, and perhaps did more than they would, had all survived and followed the case to the end? We have no cases upon this proposition, nor have we been able to find any, which are exactly in point. Under our statutes joint tenancies with right of survivorship are not favored, and, although there may be joint ownership or ownership in common of personalty, it makes little difference which we call it in this case, the property does not go to the survivors in case of the death of one or more of the joint owners. Parsons, in his law of Partnership, states the following rules which we regard as applicable to the present controversy: "There is not in partnership the same survivorship as in joint tenancy; but there is a survivorship which is peculiar to partnership. The death of a partner invests the surviving partners with the exclusive right of possession and management of the whole partnership property and business; but only for the purpose of selling and closing the same." Section 344. "Until a settlement, the representatives of the deceased cannot claim or take any one chattel, or any portion of the merchandise. The survivors are, from the death, trustees for all concerned in the partnership, for the representatives of the deceased, for the creditors of the firm, and for themselves. Their trust is to wind up the concern in the best manner for all interested, and therefore without unnecessary delay; and their powers are such as enable them most effectually to execute that trust. Nor do we know any difference, in this respect, as to the choses in possession and those in action. The surviving partners are held strictly as trustees; and their conduct in discharging their trust is carefully looked after by courts of equity. Thus, like other trustees, they cannot sell the property of the firm and buy it themselves; nor, as the converse of this, can they buy from themselves property for the firm. Their trust being to wind up the concern, their powers are commensurate with the trust. Hence, they may collect, compromise, or otherwise arrange all the debts of the firm; and their receipts, payments, and doings generally in this behalf are valid, if honest and within the fair scope and purpose of the trust. And, if there be negligence, delay, misconduct, or gross mistake, equity will interfere, and give the proper relief. It is said that the surviving partners are trustees in part for themselves. But while as trustees they have all power and possession, they stand as cestuis que trustent on the same footing as the others, or, rather, must postpone themselves to the creditors of the firm; and only as to what is left after the creditors are paid do they come in on equal terms with the representatives of the deceased, and with each other. And, if there is not enough to pay the debts in full, then, all being equally liable, they must do nothing to disturb or prevent this equality." Section 345, Parsons on Partnership. "The survivors are not bound to continue the business at all; and would probably be permitted to wind it up quite abruptly if they chose not to engage in new transactions for the firm, or even continue old ones, although the new or the old seemed to promise a much better winding up at the close; . . . but if, by such new business, profit is made, the survivors will be bound to account for this profit as belonging to the firm. And, if no profit or even a loss is made, they must be charged with interest on the funds they use, and the whole loss will be theirs. It seems, however, that, if the survivors carry the business on, and make a profit which is credited to the firm, they may be allowed some compensation for their services, unless the articles of agreement provide otherwise. And a surviving partner may be allowed for his time and expenses, under special circumstances justifying such a claim." Parsons, Partn. § 346. In Ames v. Downing, 1 Bradf. 321, the court said: "Nor can Mr. Hicks charge commissions as surviving partner for the collection of the debts. His legal duty was to collect the assets and wind up the business of the firm, a duty the law imposes upon him as an incident to the contract of partnership, and for the performance of which no remuneration is promised or implied. Such a claim is new to me, and I am not aware that it is supported by precedent or authority." See also Beatty v. Wray, 19 Pa. 516, 57 Am. Dec. 677; Brown v. McFarland, 41 Pa. 129, 80 Am. Dec. 598. In Newell v. Humphrey, 37 Vt. 265, compensation was allowed a surviving partner for closing up partly consummated deals; but this was owing to the peculiar facts of the case. Shumaker on Partnership states the law in this wise: "The law imposes upon the surviving partner, as an incident to the contract of partnership, the duty of collecting the assets and winding up the business of the firm, and he is not entitled to compensation therefor, in the absence of an express agreement to that effect." Shumaker, Partn. p. 285. He cites in support of this rule Ames v. Downing, supra, and Young v. Scoville, 99 Iowa, 177, 68 N. W. 670. Com. ex rel. Bracken v. Bracken, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 785, 32 S. In the Young-Scoville Case, 99 Iowa, 177, 68 N. W. 670, we said: "Consequently, it has in many cases been held that the representative of a deceased partner may have the partnership settled and an accounting had as of a date later than the death of his intestate; that to accomplish justice the partnership will be treated as a continuing one, and is to be settled as if there had been no dissolution. Of necessity much depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, and no general rule can be adopted which will fit every controversy of the kind. A court of equity will undertake in this kind of a case to do justice without reference to any settled, fixed, and inflexible rule. Parsons, Partn. 4th ed. § 415. See Lindley, Partn. Ewell's ed.  981, 1046, Story, Partn. § 343; Taylor v. Hutchinson, 25 Gratt. 544, 18 Am. Rep. 699; Phillips v. Reeder, 18 N. J. Eq. 99, 11 Mor. Min. Rep. 419; Robinson v. Simmons, 146 Mass. 167, 4 Am. St. Rep. 299, 15 N. E. 558, and cases therein cited. According to the facts found by the referee, the parties continued the business of the firm after the death of Mrs. Laing just as they had done before her demise. No change whatever was made by reason of her death, and it seems to us entirely just and equitable to hold, under such circumstances, that the affairs of the partnership should be closed as if she had lived, and were now asking the dissolution of the firm, and the settlement of its business. Appellant has no right to complain of this, for, if he had been so advised, he could have closed up the affairs of the partnership immediately upon the death of Mrs. Laing. As he did not do so, but elected to treat the partnership as continuing, he should be held to account as if it did in fact continue. Another potent reason for adopting this rule is found in the fact that the referee reported that it was impossible to determine with any degree of accuracy the financial condition of the firm at the time of the death of Mrs. Laing. We see no error in the rule adopted by the referee as a basis for the accounting. Again, it is contended that the referee and the court were in error in not allowing Scoville compensation for his services in connection with the business after the death of Mrs. Laing. It seems to us that this contention is determined by the rule last above named. If the partnership, for the purpose of stating the account between the parties, is to be deemed a continuing one, then it is to be treated as if there was in fact no dissolution by death. If this be true, then neither James Laing nor William Scoville can claim anything for their services, as the labor of one was to offset that of the other. It is argued, however, that, as James Laing is not a party to this suit, he is not bound by such rule, and that, if he may in some subsequent suit recover for his services, appellant ought to be allowed for his time and labor. Sufficient it is to say in answer to this argument that we do not think the premises are correct. James Laing and his representative (she now being dead) are clearly estopped from claiming anything for his services rendered to the firm after the death of his wife. There are no facts found by the referee from which an agreement to compensate the appellant for services performed can justly or fairly be inferred; and without any agreement, express or implied, there can be no allowance to either party for labor and services performed for the partnership. Morris v. Griffin, 83 Iowa, 327, 49 N. W. 846; Levi v. Karrick, 13 Iowa, 344; Boardman v. Close, 44 Iowa, 428. It is said, however, that appellant was entitled to compensation as surviving partner for closing up the business. This proposition may well be doubted. Starr v. Case, 59 Iowa, 491, 13 N. W. 645; Bates, Partn. § 772, and authorities cited. But, concede that it is correct, it is not applicable to this case, for the reason that Scoville did not as surviving partner proceed to wind up the business. On the contrary, he continued it under an arrangement with James Laing, the same as if there had been no dissolution, and there was an implied understanding, at least, that each should offset his services as against the other. Under such circumstances, it is clear that no compensation should be allowed to either. Bates, Partn. § 774."

In Starr v. Case, cited in the Young opinion, we have a case nearest in point to any to which our attention has been called. We there said: "The plaintiffs claimed $80 for services rendered by them in three several suits brought by them since the death of Mr. Patterson for the collection of claims due the firm of Starr, Patterson, & Harrison. On motion of the defendants this portion of the petition was stricken out. Of this action of the court the plaintiffs complain. It is conceded that the general rule is that surviving partners are not entitled to compensation for settling the affairs of the partnership. It is claimed, however, that legal services rendered in the prosecution of claims due the partnership constitute an exception to the rule. In support of this position, we are referred to Vanduzer v. McMillan, 37 Ga. 300. That was the case of a mercantile partnership. It was held that one of the members of the firm, who was an attorney, might be entitled to compensation for services rendered by himself in the collection of claims due the partnership. In that case the rendering of legal services was entirely foreign to the business of the partnership. In this case the rendering of such services was the business for which the copartnership was formed. We think there is nothing in this case to make it an exception to the general rule."

The Denver Roane Case, 99 U. S. 355, 25 L. ed. 476, is closely in point. The other cases cited in Shumaker are more or less in point, and we shall not review them. We do not say that in no case is a surviving partner or owner of personal property or choses of action entitled to compensation for services rendered. Much, of course, depends upon the nature of the enterprise, and of the equities of the various parties. But where there is a joint adventure between attorneys, as here, and the survivors proceed with the case to protect their mutual interests, and carry it through to the end, we think the representative of the deceased co-owner or joint owner is entitled to his share of the profits or proceeds of the joint enterprise without diminution. Such seems to be the express holding in the Starr Case, supra. There are no equities here which would justify the application of a different rule. In such cases it would not do to ascertain just what services each of the parties performed, and then say that, as one failed to do all that he should, either by reason of shirking his responsibilities or by reason of death, that neither he nor his representative should have his full proportion of the recovery as specified in the contract. Other considerations lead to the same conclusion; but this opinion has already grown so long that we are not justified in amplifying them.

For the reasons already pointed out, it is apparent that the order of the trial court in decreeing defendant entitled to full amount of the deposit is correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

R. T. STOWE, Appt.,

v.

HOUSTON MORRIS.

(147 Ky. 386, 144 S. W. 52.)

Master and servant — automobile — son — liability of father.

A son who has the right to use an automobile which his father provided for the comfort and pleasure of the family is acting as the servant of the father, so as to make him liable for injuries caused by his negligent act when he takes the car without special permission for the entertainment of his sister and her friends.

(March 6, 1912.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Christian County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligent operation of an automobile by defendant's son. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John T. Edmunds, Southall & Son, and Henry J. Stites for appellant.

Messrs. C. H. Bush and W. T. Fowler for appellee.

Winn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Houston Morris, a child some twelve years of age, in June, 1910, while riding a bicycle, was run down and dragged by an automobile, the property of R. T. Stowe. Both the child's legs were broken, and other injuries were inflicted on him. To recover damages, he brought his action against the owner of the automobile. The jury brought in a verdict in the child's favor for $2,000, and from the judgment on the verdict this appeal is prosecuted.

It suffices to say that there was sufficient evidence before the jury to take the case to them upon the question of the negligence of the driver of the automobile. No serious complaint is made upon this feature of the case; nor is it seriously contended that the damages were excessive, or that there was any error in the admission or rejection of testimony. There is but one question of consequence in the record, and we proceed directly to its discussion.

The car, at the time of the accident, was driven by Robert Stowe, the eighteen-year-old son of the appellant. With him in the car were his sister, Miss Kathleen Stowe, a Miss Henry, who was his first cousin, and a couple of other young ladies, who were friends of his sister. Young Mr. Stowe was a deputy in the office of his father, who was the county clerk of Christian county; but on the day of the accident young Stowe had been to the office, and finding nothing to do, had left without seeing his father. Indeed, he had not seen him at all on that day, as the young man did not arise for breakfast. The father gave him no orders about the use of the car on that day; nor had anything passed between them on that day as to the son's permission or right to use it. He went for the car of his own volition, and at his suggestion his sister and the other young ladies arranged for and went on the ride with him. The car was kept by the father for the comfort and pleasure of his family, including his son and daughter. They had the right to use it as often as and when they liked. The father knew how to run the car; but the son generally acted as the driver. The son himself testified that he took his sister driving when he felt like it, and when he did not feel like it his father drove the machine; that he took her driving when he wanted to; that he took his mother if she wanted to go; and that the machine was used by the family for the pleasure of the family. The father testified that the young man operated the car with his permission, and had the authority and right to use it when he wanted to; that his daughter had the like right; and that it was used as a family vehicle. This brief statement gives a fairly clear understanding of the ownership of the car, its uses, and the relationship of the parties to it, and of the father and son to each other in the use of the car. This brings us to the question in the case, i. e., was the son, under the facts stated and at the time of the injury, a servant or agent of the appellant? If he was, his father is liable. If he was not, his father is not liable.

Note. — The cases passing upon the specific question as to liability of a father for injuries inflicted by his automobile while being used by his child for the latter's pleasure are gathered in the note to Riley v. Roach, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 834, and in the earlier notes there referred to. Generally, to parent's liability for tort of minor child, see note to Broadstreet v. Hall, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 933.

In the first place, it may be said that a considerable part of the discussion of counsel is addressed to the idea that, even though the son was generally the agent or servant of the father in the operation of the car, the father is not liable under the facts stated here, because the son was engaged at the time in an enterprise of his own,—the seeking and giving of pleasure to himself, his sister, and their friends, upon an excursion of his own,—in which the father had no interest, and which was not in the line or scope of the son's employment. The question ordinarily is a vital one in cases of this character; but it is of no consequence here. For the only ground upon which the father can be held answerable for this act of his son excludes the idea of an independent venture, under the facts detailed. That ground is, as contended for by the appellee, that the machine was bought and operated for the pleasure of the family; that, at the time of the accident, the son was engaged in carrying out the general purpose for which the machine was bought and kept; and that, as he took it out at the time in pursuance of general authority from his father to take it when he pleased, for the pleasure of the family and himself as a member of it,—the purpose for which it had been bought,—he was engaged in the execution of his father's business, i. e., the supplying of recreation to the members of the father's family.

In order that our statement may be clear, we again repeat that this is the only basis upon which it is possible to predicate the recovery against the father in the case at bar; for it is established generally that the father is not liable for the torts of the son, committed without his knowledge or authority, express or implied. Nor is it charged in the present case that the father had turned the son loose with a dangerous agency, so that the question of whether that state of fact, if proven, would have rendered the father liable, is not before us. There is the single question stated. We find that the principle has been a good deal discussed in the different states within the few years that motor vehicles have been in current use. The courts are not in harmony. The question is largely a new one in Kentucky; and we have endeavored to arrive at a correct answer, based upon precedent and upon the general principles of law which affect or are ancillary to a just exposition of the law.

The spirit of our determination, it may be remarked, is founded upon a Kentucky case which, though cited but rarely in later Kentucky cases, has been largely cited in the cases from other states, in the text-books, and in the general authority upon the subject. The case is that of Lashbrook v. Patten, 1 Duv. 317. In this case the appellant's minor son, whilst driving, with his father's approbation, the latter's carriage and team, conveying the son's two sisters to a picnic, negligently ran against the carriage of another. An action was brought against the father for the damage. This court said that "the son must be regarded as in the father's employment, discharging a duty usually performed by a slave, and therefore must, for the purposes of this suit, be regarded as his father's servant." The opinion commented upon the fact that the occupants of the carriage were the members of the father's family, and that the journey to the picnic, which, of course, was purely in the pursuit of pleasure, was undertaken with the father's approbation. In the case at bar, the journey was a journey in pursuit of pleasure, of which at least two members of the father's family were the beneficiaries. There had been, it is true, no express consent for the particular journey, but the consent was broader; for it was a consent so general as that it embraced any time and any journey for which the pleasure-seeking young members of the family might see fit to use the car. In consonance with the Kentucky authority named, enlarging the discussion and applying the same principles to the modern automobile, instead of the carriage, the case of Daily v. Maxwell, 152 Mo. App. 415, 133 S. W. 351, decided in January, 1911, upon facts largely similar to those proven in the case at bar, establishes the liability of the father. It is interesting to observe the facts in that case and the conclusions reached, as a growth from the Kentucky case. Mr. Maxwell relied upon his son, a boy of sixteen, to perform the duties of chauffeur to the family. At the time of the accident from which arose that litigation, the son had asked and obtained the consent of the elder Maxwell to take some of his young friends—three girls and a boy—automobile riding. It was the boy's party, and the father had naught to do with it, except to give his consent to the use of the car for the pleasure of his son and his son's friends. The father's liability was made to turn upon the precise question that we have named as the single vital question in this case. The opinion first remarked the entire accord of authority that the owner of a car cannot be held liable in his absence, except that it be shown that the person in charge of the car not only was the owner's servant, but was engaged at the time in his business as well. The opinion then sets out the rule so aptly that we quote from it somewhat at length as an expression of the view which we have reached as the proper view. It says:

"Should we regard the relationship between the two defendants merely as that of owner and chauffeur, master and servant, the owner should not be held liable for the negligence of the chauffeur, since the evidence shows beyond question that the latter was using the machine merely for his own pleasure. But Ernest [the son] was more than a mere chauffeur. He was the minor son of the owner, and was using the car for his own pleasure, it is true, but with the permission of his father, and for one of the very uses for which his father kept the vehicle. The evidence discloses that the machine was devoted to the use of the family of which Ernest was a member. It was a pleasure vehicle, and, when used for the pleasure of one of the minor children of the owner, how can it be said that it was not being used on business of the owner? It is the practice of parents to provide their children healthful and innocent amusements and recreations; and certainly it is as much the business of parentage to supervise and control the pleasures of their children as it is to give them nurture and education. Had Ernest been taking his mother for a pleasure ride, instead of taking some of his young friends, no one would contend that he was not on his father's business; or, had he been using the car on an errand of his own, such as shopping for himself, or going to school, he would have been on his father's business, since it was the duty of his father to support and educate him. The rule that a father is not liable for the torts of his minor child applies only to cases where the tort is committed without the consent of the parent, and without the scope of any duty he owes his child. We conclude that, in running the car with the consent of his father and within the scope of the family uses, Ernest was the agent and servant of his father."

So, in the case at bar, the father had provided his family with this car as a means of recreation and amusement; and the son, in the use of the car for that purpose, was not performing an independent service of his own, but was carrying out what, within the spirit of the matter, was the business of the father.

The case of Moon v. Matthews, 227 Pa. 488, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 856, 136 Am. St. Rep. 902, 76 Atl. 219, is in point. In that case the chauffeur, under the direction of defendant's sister, who made her home with him as a member of his family, had taken the car, and was driving his sister with some of her guests, entirely without the knowledge of the owner. It was remarked that the occupants of the car were the defendant's friends and guests of his sister, and that the errand upon which the car was taken was entirely proper and fitting in itself. The master was held liable. There is other general authority to sustain the same position; but the quotation made from Daily v. Maxwell is so excellent an exponent of our view that we do not enlarge upon the authorities.

It is true that there is authority of a most excellent character in direct conflict with the views which we have set out. Notable among the cases are those of Doran v. Thomsen, 76 N. J. L. 754, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 335, 131 Am. St. Rep. 677, 71 Atl. 296, and Maier v. Benedict, 123 App. Div. 579, 108 N. Y. Supp. 228; but the conclusion reached by us is sustained both by the case of Lashbrook v. Patten, from this court, and by what we believe to be the sounder argument. It is not necessary to protract this discussion of the law by any general consideration of the elementary principles, whether contractual or from custom, which create the relation of master and servant, nor to discuss the general but well-settled liability of the master for the servant's negligence whilst in the furtherance of the master's business.

For the reasons given, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN J. RADEL COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

CHRISTINE BORCHES.

(147 Ky. 506, 145 S. W. 155.)

Carrier — funeral carriages — duty to passengers.

1. Although a contract for carriages for a funeral is made by a member or friend of the family, and the undertaker knows only in a general way the number and names of those who are to be transported, his contract duty of care exists in favor of each passenger.

Master and servant — undertaker — funeral carriages — subcontract — liability.

2. An undertaker who contracts to furnish carriages for a funeral cannot escape liability to an occupant of a carriage injured by negligence of the driver, on the ground that he sublet the contract to an independent contractor, if the employers did not consent to the subcontract.

Same — driver leaving vehicle — running away of team — scope of employment.

3. The owner of a hired vehicle is not relieved from liability for injury to an occupant due to the running away of the horses, by the fact that the driver had left the team to visit a saloon, on the theory that by so doing he was acting outside the scope of his employment.

Evidence — statement of servant after accident — admissibility.

4. In an action to hold the owner of a vehicle liable for injury to an occupant through the driver's negligence, a statement by the driver after the accident is admissible in evidence to contradict statements made by him as a witness.

Same — physician — complaints of persons injured.

5. Evidence is not admissible in an action to hold one liable in damages for personal injuries due to his negligence, to the effect that two months after the accident the injured person complained to his physician that he was suffering from dizziness and sleeplessness.

Note. — The question of who is responsible for acts of a driver of a hired vehicle is covered by a note to Ash v. Century Lumber Co. 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973, and earlier notes referred to therein.

Livery — absence of driver — running away of team — consent of owner — liability.

6. An occupant of a hired carriage cannot hold the owner liable for injury due to the running away of the team during the absence of the driver, leaving the team unattended, if the driver acted at the request, or with the consent, of the occupant.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Campbell County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dempsey & Neiberding, for appellant:

In the ordinary hiring from a livery company of a carriage, horses, and driver, the hirer, who exercises no control over the driver further than a general direction where to go, is not the master or superior of the driver, so as to render such hirer liable in damages to a third person for injuries received through the negligence of such driver.

Parker v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1391, 77 S. W. 1109.

Winn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant is an undertaking concern. On October 5, 1910, it conducted the funeral of one John Lickert. The appellee attending the funeral. Upon the return trip from the cemetery, the driver of the carriage in which appellee was riding, at the direction of one of the occupants of the carriage, stopped in front of the Heidelberg Café. The two men occupants left the carriage and went inside the café. The driver wrapped his lines about the brake and went in also. The team ran away. Mrs. Borches jumped or was thrown from the carriage, and brought her action against the undertaking company to recover for the injuries which she claimed to have received. She recovered a judgment for $597, and the undertaking company appeals.

The plaintiff alleged that the Radel Company had charge of the funeral; that she went to the funeral in a carriage furnished by defendant for that purpose; that the carriage was managed and under the control of defendant, its agents, and employees; and that, by reason of their negligence in leaving the horses unfastened and unattended the runaway and her injuries occurred. The answer did not deny that defendant furnished the carriage, but did deny that it was under the control of the defendant, its agents or employees, or that they were guilty of any negligence, or that the injury occurred. The evidence upon the plaintiff's side of the facts about the furnishing of the carriage, is, in substance, that plaintiff attended the funeral as a relative of the decedent; that she was put into this carriage by a representative of the Radel Company; that a burial association of which decedent was a member had furnished, through the Radel Company, three carriages for the funeral; that the decedent's sister ordered three extra carriages from a representative of the Radel Company, that it was in one of these extra carriages that plaintiff was at the time of her injury; that the bill had been made out by the Radel Company against the estate of the decedent for the extra carriages, and been paid by the decedent's sister. The evidence upon defendant's side upon this question is, in substance, that these carriages were hired for the funeral; that they were hired by a representative of the Radel Company from the Queen City Livery Company, an independent concern; that the Radel Company kept no carriages; that it had no control over the carriage driver; that the livery company sent the carriages, under orders from the undertaker, to the house, thence to the cemetery, and thence back to the house.

We think it clear that, in arranging for the transportation of the decedent's relatives and family, the undertaking company owes the same contract obligation to each of them, though it may not know, save in the most general way, the number and names of those who are to be transported. It is a matter of common knowledge that, in the distressing surroundings of this nature, someone of the family, or some friend of the family, acts for all; and it is right that the obligations, whatever they may be, assumed or owed by the undertaker, should be held as contract obligations owed to all. The two facts stated above, as appearing upon the sides, are not in conflict. But the divergence of position comes in that the plaintiff insists that since the carriages were ordered of the undertaking concern and supplied by it, it, in effect, was the liveryman, and is answerable to the plaintiff not otherwise than as if the carriages had been its own; while the defendant's position is that the carriage was furnished by an independent contractor, the livery company, and that defendant is not responsible for any negligence of the independent concern's servants or agents.

The error in the Radel Company's conception of its case lies in its misunderstanding of the facts. Under the evidence, it undertook to supply the carriages. There is no evidence that in supplying them it was only to act as agent in procuring them, or that they were to be supplied by another or independent contractor, or that it was so understood by those to whom the carriages were to be supplied. Nor was the injury suffered by any third person, as against whom the fact of the independent service could be shown. The rule is clear beyond argument that one who undertakes by contract to do for another a given thing cannot excuse himself to the other for a faulty performance, or a failure to perform, by showing that he has engaged another to perform in his place, and that the fault or failure is that of another or independent contractor. It would be different, of course, if it were shown that the substituted performance, the engaging of another to perform, was with the knowledge and acquiescence of the one with whom he undertook his contract obligation. If it were shown here, to illustrate, that either the plaintiff, or the member of the family who engaged the carriages, knew that the Radel Company would not supply the carriages, or understood or assented that they were to be supplied by another, then the plaintiff's claim would be against that other, unless it should be shown by the evidence, as it was not, that the complete direction, authority, and control of the carriage and its owner were surrendered for the time being to the Radel Company.

The state of fact just supposed, i. e., that it was understood in the contract with the Radel Company that the carriages were in fact to be supplied by another under a hiring by it, would bring the case within the rule argued by appellant, that, in an ordinary hiring from a livery company, the hirer, who exercises no control over the driver further than the right to generally direct where to go, is not the master, so as to render him liable in damages to a third person for injuries received through the negligence of the driver of the vehicle. The appellant's trouble in this respect, as above pointed out, lies in that the plaintiff was not a "third person;" per contra, she was a party to the contract made with the Radel Company where, in so far as the evidence upon the trial disclosed, that company itself was to furnish the carriages. The notes to Frerker v. Nicholson, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1122, illustrate the distinction. The case to which the notes are appended seems to us to be unsound as applied to the facts at bar, in that it treats the occupant of the carriage as a third person, and not as one entering into the contractual relation with the inherent contractual right to look for reasonably safe transportation to the one who, so far as the record disclosed, bore the whole obligation to supply the carriage. The case of Hershberger v. Lynch, 9 Sadler 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) (Pa.) 91, 11 Atl. 642, cited by appellant, was likewise the case of an injury to one driving his own vehicle a third person, who sought to recover from Hershberger, a livery stable keeper, damages for an injury by the latter's carriage which was temporarily engaged in the service of another liveryman. The court held with entire soundness that if the other liveryman only had the temporary control of the vehicle, with the right to its use and route, and without control over its servant, the right to discharge him and the like, Hershberger, and not the other liveryman, would be liable. We believe it would have been ruled differently had the injury been to one who had hired the carriage from the other liveryman, and without his knowledge had been supplied by the other liveryman with a carriage not his own.

The case of Boniface v. Relyea, 38 How. Pr. 457, is much relied upon by the appellant. The opinion sustains his position, save that it is not very clear that the undertaker himself agreed to furnish the teams. The proof rather went to show that he was to have entire superintendence of the funeral, and as such, among other things, was to see that carriages were present. But the fallacy of the argument of the learned judge in that case lies in that he eliminates altogether the contractual relation. He says, by way of illustrating the unreasonableness of the position, that if he were to hire a hackney coach from a public stand, and the driver should negligently injure another, he, the hirer, would be responsible; and it is upon such line of reasoning that he finds the undertaker there not liable. He should have extended his reasoning further. He should have illustrated the real position by putting himself in the position of one who, for hire, was supplying the carriage to another; and then, had the one he had undertaken to carry by contract been injured by the negligence of the driver, he would have more aptly illustrated the facts obtaining in his case. The error of the writer is apparent by the fact that he rests his case largely upon the case of Laugher v. Pointer, 5 Barn. & C. 547, 8 Dowl. & R. 550, 4 L. J. K. B. 309. Had he noted the distinction drawn here he would have observed that in that case the injured person was a third party entirely, who bore no contractual relation either to the owner or hirer of the vehicle.

The case of Little v. Hackett, 118 U. S. 306, 29 L. ed. 652, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391, cited by appellant, is an authority for no other principle than the one conceded here, —that one who hires and uses a public carriage is not responsible for the negligence of the driver, in the absence of complete control and dominion over him. It does not discuss at all the rights of one who contracts from another the right to use a vehicle, and his consequent right, if injured, to recover against that other, in the absence of any knowledge or agreement that the other supplied a vehicle not his own.

In the case of Joslin v. Grand Rapids Ice Co. 50 Mich. 516, 45 Am. Rep. 54, 15 N. W. 887, cited by appellant, Joslin, the plaintiff, was driving his own horse and buggy, and was injured by a collision with a wagon driven by an employee of the ice company. The case nowhere touches the question of a contract right, but purely turns upon the question as to who may be responsible for injury to a third and disinterested person.

The case of Foster v. Wadsworth-Howland Co. 168 Ill. 514, 48 N. E. 163, cited by appellant, is the case of the killing of a child, a third party, and is therefore not applicable here.

The case of Driscoll v. Towle, 181 Mass. 416, 63 N. E. 922, cited by appellant, was the case of a third person injured by the negligent driving of a wagon. The question was as to whether he was entitled to recover against the owner of the wagon and general master of the driver, or against one to whom the wagon and driver had been sublet. There was no element of contract present.

The case of Jahn v. McKnight, 117 Ky. 655, 78 S. W. 862, cited by appellant, was one wherein Jahn, a telegraph messenger boy, while riding his bicycle on the street, had been struck and killed by a delivery wagon drawn by a runaway horse. The wagon in question was under hire to McKnight & Company, by its owner, who was in the habit of letting it out for hauling. In an effort to recover against McKnight & Company, it was held that under this state of fact the driver of the wagon was not the servant of McKnight & Company, and that there was no liability on their part for his negligence.

And so in all the vehicle cases to which our attention has been invited, or which we have examined upon our own initiative, with the possible exception of the Boniface Case and the Frerker Case, the injury was done to some third person, where there was an entire absence of any duty owed under contract. It may be that at the time the arrangements were made for the funeral, it was understood that in furnishing the teams the Radel Company was merely acting as the agent of the family in obtaining the teams; but we must take the record as we find it. It is matter of common knowledge that undertakers do supply carriages and teams of their own. The record brought up here shows an engagement by the Radel Company to furnish the carriages. The trial court therefore properly overruled defendant's motion for a preemptory instruction in this aspect of the case; nor was there any error in so much of the instruction given, under the facts presented upon the former trial, as assumed that the driver was the agent of the Radel Company. If, upon the return of the case to the trial court, any evidence should be introduced showing any understanding or knowledge and acquiescence upon the part of the plaintiff, or the one who hired the carriages, either that in procuring them the Radel Company acted as agent or was to furnish the vehicles of another, the court will submit the question to the jury by an appropriate instruction, relieving the Radel Company, in case there was such an understanding; and this upon the well-established general authority that although a driver may be ordered by those who have dealt with his master to go to this place or that, to take this or that burden, to hurry, or take his time, nevertheless, in respect to the driver's conduct and the control of his horses, he remains subject to no orders but those of the man who pays him, and his master, and not the one who has dealt with the master, can be held liable therefor.

It is argued by appellant that in going into the café or bar the servant was upon an independent service of his own, and that therefore there was no obligation upon the master for any damage resulting from it. The conclusion is false, because the premise is false. The accident did not arise as the result of anything done by the driver while absent from the carriage, but from his neglect in leaving the carriage.

Appellant also complains of the admission of the testimony of two witnesses who were called by plaintiff in rebuttal, and who were permitted to testify as to a certain statement the driver of the carriage had made to them about the accident. The driver had been introduced by the defendant, and upon cross-examination by plaintiff had been asked whether he made such a statement, which he denied. Both when the question was asked of him, and when the witnesses were put on to show that he had made the statement, the court properly limited the jury's consideration of the testimony to its effect upon the credibility of the driver's testimony. There was therefore no error in its admission.

The conversation, of course, was not competent as substantive testimony, since it occurred some three weeks after the time of the injury.

Complaint is also made of the admission of the testimony of Dr. Shaler Berry, a witness introduced on behalf of plaintiff, wherein he testified that he saw her in December after the accident; that she exhibited to him a scar about 2 inches long across the top of her head, which she said she had received from being thrown out of a carriage on the pike; that she was complaining that since the accident she had suffered from various nervous manifestations, dizziness, headache and the like. The witness further said that a physician could not prove whether a woman was sleepless or dizzy, and that he had to rely upon her statements for that. It was error to refuse this instruction. Idem when he saw her. The testimony comes within the condemnation of like testimony in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Wiley, 134 Ky. 461, 121 S. W. 402, and its admission was error.

There was testimony given by defendant to the effect that the driver left the carriage upon the invitation of its occupants, and an instruction was asked and refused, in substance, that, if the driver left the carriage at the invitation of its occupants, the defendant was not liable. It was error to refuse this instruction. Upon a retrial of the case an instruction will be given in substance as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the driver of the carriage left at the invitation or request of the plaintiff, or at the request or invitation of any of its passengers in the presence of and without objection by the plaintiff, the law is for the defendant, and the jury will so find."

For the reasons given, the judgment of the trial court is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

JOHN LEUTHOLD, Appt.,
v.

CHARLES A. STICKNEY, Resp't.

(116 Minn. 299, 133 N. W. 856.)

Landlord and tenant — absence of fire escape — waiver of rent.

The owner of a building, who, during the term of a lease thereof, unlawfully fails to equip such building with fire escapes, cannot maintain an action upon such lease for rent.

Headnote by SIMPSON, J.
30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County in defendant's favor and from an order denying a motion for new trial in an action brought to recover rent claimed to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edgerton & Edgerton, for appellant:

It was not the intent of the legislature to confiscate the property of the owner of a flat building or apartment for failure to comply with the law in regard to fire escapes, considering, for the sake of argument, that the law has been violated. Had the legislature ever intended that such additional penalty would be incurred, it was easy enough for it to say so.

Where the statute annexes a penalty, contracts made without compliance with the statute are nevertheless valid, on the ground that the purpose of the statute was not to prohibit business, but to accomplish some collateral object.

Simpson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover rent claimed to be due from the defendant. The plaintiff leased to the defendant, by written lease, a seven-room flat on the fourth floor of an apartment building in the city of St. Paul for one year from September 1, 1909. The building is four stories in height above the basement, and covers an area of about 7,500 square feet. There are four flats on each floor, making sixteen flats in all. Each flat accommodated four or more people, and was usually occupied by from two to four people. During the term covered by the lease to defendant there was not, either within or without said building, or in any way connected therewith, any noncombustible ladder or stairway or standpipe. Defendant, with his family of seven, occupied the leased premises until the latter part of February, 1910, when he moved and permanently vacated them. He paid the stipulated rent for the full time of his occupancy. This action is brought to recover rent for the remainder of the term. About a month before the defendant vacated the premises he asked the plaintiff to put fire escapes on the building, and when he moved out he assigned the absence of fire escapes as his reason for so doing.

The case was tried by the court without a jury. The court found to be true the facts already stated, and, in addition, that the apartment building was within class III, as defined by § 2365, chap. 36, Rev. Laws, 1905, relating to protection against fire, and that the plaintiff had failed to maintain the tenement building in the condition as to fire escapes required by the statute, and found, as a conclusion of law, that the defendant was entitled to judgment in his favor in said action. The plaintiff appeals from an order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The plaintiff questions the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court that the apartment building here involved is within class III. of the statute relating to fire protection. Section 2365, Rev. Laws, 1905, defines buildings of class III. as follows: "Tenements, flat buildings, and boarding houses more than two stories high, accommodating more than twenty persons, whether in one family or more." Other related sections are as follows:

"2368. For each 5,000 feet of area, or fraction thereof, covered by a building in class three, there shall be provided one outside standpipe, as described in § 2367, and one noncombustible ladder or stairway for each twenty persons, or fraction thereof, that such building accommodates above the first story."

"2372. The proprietor and lessee of every building in any of the classes hereinbefore mentioned shall equip the same in the manner prescribed, and every failure to do so shall constitute a misdemeanor."

Penalties are prescribed for the commission of misdemeanors under the statute. While the evidence does not show the exact number of persons occupying the apartment building here involved at any given time, it does appear that it was built to accommodate more than sixty four persons, that during the term of the defendant's lease it was continually occupied for residence purposes, and that the number of persons usually residing thereon was a much greater number than the minimum fixed by the statute. The building was divided by a fire wall into two parts, with eight flats in each part. It is suggested that this division made two tenements of the building, within the meaning of the statute relating to fire protection. But, so considered, each part accommodated more than twenty persons and was within class III. of the statute. It fairly appears from the evidence that more than twenty persons actually resided in the part of the building in which the flat leased to the defendant was located during the time of defendant's occupancy.

2. A more important point urged by the plaintiff is that the conclusion reached by the trial court is not sustained by the findings of fact; plaintiff's claim being that, notwithstanding the statute, the lease between the plaintiff and the defendant was valid, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the agreed rent thereunder. Such claim cannot be sustained. At the time of the making of the lease, and during the entire term covered thereby, the leased premises were not in the condition prescribed by the law of this state relating to fire protection. The plaintiff, by his failure to equip the building in the prescribed manner, committed a misdemeanor. This violation of the law was a continuing one during the entire term of the lease, and affected directly and materially the premises leased. The absence of a fire escape, in the view of the law, made the leased premises dangerous and their occupancy opposed to the public policy expressed in the law. The permitted occupancy of the premises is the sole consideration for the promise to pay rent here sought to be enforced. Plaintiffs claim for rent cannot be separated from his unlawful act in failing to provide the premises with the prescribed fire escape. The instant case clearly falls within the rule established in this state in the case of Ingersoll v. Randall, 14 Minn. 400, Gil. 304. In that action, brought to recover for plaintiff's services in threshing for the defendant, the defense was interposed that on the machine used by the plaintiff the knuckles and rods were not covered as required by law. The court, in holding that the plaintiff could not recover, stated: "The statute before cited not only makes it a duty to cover the knuckles and rods, but it makes neglect or refusal so to do a misdemeanor to which a penalty is affixed. The plaintiff, then, in operating his threshing machine in threshing for the defendant without covering the knuckles and rods, was doing that which is prohibited by law. The threshing, which was the consideration of the defendant's promise, was unlawful, and therefore will not support the promise. Bensley v. Bignold, 5 Barn. & Ald. 335; Cunard v. Hyde, 2 El. & El. 1; Chitty, Contr. 658, and note 'h'; Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 272, 6 L. ed. 472, and cases supra; Emery v. Kempton, 2 Gray, 257." The rule so laid down has never been departed from in this state, and has been applied in numerous cases: Bisbee v. McAllen, 39 Minn. 143, 39 N. W. 299; Handy v. St. Paul Globe Pub. Co. 41 Minn. 188, 4 L.R.A. 466, 16 Am. St. Rep. 695, 42 N. W. 872; Stolz v. Thompson, 44 Minn. 271, 46 N. W. 410; G. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Peimeisl, 85 Minn. 121, 88 N. W. 441; Thomas Mfg. Co. v. Knapp, 101 Minn. 432, 112 N. W. 989.

It is urged by counsel for the plaintiff that chapter 301 of the Laws of 1903 provided, as an additional penalty for failure on the part of the owner of a hotel to equip it with required fire escapes, that no action should be maintained for board, lodging, or accommodations therein, and that by the omission of such provision in reference to tenements, the legislative intent is shown not to make a failure to comply with the statute a defense to an action for rent of flats in tenement buildings. Chapter 301 of the Laws of 1903 was amended by chapter 343 of the General Laws of 1905, and the special provision referred to concerning hotels was omitted from the amending act. Therefore the basis for the construction contended for by plaintiff's counsel no longer exists.

The unlawful act of the plaintiff in failing to equip the leased premises with a fire escape taints the entire consideration of the promise he here seeks to enforce. To permit a recovery upon such promise would tend to defeat the purpose of the statute. The statute is designed to protect persons permanently or temporarily in buildings of the enumerated classes to some extent from the dangers incident to conflagrations. The defendant cannot be required by the plaintiff to occupy or pay rent for premises maintained in a dangerous condition through the plaintiff's continuing unlawful act.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These actions were brought to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiffs in consequence of a nuisance maintained by defendant upon premises adjacent to those occupied and owned by them. They were consolidated on the call of the calendar in the court below and tried together; the Lead and Schulze actions being submitted to a jury, and the Gazett action to the court, save as to the question of damages. In the two actions submitted wholly to the jury, verdicts were returned for the respective plaintiffs; in the Gazett action a verdict assessing plaintiff's damages at the sum of $1 was returned, and the court therein made findings of fact and conclusions of law, awarding judgment therefor, and directing the issuance of a permanent injunction restraining the further maintenance of the nuisance. The action was dismissed as to defendant Anker. Defendant Inch moved for additional and amended findings in the Gazett case, which was denied in part and granted in part. Defendant thereafter moved for a new trial of all the actions on various grounds, and appealed from an order denying the same.

It is contended on this appeal (1) that the evidence does not justify the verdict of the jury or the findings of the court; (2) that the court erred in certain of its instructions and refusals to instruct the jury; (3) that incompetent evidence was erroneously admitted; and (4) that a permanent injunction in the Gazett Case was improperly granted.

The facts as disclosed by the evidence and findings of the court are substantially as follows: Defendant is a teamster employing in the conduct of his business a number of horses which he stables in a barn owned by him and located upon the land described 59 L.R.A. (N.S.)

in the complaint, in the city of Duluth. The barn was originally built fifteen or more years ago, and of sufficient capacity to stable a limited number of horses. For several years prior to the time defendant became the owner of the barn, it was not in use to any considerable extent, if at all, and had been practically abandoned as a stabling place for horses. During this period a large number of people, including plaintiffs, purchased lots in the vicinity of the barn and erected thereon dwelling houses, and the locality became a thickly settled residence part of the city of Duluth. Thereafter, and about five years prior to the commencement of these actions, defendant purchased the property and commenced stabling the horses used by him in his business as teamster, and so continued until some three years before the commencement of the actions, when he rebuilt and reconstructed the barn and so enlarged its capacity as to accommodate about thirty horses. About the same time defendant extended his business, and, in addition to horses used in his team work, constantly kept a number in the barn for sale. By these improvements in the barn it was made into a two-story structure, with room on one floor for thirteen and upon the other seventeen horses. Thereafter the court found that defendant allowed the barn to be used and kept in such a manner that there emanated therefrom noxious and offensive odors, varying in intensity and offensiveness from time to time, and to such an extent as to cause the atmosphere, especially in the summer time, to become polluted, which reached the houses and dwellings of plaintiffs, to their annoyance and discomfort; that during said time the horses so stabled, during both the night and day time stamped, pawed, and made loud and offensive noises, to the disturbance of plaintiffs and their families; that during said time defendant frequently carried and cleaned his said horses in an alley adjacent to the barn, allowing large quantities of hair, dust, and dirt, to be carried by the wind to and within the houses of plaintiffs, to their annoyance and discomfort; that defendant permitted the accumulation of manure to remain in a wagon upon the premises, which gave off additional offensive odors; that by reason of these facts plaintiffs were deprived of the free and comfortable enjoyment of their property; and that the barn and the manner in which it was kept constituted a nuisance. The court also found that the management of the barn during the last three years of defendant's occupancy thereof was entirely different than when plaintiffs purchased

1. We have examined the record with care, and find therein ample evidence to justify the court and jury in finding the facts substantially as embodied in the foregoing statement. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss the evidence, and we leave this branch of the case without further comment. That the facts justify the conclusion that defendant's barn and the management thereof constitute a nuisance for which he is liable in damages to those who have suffered therefrom is clear. The case is brought by the facts within the provisions of § 4448, Rev. Laws, 1905, which are declaratory of the common law upon the subject, and entitle plaintiffs to the relief demanded.

2. The assignments of error challenging certain portions of the instructions to the jury, and the refusal of certain requests, are not sustained. The rules and principles of law upon the subject of both public and private nuisances are well settled, and a general discussion thereof seems unnecessary. 29 Cyc. 1152 et seq.; 2 Dunnell's Minn. Dig. 7240, and cases cited. A barn or stable wherein horses or cattle are kept is not a nuisance per se, although it may become a nuisance by reason of its location and the manner in which it is managed and conducted. Albany Christian Church v. Wilborn, 112 Ky. 507, 66 S. W. 285; Joyce, Nuisances, § 202. If the manner in which it is conducted results in noxious odors, disagreeable noises, to the discomfort and annoyance of adjoining property owners, it is a nuisance within the meaning of the law, regardless of the question whether defendant exercised due care to so manage the property as to avoid results of that nature. Joyce, Nuisances, § 202; Berger v. Minneapolis Gaslight Co. 60 Minn. 296, 62 N. W. 336. In other words, where the business casts off noxious and unwholesome odors, in fact annoying to and impairing the comfort of adjoining property owners, it is no defense to say that it was conducted in a reasonable and proper manner, and that the odors emanating therefrom were such as are ordinarily incident to the business when properly conducted. Pennoyer v. Allen, 56 Wis. 502, 43 Am. Rep. 728, 14 N. W. 609; People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 9 L.R.A. 722, 46 N. W. 735; Aldrich v. Howard, 8 R. I. 246; Rodenhause v. Craven, 141 Pa. 546, 23 Am. St. Rep. 306, 21 Atl. 774; Bohan v. Port Jervis Gaslight Co. 122 N. Y. 18, 9 L.R.A. 711, 25 N. E. 246.

There can be no question but that defendant was conducting a lawful business, and it was not per se a nuisance; but the evidence justified the conclusion that the manner in which it was conducted created a nuisance as a matter of law. A careful reading of the charge of the learned trial court impresses us that the rules of law pertinent to the issues presented were clearly and fully stated to the jury. We construe the charge as a whole, and not segregated parts thereof, which, standing alone, might seem incomplete or incorrect. The evidence did not require the submission to the jury of the question covered by one of defendant's requests, to the effect that, if plaintiffs acquiesced in the improvements of defendant's barn, that fact should be taken into consideration by the jury in determining the issues involved. No acquiescence in the conduct of defendant's business, of a character to estop plaintiff, was shown, and the request was properly refused. We find, therefore, the assignments of error challenging the instructions to the jury not well taken.

3. Defendant complains of the admission over his objection of certain expert testimony. This evidence related almost wholly to the damages suffered by plaintiffs, and in view of the well-settled rule that the admission of expert evidence rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and the further fact that the damages awarded were in no sense excessive, the conclusion must be that no prejudice resulted to defendant, conceding, for present purposes, that some of the evidence so objected to might have been excluded. The question to one of plaintiffs' witnesses, seeking to elicit information as to whether conditions had improved with reference to the management of the barn since the commencement of the action, was objected to as "immaterial, and calling for the conclusion of the witness." The objection did not call attention to the objection now urged, namely, that the question was incompetent, and there was no reversible error in overruling it. The answer to the question stated a fact, and not the conclusion of the witness. The other assignments in reference to this branch of the case do not require separate mention. We discover no reversible error in the admission or exclusion of the evidence.

4. In the Gazett Case the court ordered judgment for a permanent injunction, "perpetually enjoining the defendant, either by himself, his servants, agents, or any of them, from maintaining or permitting to be maintained on the property of defendant, . . . the barn and stable for horses in such numbers or in such manner as to produce noise sufficient habitually to disturb the sleep or comfort of the occupants of the plaintiff's house, . . . or from maintaining or permitting to be maintained . . . a stable for horses in such numbers as to habitually produce odors or gases that shall be offensive to the senses of the plaintiff or his family in said house of the plaintiff, or to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of plaintiff's house by himself and family," and restraining and enjoining specific acts not necessary here to repeat. The jury in this case awarded plaintiff $1 as damages.

It is contended by defendant that the injunction was improperly granted, for the reasons (1) that plaintiff has suffered no substantial damage from the maintenance of the barn; and (2) that an injunction should not issue in any case where it appears that defendant is solvent and the complainant's injury may be compensated by the payment of damages. Neither contention can be sustained. The nuisance complained of is continuing in character, and the annoyance and discomfort arising therefrom are in the nature of things incapable of accurate, or even approximately accurate, measurement in dollars and cents. In such cases, the authorities say, whether the damage be great or small, the injury is practically irreparable, and equity will interfere to prevent its continuance. 29 Cyc. 1223; Wahle v. Reinbach, 76 Ill. 322; Bushnell v. Robeson, 62 Iowa, 540, 17 N. W. 888; Friedman v. Columbia Works & Malleable Iron Co. 99 App. Div. 504, 91 N. Y. Supp. 129. For the same reason the financial responsibility of the defendant is not controlling. To send the plaintiff to a court of law for redress by way of damages in such cases would not only compel him to submit to the conditions surrounding the nuisance, but also result in a multiplicity of suits. For these reasons well supported by the authorities, we hold that a proper case for an injunction was presented. Though in some respects the injunction which the court ordered issued is quite general in its commands, it is specific in some respects, and as a whole perhaps as definite as the law itself upon the subject. Oehler v. Levy, 234 Ill. 595, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1025, 85 N. E. 271, 14 Ann. Cas. 891.

We find in the record evidence reasonably tending to support the findings objected to by defendant, and there was therefore no error in the refusal of the court below to strike them out. Nor was there error in the denial of defendant's motion for additional findings.

Order affirmed.

The holding in ERICKSON v. GREAT NORTHERN R. Co., that firemen are not the servants or agents of the owner of burning property, would seem to admit of no question.

In Mott v. Hudson River R. Co. 8 Bosw. 345, which was similar in facts to *ERICKSON v. GREAT NORTHERN R. But it does not follow that if the plaintiff's property was burned in consequence of the negligent severing of the hose carrying water to his buildings at the time on fire, he cannot recover of the defendants, if the severing of the hose was the result of the concurring negligence of the defendants' servants and the firemen. If this act was done by the concurring negligence of the two, in such sense that the hose would not have been cut if either had been free from negligence, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover, unless it be a sound proposition that the damages are too remote to present a case of liability.

extinguish the fire and causing destruction of the property, it is not necessary for the owner thereof, in order to recover damages for the loss, to plead and prove wanton negligence of the railway company in cutting the hose, or prove that the person operating the locomotive had actual knowledge of its presence on the crossing. Mr. M. L. Countryman, with Mr. J. D. Sullivan, for appellant:

Actual notice to the engineer in charge of this engine was necessary, and in the absence of direct proof of actual notice, facts and circumstances must at least be shown from which actual notice to the engineer must be inferred.

American Sheet & Tin Plate Co. v. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 382, 75 C. C. A. 47, 143 Fed. 789, 6 Ann.

In the case supposed, the firemen and the defendants were joint actors in the wrongdoing in such sense that, by the concurrence of the default of each, the injury was produced. . . . In the present case, the firemen, at the time of the casualty complained of, owed a special duty to the plaintiff in this action, and were engaged in performing it. . . . The defendants owed no other duty to the present plaintiff than it owed to every person owning property in the city of New York,—to use reasonable care and diligence not to frustrate or render ineffectual means in use to extinguish an existing fire, when such means consisted in part of hose rightly laid across or stretched along the track of its road. The ground on which the defendants are charged in such a case is that the wrong was done by an act in the doing of which it was an actor. The fact that others co-operated or concurred with it in effecting the wrong does not affect the question or measure of its liability. If negligence, in such a case, can be imputed to the firemen then present, or to any or either of them, and to only a part of them the result is the same. Whoever was guilty of and responsible for the concurring negligence, they and the defendants are the parties in fault; and it is by their and the defendants' concurring negligence that the loss and damage were caused. The defendants' liability is not affected by the consideration whether only one or several of the firemen are in law to be deemed guilty of the negligence in not taking proper and timely precautions to inform the defendants' servants of the existence and locality of the fire, and that hose was then lying on the track to obtain the supply of water requisite to extinguish it. The difficulty in the case occasioned by the charge is that the jury may have found the defendants guilty of negligence, and yet have rendered a verdict against the plaintiff, because they found the firemen also guilty of negligence, and that the injury was caused by the concurring negligence of the firemen and of the defendants' servants. An instruction to render a verdict for the defendants, on finding such to be the facts, is erroneous."

In Metallic Compression Casting Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 109 Mass. 277, 12 Am. Rep. 689, where some of the firemen and apparatus were from another town, the opposite claim was made by the defendants, to wit, that those who laid the hose across the defendants' track were not the agents or servants of the plaintiff, and that therefore the plaintiff could not recover for cutting the hose,—to which the court said: "But assuming that the hose was properly laid across the track, yet the defendants contend that the plaintiffs have no cause of action, because the hose was not their property, nor were the men who had possession of it their servants. It is true that the hose was not their property, and the men in charge of it were not their servants. Their services were voluntary, and if they had gone away and taken the hose and engine with them, the plaintiffs would have had no legal claim against them. But we do not think that these circumstances are material. The men and the engine were in fact furnishing water to the plaintiffs, and were thereby extinguishing the fire. They were rendering the same service to the plaintiffs as if they were hired and were using the plaintiff's hose. The defendants cut off the supply of water, and this was as really an interference with the plaintiffs' possession as if they held the possession under a deed, and as if the men were laboring under a contract. The interference was tortious."

In the other cases of hose cutting the question does not seem to have been considered.

It has been held, as if a matter of course, that firemen are not within the protection of statutes enacted for the safety of employees. Hamilton v. Minneapolis Desk Mfg. Co. 78 Minn. 3, 79 Am. St. Rep. 350, 80 N. W. 693; Kelly v. Henry Muhs Co. 71 N. J. L. 358, 59 Atl. 23. The same has been held as to a member of the fire insurance patrol. Gibson v. The fire department of the City of Moorhead in attempting to extinguish this fire were the agents and servants of respondent and if they, by their acts of negligence in leaving this hose unprotected and unguarded, contributed to the cutting thereof by appellant's engine, then, upon elementary principles, respondent ought not to be permitted to recover.

Messrs. Christian G. Dosland and Barger & Hicks, for respondent:

A railroad company is liable for loss caused by cutting hose laid to a fire.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The right of way of the defendant railway company, with three tracks thereon, is located directly south of and almost parallel with First avenue, in the city of Moorhead, Minnesota. This avenue runs east and west. At right angles thereto is Eighth street, running north and south, being the most traveled street going in that direction in the city. Front street is one block south of First avenue. Prior to the fire on January 2, 1911, plaintiff was the owner of Columbia Hotel, located between Front street and defendant's right of way. The main part was a three-story brick building 104 feet long on Front street and 40 feet wide. On the easterly side, and projecting closer to Eighth street than the main building, had been added two brick-veneered two-story structures, so that the northerly end of these additions were within 100 feet of defendant's tracks. A frame structure 15 feet by 17 feet, two stories, containing a washroom and toilets, was built in the angle formed by the main building and additions. Between it and the main building was a 6-foot passageway; but it was built against the addition, with doors opening into the same. About 7 o'clock in the morning of the date mentioned, smoke was noticed in the hotel, and shortly after a fire alarm was turned in. It appears there were only two regularly employed men in the fire department. One of these had charge of and drove the hose cart. The alarm was promptly responded to, the hose was attached to a hydrant at the northeast corner formed by the intersection of Eighth and Front streets, and then taken in through the main entrance of the hotel on Front street; but no fire, only smoke, was found there. The hose cart was thereupon driven north on Eighth street, and another hose attached to a hydrant located north of defendant's tracks, at the northeast corner of First avenue and Eighth street, and run south on the last-named street across the tracks, then behind the hotel to the frame building mentioned, containing the toilets, where in the fire had in the meantime been located. The water was turned on, and the fire was being brought under control, when the defendant backed a locomotive in a westerly direction from the depot, situate some 200 feet east of the east line of Eighth street, over and across the street where the hose was laid, and cut it. Before the cut section could be removed and other hose substituted, ten to twenty minutes elapsed, during which time the fire gained such headway that not only the frame structure where it started was destroyed, but practically the whole hotel. Plaintiff sued, alleging that the defendant negligently cut the hose; that, had it not so done, the fire would have been put out with but small loss; consequently the claim is that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the destruction of the hotel. The trial resulted in a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the order denying its alternative motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial.

At the trial it appeared that at the crossing in question defendant had safety gates operated by a watchman from a tower some 10 feet high, located immediately north of the tracks and on the east side of Eighth street. When the hose was laid across the track, one of the firemen, who knew that the watchman was very deaf, pointed to the hose and motioned up and down the track. He testified that the watchman looked at him and toward the smoke from the fire. Because it did not appear that this watchman gave any notice to the engineer in charge of the locomotive which cut the hose, the court instructed the jury that any notice or knowledge the watchman may have had of the situation was immaterial. Unless a recovery must be based on the wanton negligence of the engineer, we fail to see why the evidence was not admissible. The watchman was there to guard against persons or property on the crossing. If he knew that the hose was on the crossing, and, from the motion of the fireman and the situation, knew that trains were not to pass, it would seem a duty devolved on him to act, and a failure so to do would tend to show negligence of defendant. The ruling testifies to the great care taken by the learned trial court in a case presenting the application of the law of negligence to a somewhat novel situation, and involving a large amount, to eliminate everything which by inference might be claimed to be unfair to the defendant.

Contributory negligence was not pleaded. It was not assigned as a ground for a new trial, nor is an assignment of error on that basis made in this court. But counsel, in his oral argument, contended, as we understood him, that it appeared from the evidence received without objection that there was no necessity for laying the hose across the tracks; that after it was there the engineer was not notified by the firemen of its presence; that this was negligence of the firemen, and they were plaintiff's servants in the matter of extinguishing the fire; hence their negligence is imputable to plaintiff, and no recovery may be had. Hill v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 112 Minn. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

503, 128 N. W. 831; Mellon v. Great Northern R. Co. 116 Minn. 449, 134 N. W. 116. The answer to the contention is that the court, at defendant's request, submitted the question of apparent necessity of running the hose across the tracks to the jury, ruling that, if it was not necessary, plaintiff must fail; and, further, we are of the opinion that plaintiff is not responsible for the negligence of the fire department. It must be borne in mind that, while a fire department protects the private property threatened, it is one of the public governmental agencies of the city, for whose mistakes or negligence in subduing a fire the city is not liable to the individual injured thereby. This is placed on the ground that the department, in arresting fires, is discharging a public governmental or police duty. Bryant v. St. Paul, 33 Minn. 289, 53 Am. St. Rep. 31, 23 N. W. 220; Grube v. St. Paul, 34 Minn. 402, 26 N. W. 228. A fireman is not a servant of the owner of the property he is attempting to save, so as to come within the protection of chapter 7, p. 99, Laws of 1893, "An act for the Protection of Employees." Hamilton v. Minneapolis Desk Mfg. Co. 78 Minn. 3, 79 Am. St. Rep. 350, 80 N. W. 693.

The citizen whose property is threatened with destruction has absolutely no control over the public fire department fighting the fire. He may not interfere by attempted directions or orders. Indeed, his property may be destroyed if, in the judgment of the head of the department, it becomes necessary so to do to arrest a conflagration. Where there is no authority in an individual to interfere with or direct such a public governmental agency as a city fire department in the discharge of its duties, nor any responsibility is resting upon him as a taxpayer in the city to pay for the negligence of such agency, it follows that there is no relation of master and servant, or principal and agent, so as to transfer the negligence of the fire department to the owner of the property being consumed by fire, making available the defense of contributory negligence to one whose negligence caused or concurred in causing the loss. Mott v. Hudson River R. Co. 8 Bosw. 345. In this view of the case, the court did not err in refusing to give defendants first and third requests, which were that no recovery could be had, if there was no need of running the hose across the tracks.

Upon the oral argument counsel for the defendant candidly conceded that he could not attack the finding of the jury that the cutting of the hose caused the almost total destruction of the hotel, and that, had it not been cut, the fire would have been extinguished with but a small loss. And the record amply sustains the verdict that plaintiff's loss in the amount found proximately resulted from the fact that defendant ran the locomotive over the hose.

We come, then, to the decisive question on this appeal, and which is the refusal of the court to instruct the jury, at defendant's request, that "before the jury can find a verdict in this case against defendant, they must be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant's engineer, Kilbain, actually knew, when he backed his engine and tender from the depot west over the Eighth street crossing, of the presence of this hose, in time to have avoided running over it," and instead charging them in substance that it was not the duty of the engineer to look for hose stretched across the track, but, if he knew that a hose in use to put out a fire was across the track, it was his duty not to cut it if he could avoid doing so without danger to himself or other persons. If he did not know that it was across the track, but did know that a fire was in progress in the city near the track, and knew that the situation and conditions were such as to make it reasonable to anticipate that his engine might interfere with the work of extinguishing the fire, and after such knowledge he failed to exercise ordinary care under the circumstances to avoid cutting the hose, actionable negligence might be found. We are of the opinion that the court submitted the issue of defendant's negligence to the jury upon quite as favorable theory as it was entitled to.

The contention of the defendant that the rule of wanton negligence should have been applied cannot be sustained. The defendant did not own the ground where the hose was. It was a public street. The fireman have generally the right of way in public streets in going to a fire, and in stringing hose thereon a lawful use is made of the street. Indeed, if a necessity therefor exists, hose may be laid on private property and across railway right of way to subdue fires. So that, as far as defendant was concerned, the hose was on the tracks by right, and not by the act of either a licensee or a trespasser. The hose, then, being where it might lawfully be laid, and used at a place where defendant had not the exclusive right to be, but where the public has the right to travel, a duty was thereby cast upon defendant to exercise ordinary care in its use of the crossing. If, without fault of the owner, a large van had, in broad daylight, been stalled on defendant's tracks on this crossing, and this locomotive, with tender, starting from a standing position 200 feet away, had backed down upon the van, could there be any escape from liability? The duty of the defendant, using the crossing, to exercise ordinary care to discover the presence of the obstruction thereon, and avoid injury or collision, is the same in the case of a van as in the case of fire hose strung over it. The difficulty of discharging this duty may vary. If, however, in a given case, the ordinarily prudent person, mindful of this duty of care, would, under the situation shown, discover the danger and avoid collision, and the defendant in such case fails so to do, negligence is proven. The defendant's engineer was familiar with the streets and tracks, and had so been for several years. He had stayed at the hotel overnight, and knew of the presence of smoke, or the smell thereof, when he left for the depot, where the locomotive was awaiting him. He waited in the depot some ten minutes for orders. The fire whistle blew. He claims he did not hear it. The testimony is that quite a volume of smoke came from the fire when he started to back the locomotive; also that, as he proceeded, he looked at the smoke. Volunteer firemen and others were going to the fire, or were around there. Though his view of the hotel was at some position of his travel obstructed, he had a clear view of the rear of the hotel for about 100 feet before reaching the hose. It was broad daylight, and he could have seen the hose, he admits had he looked for it, at a distance of more than 200 feet. He claims he looked at the crossing. No one was on the front part of the tender. The fireman on the locomotive was not called, nor his absence from the witness stand explained. These and other facts appearing in the evidence made a case for the jury upon the question of defendant's negligence in running over the hose.

We are cited to the case of Clark v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. 149 Mich. 400, 112 N. W. 1121, 12 Ann. Cas. 559, as supporting defendant's contention, and so it does; but no substantial reason is given for the ruling, and we are not inclined to follow it. In the case of American Sheet & Tin Plate Co. v. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, 75 C. C. A. 47, 143 Fed. 789, 6 Ann. Cas. 626, relied on by defendant, it will be noticed that there was no hose laid across the track. The train was stopped because the fire department wished to lay the hose across defendant's right of way at a place abandoned as a street, but through some misunderstanding of the engineer, the train started up and interfered for some minutes tically the whole hotel. Plaintiff sued, alleging that the defendant negligently cut the hose; that, had it not so done, the fire would have been put out with but small loss; consequently the claim is that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the destruction of the hotel. The trial resulted in a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the order denying its alternative motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial.

State ex rel. Davis v. Hunter, 124 Iowa, 569, 104 Am. St. Rep. 361, 100 N. W. 510.

Mr. James R. McDowell, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

The court has power to suspend the execution of the sentence.

1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 1299, p. 799; Gibson v. State, 68 Miss. 241, 8 So. 329; Sylvester v. State, 65 N. H. 193, 20 that of the state or public on one hand, and that of the defendant on the other. Since the measure of the punishment to be inflicted in any given case (excepting some few, of which murder in the first degree is a conspicuous example) is left entirely at the discretion of the court, it would seem that, from the public point of view, it must be held that the public rights are presumably protected by whatever the judge in his discretion does in this respect. It is for him to determine whether the defendant shall pay a fine within the limits fixed by the statute, or suffer some imprisonment within limits similarly fixed. And it can well be argued from the standpoint of public policy that it is proper for the court, in those cases where it finds that the public interests will best be served by not presently imposing any sentence, to thus deal with the subject. Considerations of public policy may often properly induce a court to hold off inflicting punishment for such a time as that course seems discreet to the court. The power would seem to be analogous to the immunity that courts, in their discretion, may give an accomplice, to aid the prosecution (State v. Graham, 41 N. J. L. 15, 32 Am. Rep. 174), and is similarly exercised where one equally guilty has pleaded guilty, or non vult, and has aided the state in the trial of the others concerned in the commission of the crime. From the defendant's standpoint, the only legitimate objection, it would seem to me, to the action of the court in refraining from presently inflicting punishment, would be the undesirability of remaining in the indeterminate position resulting from a suspension of the pronouncement of judgment. But is not this essentially a matter within his own control? Undoubtedly any convicted defendant could compel the proper court, by mandamus, to pronounce judgment; and, in my view, if a court sought to postpone the sentencing, or suspend it, for any purpose or any period which would be clearly unreasonable, the defendant could fully protect his rights by objection, which would undoubtedly, in my view, result either in the trial court not attempting to exercise 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the jurisdiction in the face of objection, or in the supreme court holding that, in the face of an objection, the trial court acted improperly in unreasonably delaying the pronouncement of judgment, and subsequently pronouncing one. As a general principle, I should say that either the successful or the defeated party in any litigated proceeding, civil or criminal, could move for judgment at any time when and after the matter was ripe for judgment. But if the defendant acquiesces, or does not object, it is difficult to see how he can be said to be injured. It is necessary to remember that the defendant has been convicted; that the court has the power to inflict the full measure of punishment; that if a defendant thus in peril of suffering the full penalty of the law is not visited with it, many things may happen favorable to him, while nothing worse than his present plight can possibly happen. If a defendant thus circumstanced sees fit not to object, or to acquiesce, I do not see who else is concerned that can complain, nor how he can legitimately complain."

In State v. Mallahan, 65 Wash. 287, 118 Pac. 42, under statutes whose provisions do not appear, it was held that the court had authority indefinitely to suspend sentence, and later commit the defendant, where there had been a breach of the condition.

In Ex parte Giannini, — Cal. App. —, 122 Pac. 831, a statute gave the court power to suspend the imposing or the execution of sentence, to continue for such period of time not exceeding the maximum possible term of such sentence, upon such terms and conditions as it should determine, and where the defendant was convicted of a misdemeanor the possible maximum term of sentence for which was six months, it was held competent to impose any sentence less than this, and, notwithstanding such fixation, to place the defendant upon probation for the maximum term; and it was further held that where a defendant is placed upon pro-

Messrs. Ramsey Washington and Howard M. Benton for appellee.

Winn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant is an undertaking concern. On October 5, 1910, it conducted the funeral of one John Lickert. The appellee attending the funeral. Upon the return trip from the cemetery, the driver of the carriage in which appellee was riding, at the direction of one of the occupants of the carriage, stopped in front of the Heidelberg Café. The two men occupants left the carriage and went inside the café. The driver wrapped his lines about the brake and went in also. The team ran away. Mrs. Borches jumped or was thrown from the carriage, and brought her action against the undertaking company to recover for the injuries which she claimed to have received. She recovered a judgment for $597, and the undertaking company appeals.

The plaintiff alleged that the Radel Company had charge of the funeral; that she went to the funeral in a carriage furnished by defendant for that purpose; that the carriage was managed and under the control of defendant, its agents, and employees; and that, by reason of their negligence in leaving the horses unfastened and unattended the runaway and her injuries occurred. The answer did not deny that defendant furnished the carriage, but did deny that it was under the control of the defendant, its agents or employees, or that they were guilty of any negligence, or that the injury occurred. The evidence upon the plaintiff's side of the facts about the furnishing of the carriage, is, in substance, that plaintiff attended the funeral as a relative of the decedent; that she was put into this carriage by a representative of the Radel Company; that a burial association of which decedent was a member had furnished, through the Radel Company, three carriages for the funeral; that the decedent's sister ordered three extra carriages from a representative of the Radel Company, that it was in one of these extra carriages that plaintiff was at the time of her injury; that the bill had been made out by the Radel Company against the estate of the decedent for the extra carriages, and been paid by the decedent's sister. The evidence upon defendant's side upon this question is, in substance, that these carriages were hired for the funeral; that they were hired by a representative of the Radel Company from the Queen City Livery Company, an independent concern; that the Radel Company kept no carriages; that it had no control over the carriage driver; that the livery company sent the carriages, under orders from the undertaker, to the house, thence to the cemetery, and thence back to the house.

We think it clear that, in arranging for the transportation of the decedent's relatives and family, the undertaking company owes the same contract obligation to each of them, though it may not know, save in the most general way, the number and names of those who are to be transported. It is a matter of common knowledge that, in the distressing surroundings of this nature, someone of the family, or some friend of the family, acts for all; and it is right that the obligations, whatever they may be, assumed or owed by the undertaker, should be held as contract obligations owed to all. The two facts stated above, as appearing upon the sides, are not in conflict. But the divergence of position comes in that the plaintiff insists that since the carriages were ordered of the undertaking concern and supplied by it, it, in effect, was the liveryman, and is answerable to the plaintiff not otherwise than as if the carriages had been its own; while the defendant's position is that the carriage was furnished by an independent contractor, the livery company, and that defendant is not responsible for any negligence of the independent concern's servants or agents.

The error in the Radel Company's conception of its case lies in its misunderstanding of the facts. Under the evidence, it undertook to supply the carriages. There is no evidence that in supplying them it was only to act as agent in procuring them, or that they were to be supplied by another or independent contractor, or that it was so understood by those to whom the carriages were to be supplied. Nor was the injury suffered by any third person, as against whom the fact of the independent service could be shown. The rule is clear beyond argument that one who undertakes by contract to do for another a given thing cannot excuse himself to the other for a faulty performance, or a failure to perform, by showing that he has engaged another to perform in his place, and that the fault or failure is that of another or independent contractor. It would be different, of course, if it were shown that the substituted performance, the engaging of another to perform, was with the knowledge and acquiescence of the one with whom he undertook his contract obligation. If it were shown here, to illustrate, that either the plaintiff, or the member of the family who engaged the carriages, knew that the Radel Company would not supply the carriages, or understood or assented that they were to be supplied by another, then the plaintiff's claim would be against that other, unless it should be shown by the evidence, as it was not, that the complete direction, authority, and control of the carriage and its owner were surrendered for the time being to the Radel Company.

The state of fact just supposed, i. e., that it was understood in the contract with the Radel Company that the carriages were in fact to be supplied by another under a hiring by it, would bring the case within the rule argued by appellant, that, in an ordinary hiring from a livery company, the hirer, who exercises no control over the driver further than the right to generally direct where to go, is not the master, so as to render him liable in damages to a third person for injuries received through the negligence of the driver of the vehicle. The appellant's trouble in this respect, as above pointed out, lies in that the plaintiff was not a "third person;" per contra, she was a party to the contract made with the Radel Company where, in so far as the evidence upon the trial disclosed, that company itself was to furnish the carriages. The notes to Frerker v. Nicholson, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1122, illustrate the distinction. The case to which the notes are appended seems to us to be unsound as applied to the facts at bar, in that it treats the occupant of the carriage as a third person, and not as one entering into the contractual relation with the inherent contractual right to look for reasonably safe transportation to the one who, so far as the record disclosed, bore the whole obligation to supply the carriage. The case of Hershberger v. Lynch, 9 Sadler 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) (Pa.) 91, 11 Atl. 642, cited by appellant, was likewise the case of an injury to one driving his own vehicle a third person, who sought to recover from Hershberger, a livery stable keeper, damages for an injury by the latter's carriage which was temporarily engaged in the service of another liveryman. The court held with entire soundness that if the other liveryman only had the temporary control of the vehicle, with the right to its use and route, and without control over its servant, the right to discharge him and the like, Hershberger, and not the other liveryman, would be liable. We believe it would have been ruled differently had the injury been to one who had hired the carriage from the other liveryman, and without his knowledge had been supplied by the other liveryman with a carriage not his own.

The case of Boniface v. Relyea, 36 How. Pr. 457, is much relied upon by the appellant. The opinion sustains his position, save that it is not very clear that the undertaker himself agreed to furnish the teams. The proof rather went to show that he was to have entire superintendence of the funeral, and as such, among other things, was to see that carriages were present. But the fallacy of the argument of the learned judge in that case lies in that he eliminates altogether the contractual relation. He says, by way of illustrating the unreasonableness of the position, that if he were to hire a hackney coach from a public stand, and the driver should negligently injure another, he, the hirer, would be responsible; and it is upon such line of reasoning that he finds the undertaker there not liable. He should have extended his reasoning further. He should have illustrated the real position by putting himself in the position of one who, for hire, was supplying the carriage to another; and then, had the one he had undertaken to carry by contract been injured by the negligence of the driver, he would have more aptly illustrated the facts obtaining in his case. The error of the writer is apparent by the fact that he rests his case largely upon the case of Laugher v. Pointer, 5 Barn. & C. 547, 8 Dowl. & R. 550, 4 L. J. K. B. 309. Had he noted the distinction drawn here he would have observed that in that case the injured person was a third party entirely, who bore no contractual relation either to the owner or hirer of the vehicle.

The case of Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 652, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391, cited by appellant, is an authority for no other principle than the one conceded here, —that one who hires and uses a public carriage is not responsible for the negligence of the driver, in the absence of complete control and dominion over him. It does not discuss at all the rights of one who contracts from another the right to use a vehicle, and his consequent right, if injured, to recover against that other, in the absence of any knowledge or agreement that the other supplied a vehicle not his own.

In the case of Joslin v. Grand Rapids Ice Co. 50 Mich. 516, 45 Am. Rep. 54, 15 N. W. 887, cited by appellant, Joslin, the plaintiff, was driving his own horse and buggy, and was injured by a collision with a wagon driven by an employee of the ice company. The case nowhere touches the question of a contract right, but purely turns upon the question as to who may be responsible for injury to a third and disinterested person.

The case of Foster v. Wadsworth-Howland Co. 168 Ill. 514, 48 N. E. 163, cited by appellant, is the case of the killing of a child, a third party, and is therefore not applicable here.

The case of Driscoll v. Towle, 181 Mass. 416, 63 N. E. 922, cited by appellant, was the case of a third person injured by the negligent driving of a wagon. The question was as to whether he was entitled to recover against the owner of the wagon and general master of the driver, or against one to whom the wagon and driver had been sublet. There was no element of contract present.

The case of Jahn v. McKnight, 117 Ky. 655, 78 S. W. 862, cited by appellant, was one wherein Jahn, a telegraph messenger boy, while riding his bicycle on the street, had been struck and killed by a delivery wagon drawn by a runaway horse. The wagon in question was under hire to McKnight & Company, by its owner, who was in the habit of letting it out for hauling. In an effort to recover against McKnight & Company, it was held that under this state of fact the driver of the wagon was not the servant of McKnight & Company, and that there was no liability on their part for his negligence.

And so in all the vehicle cases to which our attention has been invited, or which we have examined upon our own initiative, with the possible exception of the Boniface Case and the Frerker Case, the injury was done to some third person, where there was an entire absence of any duty owed under contract. It may be that at the time the arrangements were made for the funeral, it was understood that in furnishing the teams the Radel Company was merely acting as the agent of the family in obtaining the teams; but we must take the record as we find it. It is matter of common knowledge that undertakers do supply carriages and teams of their own. The record brought up here shows an engagement by the Radel Company to furnish the carriages. The trial court therefore properly overruled defendant's motion for a preemptory instruction in this aspect of the case; nor was there any error in so much of the instruction given, under the facts presented upon the former trial, as assumed that the driver was the agent of the Radel Company. If, upon the return of the case to the trial court, any evidence should be introduced showing any understanding or knowledge and acquiescence upon the part of the plaintiff, or the one who hired the carriages, either that in procuring them the Radel Company acted as agent or was to furnish the vehicles of another, the court will submit the question to the jury by an appropriate instruction, relieving the Radel Company, in case there was such an understanding; and this upon the well-established general authority that although a driver may be ordered by those who have dealt with his master to go to this place or that, to take this or that burden, to hurry, or take his time, nevertheless, in respect to the driver's conduct and the control of his horses, he remains subject to no orders but those of the man who pays him, and his master, and not the one who has dealt with the master, can be held liable therefor.

It is argued by appellant that in going into the café or bar the servant was upon an independent service of his own, and that therefore there was no obligation upon the master for any damage resulting from it. The conclusion is false, because the premise is false. The accident did not arise as the result of anything done by the driver while absent from the carriage, but from his neglect in leaving the carriage.

Appellant also complains of the admission of the testimony of two witnesses who were called by plaintiff in rebuttal, and who were permitted to testify as to a certain statement the driver of the carriage had made to them about the accident. The driver had been introduced by the defendant, and upon cross-examination by plaintiff had been asked whether he made such a statement, which he denied. Both when the question was asked of him, and when the witnesses were put on to show that he had made the statement, the court properly limited the jury's consideration of the testimony to its effect upon the credibility of the driver's testimony. There was therefore no error in its admission.

The conversation, of course, was not competent as substantive testimony, since it occurred some three weeks after the time of the injury.

Complaint is also made of the admission of the testimony of Dr. Shaler Berry, a witness introduced on behalf of plaintiff, wherein he testified that he saw her in December after the accident; that she exhibited to him a scar about 2 inches long across the top of her head, which she said she had received from being thrown out of a carriage on the pike; that she was complaining that since the accident she had suffered from various nervous manifestations, dizziness, headache and the like. The witness further said that a physician could not prove whether a woman was sleepless or dizzy, and that he had to rely upon her statements for that. It was error to refuse this instruction. cident when he saw her. The testimony comes within the condemnation of like testimony in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Wiley, 134 Ky. 461, 121 S. W. 402, and its admission was error.

There was testimony given by defendant to the effect that the driver left the carriage upon the invitation of its occupants, and an instruction was asked and refused, in substance, that, if the driver left the carriage at the invitation of its occupants, the defendant was not liable. It was error to refuse this instruction. Upon a retrial of the case an instruction will be given in substance as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the driver of the carriage left at the invitation or request of the plaintiff, or at the request or invitation of any of its passengers in the presence of and without objection by the plaintiff, the law is for the defendant, and the jury will so find."

For the reasons given, the judgment of the trial court is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

JOHN LEUTHOLD, Appt.,

v.

CHARLES A. STICKNEY, Respnt.

(116 Minn. 299, 133 N. W. 856.)

Landlord and tenant — absence of fire escape — waiver of rent.

The owner of a building, who, during the term of a lease thereof, unlawfully fails to equip such building with fire escapes, cannot maintain an action upon such lease for rent.

Headnote by SIMPSON, J.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County in defendant's favor and from an order denying a motion for new trial in an action brought to recover rent claimed to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edgerton & Edgerton, for appellant:

It was not the intent of the legislature to confiscate the property of the owner of a flat building or apartment for failure to comply with the law in regard to fire escapes, considering, for the sake of argument, that the law has been violated. Had the legislature ever intended that such additional penalty would be incurred, it was easy enough for it to say so.

granted in the case at bar was not for the purpose of preventing an abuse of the court's process, or to prevent any injustice from being done appellant, but simply that it might be held over him in terrorem, thereby forcing him to refrain from further acts of lawlessness, and to become a more law-abiding citizen. Since the "great end of punishment is not the expiation or atonement of the offense committed, but the prevention of future offenses of the same kind," it may be that courts ought to possess the power within certain limits to suspend the execution of a sentence during good behavior; but the question before us is not what power the courts ought to have, but what their power in fact is. Among the cases upholding the foregoing views are Spencer v. State, — Tenn. —, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 680, 140 S. W. 597; State v. Abbott, 87 S. C. 466, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 70 S. E. 6, Ann. Cas. 1912 B. 1189; Re Webb, 89 Wis. 354, 27 L.R.A. 356, 46 Am. St. Rep. 846, 62 N. W. 177, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 702; Tanner v. Wiggins, 54 Fla. 203, 45 So. 459, 14 Ann. Cas. 718.

We have examined all the cases called to our attention which are in real or apparent conflict with the views here expressed, and have re-examined those cited in support of our former opinion, and find that all of them are either not in point, or were decided upon a misconception of the inherent powers of a court, or of what the common law upon this point was. In State v. Crook, 115 N. C. 760, 29 L.R.A. 260, 20 S. E. 513, which was a case involving the power of the court to suspend the imposition of a sentence, and not of the execution thereof, the court, in upholding the power of the lower court so to do, frankly stated that it could find no precedent to support its decision. We are therefore of the opinion that we erred in holding that the lower court had inherent power, or any power at all, to suspend the execution of a sentence during the good behavior of a defendant.

It does not follow from this, however, that appellant must now go unpunished. That portion of the judgment which directed "that the jail sentence be suspended during the good behavior of the defendant" was void, and the defendant could have been taken into custody immediately upon the rendition of the judgment. The postponement of his imprisonment was presumably with his consent, for it does not appear that he at any time requested, as he had the right to do, to be taken into custody, and consequently he cannot now object to being called upon to serve it. Concensus tollit errorum. Gibson v. State, 68 Miss. 241, 8 So. 329. It is immaterial that a longer period of time than that for which appellant was sentenced has elapsed since the sentence was imposed. While at large under this void order, to which he did not object, appellant was in the same situation that he would have been, had he simply escaped from custody. In such case the sentence is not satisfied until it has been actually served. Ex parte Bell, 56 Miss. 282; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. 4th ed. 1384; Spencer v. State, — Tenn. —, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 680, 140 S. W. 597; State v. Abbott, 87 S. C. 466, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 70 S. E. 6, Ann. Cas. 1912 B. 1189; Miller v. Evans, 115 Iowa, 101, 56 L.R.A. 101, 91 Am. St. Rep. 143, 88 N. W. 198; State v. State, 104 Ga. 509, 42 L.R.A. 190, 69 Am. St. Rep. 175, 30 S. E. 858; Tanner v. Wiggins, 54 Fla. 203, 45 So. 459, 14 Ann. Cas. 718. We have carefully examined the cases cited in opposition to this view, and think they were erroneously decided. In our former opinion we held that the exercise by the courts of the power to suspend the execution of a sentence was not in conflict with that clause of our Constitution which gives to the governor the power "to grant reprieves and pardons;" but, since we have ascertained that he court below had no power to suspend the execution of appellant's sentence, it now becomes unnecessary for us to express any opinion upon this point, and all that was said in our former opinion relative thereto is hereby withdrawn.

The suggestion of error is overruled.

HORACE B. CHURCH, Jr., Appt.,
v.

HERBERT S. HADLEY et al., Board of Fund Commissioners, Resp'ts.

(— Mo. —, 145 S. W. 8.)

Bonds — state — emergency — destruction of state capitol.

1. The burning of the state capitol building creates an emergency for the securing of money with which to replace it, within the provision of a Constitution authorizing the submission to the voters of a proposition to issue bonds in case of unforeseen emergencies.

Note. — Payment of commissions for sales of bonds as violating requirement that bonds shall not be sold for less than par.

CHURCH v. HADLEY is in harmony with the great majority of the cases, which hold that a general authority to dispose of bonds at not less than par carries with it the implied authority to employ reasonable and proper Same — commission for sale — validity.

2. The fund commissioners may, after they have failed to sell the bonds by their own efforts, pay a commission to brokers to dispose of them, under a statute providing for the issuance of a certain amount of bonds to build a state capitol, which shall be sold for not less than par, and the proceeds, which are estimated by the statute to equal the aggregate amount of bonds authorized to be issued, "more or less," appropriated to the construction of the building.

(Brown, J., dissents in part.)

(March 1, 1912.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cole County, sustaining a demurrer to a bill filed to enjoin defendants from disposing of unsold state bonds and from paying a commission to brokers to dispose of the same. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. C. Irwin and Silver & Dunn, for appellant:

A court of equity will not be permitted to accomplish indirectly what the law will not permit to be done directly.

Stowe v. Stowe, 140 Mo. 594, 41 S. W. 951.

Mr. Elliott W. Major, Attorney General, for respondents.

Graves, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, a resident taxpaying citizen of this state, by his bill in equity, seeks to enjoin the "Board of Fund Commissioners" of the state, which said board is made up of the governor, attorney general, state auditor, and state treasurer, (1) from in any wise disposing of all the unsold bonds directed by acts of the general assembly to be sold for the purpose of erecting a new state capitol building and purchasing additional grounds therefor, and (2) especially enjoining said Board of Fund Commissioners, constituted aforesaid, from entering into a contract with Francis Brother & Company, or any other person, persons, copartnership, or corporation, by which contract the said Francis Brother & Company, or any other person, persons, copartnership, or corporation, shall be allowed or paid any commission for services rendered in selling and disposing of said bonds. The petition also has a prayer for general relief.

The petition sets out and pleads the two several acts of the general assembly of this state, by which it avers an attempt is made to authorize the issuance and sale of $3,500,000 state bonds, due in thirteen years, bearing interest at 3½ per cent for the purposes aforesaid. The petition further avers that the legislative act received at special election called therefor more than two thirds of the votes cast at such election, and such result was duly ascertained and proclaimed. The legislative acts referred to and set out in the petition will have to be discussed in the opinion, and further details may well be omitted at this point. The petition then thus proceeds:

That the defendants hereto, as said assistance and pay commissions therefor, when in the judgment of the officers it is necessary or expedient to do so. Manitou v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Colo. 344, 86 Pac. 75; State v. West Duluth Land Co. 75 Minn. 456, 78 N. W. 115; Ft. Edward v. Fish, 156 N. Y. 363, 50 N. E. 973 (obiter); Armstrong v. Ft. Edward, 159 N. Y. 315, 53 N. E. 1116.

The reasons advanced by the courts for arriving at this conclusion are fully set out in the opinion above reported.

The contrary view was taken in Scranton v. Vail, 6 Luzerne Leg. Reg. 237, a common pleas decision, which held a municipal ordinance authorizing officers to allow necessary commissions whenever required for the conversion of the bonds void where the statute and Constitution prohibited the sale of the bonds at less than par.

A statute authorizing the officers to pay a commission for the sale of the bonds does not authorize the allowance of that commission to a purchaser of the bonds. Wheeler's Appeal, 108 Pa. 162, 1 Atl. 88, affirming Schmertz v. Pittsburgh, 17 Phila. 584. The court said in substance that the contract to allow the purchaser the commission upon the bonds purchased by him was practically an agreement to sell the bonds at less than par, and was therefore without authority. One of the reasons advanced by the court why a purchaser cannot be regarded as an agent employed to make the sale is because his interests as purchaser would conflict with his duty as agent. To the same effect is Franklin Ave. German Sav. Inst. v. Board of Education, 75 Mo. 408 holding, however, that the deduction of a commission could not be urged as a defense to an action on the bonds.

And in Hunt v. Fawcett, 8 Wash. 396, 36 Pac. 318, it was held that the allowance of a commission to a purchaser, upon bonds sold at their face value, was a sale at less than par, within the prohibition of the statute, notwithstanding that the county might have issued 7 instead of 5 per cent bonds, and the bonds sold did not cost the county a greater rate of interest than 7 per cent on the amount realized.

On the question as to accrued interest as part of par value, within prohibition against sale of bonds at less than par, see note to Smith v. State, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 789.

As to issuance of corporate bonds at less than par as usury, see note to Stirling v. Gogebic Lumber Co. 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1106.

Board of Fund Commissioners aforesaid, have caused said bonds, hereinbefore mentioned, to be printed, engraved, prepared, and executed in the form and with the recitals required and provided for in said act of the forty-sixth general assembly of Missouri, approved March 16, 1911, and hereinbefore set out and referred to, and have advertised, by public notice in the press of the state and otherwise, said bonds for sale at not less than par.

"That by reason of the fact that they bear an annual rate of interest of only 3½ per centum a year, said board has been able to dispose of only $280,000 in amount of said bonds, and the remainder thereof, aggregating the sum of three million two hundred and eighteen thousand dollars ($3,218,000), said board is unable to dispose of at par, and will be unable to so sell and dispose of the same at par, except on the payment of a commission of between 4 and 5 per centum of the proceeds of the sale or sales of said bonds to an agent or broker for his services in making the sale or sales thereof and in connection therewith.

"That said Board of Fund Commissioners have received from the firm of Francis Brother & Company, brokers of the city of St. Louis, Missouri, an offer to take at par the entire amount of said bonds so unsold, aggregating \$3,218,000 in amount, and to dispose of and to sell the same to a buyer or to buyers, provided said Board of Fund Commissioners will allow and pay to said Francis Brother & Company, a broker's or an agent's commission of 4 $\frac{2}{100}$ per centum of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds payable out of the same.

"That plaintiff concedes that said commission, if legal (which plaintiff denies), is a reasonable one, and probably the lowest commission for which said bonds can be disposed of.

"That the defendants hereto, as said Board of Fund Commissioners, are about to and will conclude and consummate with said Francis Brother & Company a contract of the character above indicated, that is, to take and dispose of said bonds at par, said Francis Brother & Company to be paid the aforesaid commission for their services in selling said bonds and in connection therewith, payable out of the proceeds of the sale thereof, unless said board and the members thereof shall be hindered and restrained from so doing by this honorable court.

"Your petitioner states that the issuance and sale of said bonds in the manner contemplated by said Board of Fund Commissioners, as hereinbefore indicated, will be wrongful, invalid, and illegal.

"Because the Board of Fund Commissioners of this state is without legal or competent authority under its constitution and laws, to sell or to dispose of its said bonds, aggregating an amount the sum of $3,218,000; the power and authority purported to be conferred on said board so to do, being inadequate and insufficient in law, and not authorized by the Constitution of this state or by laws passed pursuant thereto or in conformity therewith."

The prayer was as above indicated. In the circuit court the defendants, constituting the Board of Fund Commissioners, demurred to this petition in this language: "Now come the defendants, Herbert S. Hadley, governor of Missouri, John P. Gordon, state auditor, Elliott W. Major, attorney general, and James Cowgill, state treasurer, constituting the Board of Fund Commissioners of the state of Missouri, and demur to the petition filed by plaintiff herein, and assign as grounds of demurrer the following: First. Said petition fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Second. There is no equity on the face of the bill filed by complainant herein. Third. Said petition and the matters and things therein, as stated and set forth, are not sufficient in law or in equity to entitle the plaintiff to the relief prayed for in the petition, nor to authorize the issuance of a restraining order or injunction prayed for therein. Fourth. Because the petition, upon its face, disclosed that the said defendants are authorized, under the laws and Constitution of the state, to issue and sell the bonds mentioned in said petition, and have the right and authority to pay a reasonable commission under the conditions and circumstances stated in said petition. Wherefore, defendants, for the reasons herein stated and covered, pray that the petition be dismissed, and that they be permitted to go hence without day and for costs."

This demurrer the circuit court sustained and entered its judgment accordingly. From such judgment, the plaintiff has appealed, and the cause reaches this court for final determination.

I. By act approved March 16, 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 416), the general assembly of Missouri, so far as it could, authorized the issuance and sale of $3,500,000 in state bonds, and in the same act said: "The proceeds of said sale or sales shall constitute a fund to be designated as the capitol building fund, and shall be applied exclusively to the building of a new state capitol at the present seat of government of the state, including the furnishing and other equipment of said building and the purchase by the state of additional capitol premises adjoining those now owned by the state."

Under the Constitution, article 4, § 44, this act had to be submitted to a vote of the people. Such act was duly submitted by a second act, approved March 24, 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 250), and the petition admits that it was adopted by the required vote. The plaintiff charges, however, that the act of March 16th, supra, was not authorized by the Constitution, and that therefore the issuance and sale of any of the bonds therein authorized would be unlawful. To this contention we do not consent. Section 44 of article 4 of the Constitution reads: "The general assembly shall have no power to contract, or to authorize the contracting of, any debt or liability on behalf of the state, or to issue bonds or other evidences of indebtedness thereof, except in the following cases: First. In renewal of existing bonds, when they cannot be paid at maturity out of the sinking fund or other resources. Second. On the occurring of an unforeseen emergency or casual deficiency of the revenue, when the temporary liability incurred, upon the recommendation of the governor first had, shall not exceed the sum of $250,000 for any one year, to be paid in not more than two years from and after its creation. Third. On the occurring of any unforeseen emergency or casual deficiency of the revenue, when the temporary liability incurred or to be incurred shall exceed the sum of $250,000 for any one year, the general assembly may submit an act providing for the loan, or for the contracting of the liability, and containing a provision for levying a tax sufficient to pay the interest and principal when they become due (the latter in not more than thirteen years from the date of its creation), to the qualified voters of the state, and when the act so submitted shall have been ratified by a two-thirds majority, at an election held for that purpose, due publication having been made of the provisions of the act for at least three months before such election, the act thus ratified shall be irrepealable, until the debt thereby incurred shall be paid, principal and interest."

The act of March 16th is clearly authorized by the third exception in the section of the Constitution, supra.

The act itself declares the unforeseen emergency to be "the destruction of the state capitol by fire." The liability incurred exceeded $250,000. The act provides for a tax sufficient to pay the interest and principal when they become due. By the act, the bonds do not run longer than thirteen years and may be paid in eight years. The act is drawn in strict compliance with the provisions of the Constitution. Plaintiff contends that the power to raise revenue under the provisions of the Constitution is a special and limited one, and is to be strictly construed, and that the destruction of the state capitol by fire did not create an emergency within the meaning of that constitutional provision. We could concur in the views of plaintiff to the effect that this provision of the Constitution must be strictly construed, and yet upon other questions be forced to disallow his claim. Giving the Constitution the strictest construction, it cannot be said that the burning of the state capitol building, the necessary funds required to rebuild the same, is not just such an "unforeseen emergency" as the Constitution makers had in mind when they adopted that instrument; if not, then we are at a loss to understand the term "unforeseen emergency." Public buildings of this character are absolute requisites, and we feel that the unforeseen and sudden destruction of a state capitol building, and the immediate demand for funds with which to replace the same, is clearly an emergency such as contemplated by the constitutional provision, supra. This contention of plaintiff is therefore overruled.

2. The next question urged presents more difficulties, but in that we think the plaintiff is in error. The petition says that the Board of Fund Commissioners has tried to sell these bonds at par; that they have advertised them for sale both in and out of the state; that such board has only been able to find buyers for a very small portion thereof; that such board is now threatening to employ Francis Brother & Company to assist them in finding purchasers who will buy from said board the remainder of such issue at the par value thereof, and is threatening to contract with said Francis Brother & Company to pay them for their services in procuring purchasers of such bonds at par a commission of 4.21 per cent of the proceeds of such sale out of such proceeds. The question therefore is, Can a contract to pay a commission for procuring purchasers for these bonds be made by the board? We think so. First, it is a conceded fact that the defendants have tried to find purchasers and have failed. This might have been expected owing to the exceedingly low rate of interest (3½ per cent) which the bonds bear, and owing to the further fact that the members of such board are not in position to find purchasers, as would be some established brokerage company, with a clientele all over the country. Such boards are not usually in touch with the great mass of persons who invest in such securities. A large issue of bonds of this character might be sold to the clientele of any large brokerage firm, in small quantities to each client. Such companies usually have and can find persons among their customers who could be easily induced to take one or more of such bonds even at a low rate of interest, but this would require work. What a brokerage firm could do in this way, the usual board charged with the sale of low rate bonds could not do. Again we say that the question is, Can this board, after having tried to perform the duties imposed upon it in the matter of selling these bonds, and after having failed to sell them, employ and pay a broker or brokerage firm a stipulated reasonable sum to find and procure purchasers who will take these bonds at their face value?

The power to make such a contract must be gathered from the laws of the state. There is no express provision of this law which authorizes the making of such contract, but we think the power, under the admitted facts herein, is clearly implied.

To get at the legislative intent of the powers of the Board of Fund Commissioners, we must go to all of the law relating to the given subject. We have thus far spoken of the act of March 16, 1911, which authorized the issuance and sale of $3,500,000 of state bonds, and the act of March 24, 1911, which submitted the first-named act to a vote of the people, but on March 24, 1911, there was another act (Laws 1911, p. 108) approved, which created the "State Capitol Commission Board," and provided for its selection, organization, duties, etc.

The act of March 16th provides that the bonds shall not be sold for "less than par," but in the last act mentioned above, in § 10 thereof, we have this significant language: "That if the act of the forty-sixth general assembly, to be submitted to the voters of this state, referred to in the next succeeding section of this act, shall be ratified by two thirds of the legally qualified voters of this state, voting at an election held for that purpose, and it thereby becomes a valid and binding law, and the bonds authorized by said act are issued and sold pursuant thereto, the entire proceeds of the sale thereof shall be paid into the state capitol building fund, the (n) said proceeds (which it is estimated will aggregate the sum of three and one half millions of dollars, more or less) shall be, and the same with all interest accruing therefrom are, hereby appropriated to the construction of the state capitol heretofore referred to in this act, to the purchase of additional state capitol premises as contemplated by this act, and to otherwise carrying out its purposes and provisions, and also the purposes and provisions of the act of the forty-sixth general assembly of this state, to be ratified by the voters of the state, and referred to in the next succeeding section of this act."

ferred to in the next succeeding section of this act."

We have italicized the significant portion. This portion gives the legislative construction of what was meant by a sale at not less than par. It gives a legislative construction as to what the proceeds of such a sale might be. It shows that the general assembly had in mind that, although it had authorized and decreed the sale of $3,500,000 at "not less than par," yet such sale when made might bring net proceeds of less than $3,500,000. What did the legislature mean when it estimated the proceeds of the sale of $3,500,000 bonds at not less than par at "more or less" than "$3,500,000?" That body knew that it had conferred powers upon the Board of Fund Commissioners in general terms, and that there would be some expenses attached to the issuance and sale of these bonds, and that, if the sale could only be effected at par, then the net proceeds would be less than $3,500,000. It also knew that, if the said board were fortunate enough to sell the bonds for more than par, the proceeds might be above that sum. If the legislature did not have in mind that the expenses necessary to a sale should be taken out of the money, there is no sense in the use of the term "more or less."

But in addition to this the same section appropriates this net sum "more or less" than $3,500,000 to the construction of a state capitol, to the purchase of additional premises "and to otherwise carry out its purposes and provisions, and also the purposes and provisions of the act of the forty-sixth general assembly of this state, to be ratified by the voters of the state, and referred to in the next succeeding section of this act."

The power granted in this law is to sell bonds. The limitation of the power is that the actual sale shall not be less than par. The power of sale is granted in general terms, in so far as the means of sale is concerned. The statute granting the power does not undertake to prescribe the means and manner of sale.

In State ex rel. Clark v. Gates, 67 Mo. loc. cit. 143, Sherwood, Ch. J., thus announces the fixed rule in such cases: "If there is one principle in the law which finds abundant and oft-repeated recognition, it is this: That, where an agent is clothed with general powers, the means and measures necessary to effectuate the powers granted attend the grant of authority as inevitable incidents. Edwards v. Thomas, 66 Mo. 468. Thus, an agent employed to get a bill discounted may, unless expressly restricted, indorse it in the name of his employer; a broker employed to effect a policy of insurance may adjust the loss and do all that is requisite towards such adjustment; an agent employed to issue process may receive the debt and costs; and, in general, an agent has implied authority to use those means of which the principal could not but have foreseen the necessity, and therefore could not but have intended to authorize (Smith, Mercantile Law, 175, 176, and cases cited); and the same principle which applies to private agents is equally applicable in this regard to public ones."

The italics are ours. In this case we have a command to sell bonds to meet an emergency. Quick action is required. The whole trend of the several acts so shows. The power is granted in general terms, with but one single limitation, i. e., the actual sale must be at not less than par. Before the sale bonds must be printed at a cost, yet there is no specific authority to incur this cost. There is certainly the implied power given this board to make such a contract as an incident to the power of sale. Bonds cannot be sold without public notice, and these publications cost, and contracts for such have to be made. This, too, is a necessary incident to the power conferred to sell. Nothing is said as to the means and methods to be employed in procuring purchasers, yet it is clear that the state (the principal in this case) contemplated that, in this emergency, some effective means should be used to secure purchasers who would take these bonds at not less than par. The declared emergency of the case required speedy and effective action. Under such circumstances, it is clear that the lawmaking power must have had in mind that if the ordinary and usual methods of sale diligently pursued and prosecuted, as in this case, had failed, then more active and heroic measures and means might be required, and might be used by the board to make the sale to meet the public exigency and emergency. The legislature was confronted with an emergency, and was enacting a law to provide for the same. Under such circumstances, bills are hurriedly drawn, and oftentimes, in general terms, leaving incidental powers to be implied from the general and specific powers granted.

We do not mean to say that this act would necessarily by implication authorize the Board of Fund Commissioners to resort to extreme methods to sell in the first instance, but what we do mean is that the law imposes upon them a duty to perform to meet an emergency; that if such board exhausts the usual means of exercising the power (as has been done in this case), then there is a clearly implied power to make such reasonable contracts for the securing of purchasers as the judgment of such board dictates, and in such contracts to provide for the payment of a reasonable sum for the aid given in finding and procuring purchasers willing to buy such bonds from the board at a price not less than par.

Let us take the other side of the question. Suppose the Board of Fund Commissioners had advertised for purchasers. Suppose that such board had received bids for all of the issue at par. Suppose the judgment of the said board, in consideration of the condition of the money market, was such that they thought, in the exercise of their discretion, better bids could be gotten if they could interest some large financial agent with a nation-wide clientele, and would, in the exercise of their discretion, contract with such agent to pay him a commission on the bonds sold at the rate of 4.21 per cent if such agent would find for such board a purchaser or purchasers who would take the bonds at 5 per cent above par, would it be the duty of such board to employ these means? We think so. If it had made such a contract, would it be beyond the spirit of these several acts? We think not. In both instances the board would simply be exercising a power incidental to and a part of the general power granted. If the supposed contract would not be void for want of power, the threatened contract cannot be held void for want of power, dealing with statutes which breathe emergency from beginning to end, as we are in this case.

Thus far we have not discussed the case law, but have confined our suggestions to the laws themselves and the rationale thereof. We take next the case law upon the subject.

3. We are not without persuasive case law upon this question. In case of Ft. Edward v. Fish, 156 N. Y. 363, 50 N. E. 973, we have a discussion of implied powers in cases of this kind. That case was a suit to recover back for the village the sum of $1,750 paid to Fish. Fish had bought of the water commissioners of the village $50,000 of bonds of the village at less than par. The commissioners, finding a better purchaser, declined to deliver. The new purchaser refused to buy until Fish's alleged claim was cleared up so that the title would be unquestioned. By way of compromise the commissioners paid Fish the $1,750, and this suit was to recover it back. This is but explanatory, but in the course of the opinion the question before us was discussed. In that case the commissioners were authorized to sell such bonds, but not to sell them "at less than the par value thereof." The power to sell with this limitation was in the case. In this case both the power and the limitation are as in the case at bar. The court in the course of its remarks said: "What were their implied powers? Having made a contract that was expressly prohibited by law, had they implied power to get rid of that contract by a compromise? Implied power can be inferred only from the general scope of the actual power and the necessity of doing something essential to the efficient exercise thereof. The actual power was to borrow money by issuing and selling bonds at not less than par. The express power to issue bonds involved the implied power to pay for engraving, printing, and the like. The express power to sell bonds doubtless carried with it the implied power to pay counsel for an opinion as to the validity of the bonds, as was done in this case, and possibly to pay a commission to brokers for selling the bonds. These expenses were incidental to the duty imposed, and fairly came within the scope of the main power. But from what is the power to make the compromise in question to be implied? The contract was void and could not be enforced. There was no implied power to get rid of it, for, being void, it could not stand alone in court and any effort to enforce it would meet with defeat."

It will be observed that the court holds that from the express power to sell followed these implied powers: (1) To contract for printing, engraving, and the like; (2) to pay counsel for an opinion on the bonds; and (3) to pay a commission to brokers for selling the bonds. It will be noticed that the latter is not emphasized in this opinion because it was not involved in that case.

But we have a later case in which this question is involved, and which cites with approval this doctrine. In this later case of Armstrong v. Ft. Edward, 159 N. Y. 315, 53 N. E. 1116, Parker, Ch. J., quoted with approval the language we have quoted above. In the Armstrong Case the plaintiff was suing for commission alleged to be due him for selling waterworks bonds. The same power to sell existed as in the Fish Case. In fact, the same bonds were sold. The water commissioners were charged with the sale as in the Fish Case. Armstrong lost his case, both in the lower court and in the supreme court, but the judgment was reversed by the court of appeals. In the course of his opinion, Chief Justice Parker said: "The contract that was declared void in the case of Ft. Edward v. Fish, 150 N. Y. 363, 50 N. E. 973, related to a portion of the bonds that this plaintiff claims to have assisted in selling. While the question there presented is a very different one from that involved in this case, nevertheless this court did have occasion to consider the implied powers of the water commissioners.

Said the court, at page 372: "The actual power was to borrow money by issuing and selling bonds at not less than par. The express power to issue bonds involved the implied power, to pay for engraving, printing, and the like. The express power to sell bonds doubtless carried with it the implied power to pay counsel for an opinion as to the validity of the bonds, as was done in this case, and possibly to pay a commission to brokers for selling the bonds. These expenses were incidental to the duty imposed, and fairly came within the scope of the main power." This last case calls attention to the rule by which the authority of officers, such as the members of this board of water commissioners, to make contracts, may be determined. Where there is an express grant of power to them, it carries with it, by necessary implication, every other power needful and proper to the execution of the power expressly granted. The authority to sell water bonds therefore carries with it the authority to secure such reasonable and proper assistance as may be requisite to bring about an advantageous sale of the bonds. It is suggested that the rule permits the employment of brokers only to sell the bonds, but it is not so confined. It was not a broker that was selected in New York v. Sands, 105 N. Y. 210, 11 N. E. 820, and it quite frequently happens that men who are not brokers, and never have been, have such relations that they can dispose of bonds fully as advantageously as brokers. Those having charge of the selling of bonds have the right to exercise their discretion in selecting the agencies by which they shall make disposition of them, but in the selection of such agencies it is their duty to exercise their best judgment in the interest of the public whom they serve. The selection, therefore, must be made in good faith and with a fixed purpose to further the interests of the constituency represented."

The italics are ours. In this very case (both cases refer to the same village and the same bonds), the water commissioners were unable to get par, and contracted to sell the $50,000 at less than par, and thereby made the void contract involved in the first suit, but by the assistance of Armstrong actually sold their bonds (including the $50,000 contracted to Fish discussed in the Fish Case) for five per cent above par. It was with reference to this assistance from Armstrong that these remarks were made. In the Armstrong Case, supra, Chief Justice Parker also said: "(1) Did the board of water commissioners have the power to employ the plaintiff? (2) Did the plaintiff assist in bringing about the sale? (3) If he did, were the services performed with the understanding between the board and himself that he should be paid for them? The answer to the second and third question must be found in the testimony, but the authorities dispose of the first question. New York v. Sands, supra, was an action brought to recover moneys paid to an agent for selling the bonds of the city of New York, the agent being at the time one of the municipal officers, namely, a commissioner of taxes. It was held that the courts will take judicial notice of the fact that, in the sale of bonds and negotiations for loans in behalf of states, municipalities, and governments, aside from their own fiscal agents, other agents are employed, and that the fact that an agent so employed was at the time a city officer did not deprive him of the right to receive and retain the agreed compensation. But it should be observed that, while the agent was a city officer, he was in no wise connected with the department of government charged with the sale and disposition of the bonds. In the course of the opinion, Chief Judge Ruger said: 'It is a matter of public history, of which courts will take judicial notice, that in the sale of bonds and negotiations for loans in behalf of states, municipalities, and governments, the services of their own fiscal agents are usually, if not invariably, supplemented by the employment of bankers, brokers, and other financial agencies to aid in raising moneys for public purposes. During the late war, the Federal government raised large sums by the issue and sale of treasury notes and bonds, which would have been practically difficult, if not impossible, but for the assistance rendered by extraneous financial agencies employed and paid by the secretary of the treasury.' In Brownell v. Greenwich, 114 N. Y. 518, 4 L.R.A. 685, 22 N. E. 24, the court said, in speaking of the action of the commissioners in turning the bonds over to another person for sale: 'It was not necessary that merely executive acts not involving the exercise of discretion should be done by the commissioners personally, but such acts might be done by another under their direction,'—citing New York v. Sands, supra. 'When a statute commands an act to be done, it authorizes all that is necessary for its performance. Hence the commissioners could lawfully employ Mr. Andrews as a broker to sell the bonds and invest the proceeds according to their instructions.'" and therefore indicated that the actual proceeds of the sale might be decreased by necessary expenses which might have to be incurred, and might be "less" than $3,500,000. They wisely provided, however, that the interest accumulating upon this fund should go to and become a part of the fund, which interest will much more than offset the expense of selling the bonds.

It has been held, and we think rightfully, that although there is an express power given to pay a commission for the sale of bonds, yet such power does not authorize the allowance of that commission to a purchaser of the bonds. Whelen's Appeal, 108 Pa. 162, 1 Atl. 88. This case, however, does not reach the question here. In New York v. Sands, supra, we have a full discussion of the question of emergency being an element to be considered in determining the necessity of using outside assistance in procuring the sale of a large bond issue (four times the amount involved here), and other bonds shortly to mature created the emergency for quick action. The emergency there was not greater than the emergency here. That court held, and we think rightfully, that such was properly an element to be considered in determining the powers of the state's sales agents in the method and means to be adopted by them in the sale of such bonds.

In Manitou v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Colo. 344, 86 Pac. 75, we have another case in point. In that case there was given by the statute a general power to sell bonds, but such bonds must "not be sold for less than their face value." The case stated is this: "August 4, 1897, the town of Manitou, through its board of trustees, agreed in writing to pay M. A. Leddy $1,200 for his services in placing or selling at par an issue of its waterworks refunding bonds, amounting to $40,000. An unsuccessful attempt to dispose of the bonds had been previously made." Note that the contract called for a sale at par, and for such sale at par the agent should be paid $1,200. The suit was a contest over the legality of the warrants issued in payment of this $1,200.

The Colorado court, after quoting from the Fish Case, supra, as we have quoted above, said: "We believe that the above states the law to be applied to this case, and that, under the facts disclosed by this record, the contract made by the board of trustees with Mr. Leddy to pay him a commission for his services was within the implied powers of the municipal corporation; that the same was not ultra vires or illegal, and that the warrants issued in payment of the services rendered under the contract were valid and binding obligations of the municipality. We are not without support in this conclusion. The supreme court of Minnesota, discussing the provisions of a statute of that state similar to the provisions of our statute (§ 4548b, supra), in State v. West Duluth Land Co. 75 Minn. 456, at page 467, 78 N. W. 115, said: "Under the provisions of § 4, chapter 289, supra, a sale of the bonds issued thereunder at less than par value was forbidden. The bonds now under consideration, $140,000 in amount, were turned over to a broker for sale under a written contract with the board of county commissioners. In this contract, it was stipulated that the broker should pay for lithographing and printing the blank bonds, for legal advice and services, and all other expenses incident to a sale, for which, and as compensation in full, he was to receive the sum of $14,000,—10 per cent of the face value of the bonds sold. On these facts we are asked to hold that there was a plain violation of § 4, and that the bonds are void. There might be cases where the facts would very conclusively show that an agreed compensation of ten per cent for the sale of the bonds was a palpable evasion of such a section, but we have no such case before us. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that, under the conditions of this contract, there was a violation of § 4, which forbids a sale of the bonds at less than par.'" The case from Minnesota relied upon by that court was in point there, and it is likewise in point here.

We are therefore of opinion (1) that the whole issue of $3,500,000 bonds in this case is fully authorized by the Constitution; (2) that the legislative acts relating thereto are within constitutional bounds; (3) that the several legislative acts have been fully complied with; (4) that the facts of this case show a full and adequate effort upon the part of the Board of Fund Commissioners to sell these bonds without outside assistance; and (5) that under such facts there is, from the legislative acts, supra, a clearly implied power which authorizes such board to enter into a contract with some financial agent to procure for such board a purchaser or purchasers who will take such bonds at their par value, and in such contract to agree to pay and pay such agent, out of the proceeds of the sale, a reasonable commission for the services rendered.

The plaintiff by his petition states that the commission mentioned is a reasonable commission. The demurrer, of course, admits that fact. Upon that question we need not pass. The real purpose of this proceeding is to test the question as to whether or not a commission can be paid by the 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Board of Fund Commissioners to some financial agent for procuring purchasers for these bonds. It was so argued orally and is so briefed. We hold that the Board of Fund Commissioners have the right to contract to pay a reasonable commission for such services. Such board must exercise its best discretion in that matter. It is the duty of the board to get as favorable a contract as it can, all things considered. In such board is lodged a limited discretion which must be used in the interest of the state in the dealings which it has in connection with the subject-matter embraced in these several legislative acts. Such discretion must be used by the board in determining the reasonableness of the commission to be paid. From all this, it follows that the judgment, nisi, was right, and it is affirmed.

All concur, except Brown, J., who concurs in the first paragraph of the opinion, but dissents to the remainder thereof, and the result; Lamm, J., concurs in a separate opinion.

Lamm, J., concurring:

The close question in the case is that discussed in the second paragraph relating to the right to pay a commission to expert brokers in touch with barreled-up money seeking investment. As to the legality of the bonds, decided by the first paragraph, we all agree. There are other questions discussed in the second paragraph relating to other incidental outlays, on which there is no divergence of opinion, but the shoe pinches, as said, on the right to pay a broker's commission to aid in procuring a par buyer.

It was argued that the right to pay such commission was necessarily implied in any bond issue for city, state, school, road, drainage, or any other purpose for which an issue of bonds is provided by statutes or charters, unless the payment of such commission is directly forbidden by law. That is, that the officers, agents, or municipalities selling such bonds had the implied power to pay such commission in every case of a bond issue where the power is not expressly denied. That is a dangerous doctrine I do not subscribe to, and the opinion of my brother does not adopt that view of it. It may be some of the cases and authorities cited, in a broad way, sustain that contention, or head that way, but our brother's opinion stands on all of the facts of this particular case. The salient fact is a crying emergency in this state demanding a strong and quick remedy. All of the acts in pari materia show that such emergency must be read into the legislative purpose, and breathes in every line. The records of this state are menaced by destruction from fire unless safely housed in suitable vaults. To that controlling emergency may be added other subsidiary facts and indications in aid of the opinion got at by analysis of the terms of the statutes, as shown by the opinion.

It was argued that we should hold a specific proposed contract with a named brokerage firm at a named figure would be legal. But the opinion does not hold that the board is authorized to make any specific contract with any specific broker at any named price. It holds, as I read it, that the board has authority to make some reasonable contract with some suitable brokers to assist in the sale of the bonds, if such assistance is necessary, and only then. The Board of Fund Commissioners is rightly left to judge of that necessity, as their informed judgments acting under the solemn sanction of their several official oaths may direct. They must assume and carry the responsibility for the proper exercise of the discretion we find is lodged in them.

It was argued that, if we sustained the right of this board to pay a commission, hereafter no public bonds of any sort would be sold in this state without paying a commission, and scandals would arise over unnecessary losses suffered by the people. But the opinion opens no door for such mischief to enter and vex the people, for its language must be read with the peculiar existing facts creating a present emergency whereby a remedy became necessary. I think the power to pay a commission springs only from an emergency creating such necessity, and that such necessity is within the intendment of the statutes.

It was further argued that, if we sustained the power of this board to pay a commission, then the board would at once proceed to do so on the theory that the facts exist at this immediate time requiring the board to pay such commission. In other words, the board, armed with or incited by our opinion, would cease all efforts on its own part to make a sale, and would at once contract to pay for the aid of brokers holding an "open sesame" to hoarded money. That it would make no further effort by personal interviews or advertisements on individual efforts in the east or elsewhere where bond investments are sought and interest runs low.

But that is an argument to be addressed to the board, and the matter rests with their judgment and their conscience. It may safely rest there. The opinion does not tell them to stop all effort to sell the bonds without paying a commission, and the honorable officers charged with the duty of selling these bonds doubtless will exhaust every sensible or available means of avoiding the payment of a commission. The presumption is they will do their duty, and pay none except as a last resort when they are at the end of their row.

For these reasons, and those stated by my brother, I concur.

Graves, Ferriss, Woodson, and Ken-nish, JJ., concur in this concurrence.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

ANN SHUGRUE et al.

v.

RICHARD H. LONG et al., Pliffs. in Err.

Wills — rule in Shelley's Case — devise to heirs.

1. Where there is a devise in trust to pay the net income to A for life, with a discretionary power in the trustees to use part of such income to pay off a mortgage encumbrance upon the land, and, after the death of A, a devise in fee simple to her "heirs at law," held, that the testator used the words "heirs at law" to designate the persons who at the time of A's death would be her heirs at law, and that consequently the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply.

Same — legal and equitable estates.

2. Where the particular estate for life devised is equitable and the remainder in fee is the legal estate, the rule in Shelley's Case cannot operate to increase the equitable life estate into a legal estate in fee simple.

Same — statutory provision.

3. A devise in the language of the 10th section of the statute of descents (2 Comp. Stat. 1910, p. 1921) would, in the absence of that section, have invoked the rule in Shelley's Case. Where, therefore, as in this case, the form of the devise would not have given rise to the application of that rule, the 10th section of the statute of descents will also be inapplicable.

Note. — The rule in Shelley's Case is treated at length in the note in 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 963, the particular question presented, when the life estate is equitable and the remainder in fee is legal, being discussed at pages 1025 et seq.

Mr. John Milton, for plaintiffs in error:

At common law the rule in Shelley's Case would have applied to the devise in question, and vested in Mary McBride (the first taker) an estate in fee simple.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment, tried in the supreme court at the Hudson circuit before Judge Vail without a jury upon a stipulated state of facts, to recover possession of real estate (No. 132 Newark avenue) in Jersey City. The plaintiffs are the sister and the children of a deceased sister of Mary McBride; they being or including the persons who were at the time of her death her heirs at law. The defendants are the devisees under the will of Mary McBride, or those claiming under such devisees. The question in controversy is the application or nonapplication of the rule in Shelley's Case, and arises under the will of Matthew Brady, the father of Mary McBride, which provided as follows:

"Fifth. I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said executors and the survivors of them all my real estate in trust upon the following terms: . . .

"2d. To collect all the rents and revenues of the premises owned by me and known as No. 132 Newark avenue, in Jersey City aforesaid, and after payment of the water rents, interest on the mortgage, insurance and repairs, and other proper charges and expenses to apply the net revenues thereof towards the support and maintenance of my beloved daughter Mary, the wife of Hugh McBride, during her natural life, hereby giving to my said executors the discretion to save out of said revenue a part thereof so as to accumulate a fund to pay off the one-half part of the mortgage, now upon said premises and the premises adjoining, and after the payment of said mortgage, to pay over the whole of said revenue to my said daughter Mary, during the term of her natural life."

(Third and Fourth. Authority given to collect rents of 130 Newark avenue and 482 Grove street, forming no part of the premises in question.)

"5th. After the death of my said daughter Mary McBride, I give, devise, and bequeath my said lot of land and premises known as No. 132 Newark avenue in Jersey City, aforesaid, unto the heirs at law of my said daughter Mary McBride."

At the time of the death of Matthew Brady, the testator, in 1878, Mary McBride had one son living, but he died unmarried and without issue in 1907, three years before her death, which occurred in 1910.

The plaintiffs claim under ¶ 5 of the 5th section of the will of Matthew Brady as remaindermen in fee after an equitable life estate in Mary McBride under ¶ 2 of the same section; whereas, the defendants contend that, by virtue of the rule in Shelley's Case, Mary McBride took an estate in fee simple under said two paragraphs, and consequently had the complete power to devise the property in question in fee simple, as she did, to defendants. Judge Vail, holding that the rule in Shelley's Case had no application, decided in favor of the plaintiffs, and the present writ is to review that decision.

The apt and technical words of limitation to create an estate in fee simple are "heirs forever" or, what means the same thing, "heirs," and consequently a devise to "A and his heirs forever" or to "A and his heirs" is exactly the same in legal effect as a devise to "A in fee simple." If therefore the devise in one clause of a will is "to A for life" (or other freehold), and then in the same or another clause of the same will there is a remainder to his "heirs," the latter is in effect a direction that at the exact instant of time when in death the spark of life shall pass from A's body he shall take an estate in fee simple in the same land, and as a consequence, by virtue of the rule in Shelley's Case, the law gives him an estate in fee simple from the first; that is, from the time of the vesting in him of the so-called life estate. When, however, after the devise to "A for life" the other provision of the will is that at A's death the land is devised in fee simple directly from the testator, and not as descending from A, to some designated or described persons other than A, the rule can have absolutely no application, and it is quite immaterial if in naming such other persons the testator, in order to designate them, has described them as the persons who at the moment of A's death were his "heirs," provided it is entirely clear from a reading of the whole will that the use of the word "heirs" was to designate certain persons to take directly from the testator, and not by descent from A, as contradistinguished from that inheriting line theoretically springing and descending from A and extending through all time "forever," which is comprised in the technical meaning of the word "heirs" and whose only real effect or existence is as a measure of the quantity of estate in the land in question of which A died seised. While, therefore, it is well settled that the rule in Shelley's Case is absolutely and peremptorily controlling as "a rule of property," whenever it appears that the limitation over is to the "heirs," taking as such "heirs," of the life tenant, quite irrespective of the desire or direction of the testator that the first taker should take only a life estate (Lippincott v. Davis, 59 N. J. L. 241, 28 Atl. 587), nevertheless if it appears that the testator did not use the word "heirs" in this, its technical sense, but, on the contrary, used it as a mere descriptio personarum of the objects of his, the testator's, own direct bounty, the rule has no application whatsoever. Hargrave, Law Tracts, 574-576; Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 188. What will indicate such use by the testator of the word "heirs" in the latter and popular, as distinguished from its technical, sense, must necessarily vary in different cases.

In Peer v. Hennion, 77 N. J. L. 693, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 945, 76 Atl. 1084, the testator, after devising certain lands to his daughter Catherine, provided as follows: "The said lands heretofore given by me to my daughter Catherine are given for and during her natural life; and after her decease I do give and devise the said lands to such person or persons as shall be her heir or heirs of land held by her in fee simple." This language was held by this court to have been used by the testator to designate certain persons to be ascertained at the time of Catherine's death as objects of his direct bounty, and not as applying to Catherine's entire line of future heirs to the end of time, and consequently the rule in Shelley's Case was held to have no application. In Martling v. Martling, 55 N. J. Eq. 771, 39 Atl. 203, the conveyance was in fee to trustees in trust to permit the life tenant to receive and enjoy the rents and profits during her natural life, free from control by her husband, and in trust to sell and convey in fee simple at the direction of said life tenant, substituting the proceeds in the trust in place of the land so sold, and, upon the death of the life tenant, in trust to convey the unsold lands and to turn over the proceeds of the lands which had been sold to the appointee of the life tenant, or, in default of appointment, to "her heirs at law or next of kin, as may be." The fact that the proceeds of a sale of real estate made during the lifetime of the life tenant were not to be paid to her, but were to continue in the trust, and at her death, in the absence of appointment by her, were to be paid to her "next of kin," moved this court to the view, as expressed in the opinion by Justice Depue, that, "construing this trust from all the limitations and provisions contained in it, it is clear that the terms 'heirs at law' and 'next of kin' in providing for the ultimate destination of the estate, although the disjunctive 'or' intervenes, should receive the same construction as to the point of time when these two classes of beneficiaries respectively are to be ascertained, and that the words 'heirs at law' as well as 'next of kin' should be construed to mean persons who either as heirs at law or next of kin come into existence at Mrs. Martling's [the life tenant's] death." In this opinion the classic doctrine laid down by Mr. Hargrave (Hargrave, Law Tracts, 576), and commended by Mr. Fearne (Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 188), was cited with approval, as follows: "If it shall be decided that the testator or donor did not mean, by the words of inheritance after the estate for life, to use such words in their full and proper sense, did not mean to involve the whole line of heirs to the tenant for life, and to include the whole of his inheritable blood, did not mean to engraft a succession on his preceding estate, and to make him the ancestor terminus for the heirs; but, instead of this, intended to use the word 'heirs' in a limited, restrictive, and untechnical sense, intended to point at such individual person, as should be the heir, or heir of the body, of the tenant for life at the moment of his decease, intended to give a distinct estate of freehold to such single heir, and to make his or her estate of freehold the groundwork for a succession of heirs, to constitute him or her the ancestor terminus and stock for the succession to take its course from,—in every one of these cases the premises are wanting upon which only the rule in Shelley's Case interposes its authority."

Another indication established by text-writers and decisions of a use by a testator of the word "heirs" as a word of purchase, and not as a word of limitation, occurs where the life estate is only an equitable estate, and the remainder is a legal estate. Thus where property is devised under an active trust for the benefit of a life tenant, and then the legal estate is devised at the death of the life tenant direct to his heirs, the word "heirs" cannot be taken to have been used to indicate a succession of inheritance of the legal estate from the life tenant, because the life tenant never held the legal estate. Mr. Fearne in his work on Contingent Remainders (page 52) states this proposition as a rule as follows: "I shall now proceed to observe that where the estate limited to the ancestor is merely an equitable or trust estate, and that to his heirs, etc., carries the legal estate, they will not incorporate into an estate of inheritance in the ancestor, as (in general) would have been the case, if they had been both of one quality; that is, both legal or both equitable." Numerous cases are cited by Mr. Fearne in support of this rule, the leading one being Jones and Lord Say and Seal, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 383, C. 4 which he states and comments on as follows: "Where a testatrix devised certain real estate to trustees and their heirs upon trust and in confidence, in the first place, out of the rents and profits thereof to pay the several legacies, devises, and bequests thereafter mentioned, and then (after giving several annuities for life) she appointed her trustees to pay all the rest and residue of the rents and profits of the premises to the proper hands of her daughter C. F., or as she by any writing, etc., should appoint, for and during the term of her natural life, and after her (the said daughter's) decease the trustees to stand seised of the premises to the use of the heirs of the body of her said daughter C. F. severally and successively as they should happen to be in priority of birth and seniority of age, and the heirs of their respective bodies in tail general, subject to the payment of the several annuities, and in case of failure of the issue of the body of her said daughter C. F. then to the use of Lady J. After the decease of the testatrix, C. F. and her husband suffered a recovery of the lands, and she afterwards died without issue. Upon her decease, Lady J. claimed the lands under the will by virtue of the remainder thereby limited to her. It was contended for the plaintiff (Lady J.) that C. F. took only a trust estate for life by the will, with a contingent remainder to the heirs of her body in tail general. That the direction to the trustees to pay the residue of the rents, etc., to the proper hands of C. F., who was a married woman, gave her a mere trust, and not a use executed by the statute. It was a trust for her separate use, and to construe it a use executed would be to subject it to the power and control of her husband. That the subsequent limitation to the heirs of her body severally, etc., was a use executed by the statute, and could not be consolidated with the precedent trust limited to C. F. for life, so as to create an estate tail in her. That the subsequent words, in case of failure of issue of the body of C. F., then to Lady J., etc., did not create an estate tail in C. F. by implication, nor enlarge the precedent estate, because no legal estate vested in C. F. on the other side, it was contended that the legal estate passed to the trustees and their heirs; and, if it passed in fee, then all the subsequent uses were uses upon a use, and consequently trusts not executed by the statute; and, if the estate given to C. F. for life and the subsequent limitation to the heirs of her body were both trusts, they might be consolidated together and create an equitable estate tail, and that in this case, either both the estates were executed or neither. But Lord Chancellor King was of opinion that by the words of the will the use was executed in the trustees and their heirs during the life of C. F., and that she had only a trust in the surplus of the rents and profits during her life; but that by the subsequent words, viz., that the trustees should stand seised to the use of the heirs of the body of C. F. subject to the payment of the annuities, etc., the use was executed in the persons entitled to take by virtue thereof, chargeable with the payment of the annuities, and therefore there being only a trust estate in the ancestor, and a use executed in the heirs of her body, those different interests could not unite, so as to create an estate tail by operation of law in the ancestor, and he decreed accordingly for the plaintiff." This rule seems also to have been passively approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Vogt v. Graff (1912) 222 U. S. 404, 56 L. ed. 249, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 134, where it is stated in the syllabus of the case that "the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply where the particular estate is equitable, and the estate in remainder legal."

Coming now to the present case, we find that the trust estate in favor of the life tenant, Mary McBride, is not only a trust in the trustees to collect and apply the net income, after the payment of water rents, mortgage interest, insurance, and repairs and other proper charges, towards the support and maintenance of the life tenant, but that there is also vested in the trustees an absolute discretion to reserve a part of said net income for the purpose of discharging a mortgage encumbrance against the property in question. This discretion thus reposed in the trustees is certainly quite inconsistent with the idea of an absolute fee simple in the life tenant, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) and would, of course, be completely destroyed by the creation of such an estate in her. Then, when we come to the subsequent paragraph wherein the testator, after the death of the life tenant, disposes of the remainder, we find that he does so not only in the form, "I give, devise, and bequeath," which he would naturally use in making a direct devise to definite persons, but he names the objects of his bounty as the "heirs at law" of his said daughter, the trust life tenant, thus seeming to indicate persons who at the time of her death would be her heirs at law. These expressions taken in conjunction with the evident purpose of the testator, as indicated by the previous paragraph (No. 2), wherein the trust life estate with the discretion in the trustees is created, and also in connection with the fact that the life tenant held only an equitable estate out of which her heirs, of course, could not inherit from her a fee, lead us to the conclusion that the testator used the words "heir at law" as a designatio personarum, and that consequently the rule in Shelley's Case cannot be applied.

A suggestion has been made, in which counsel both for the plaintiffs and for the defendants appear heartily to agree, that the 10th section of the statute of descents (2 Comp. Stat. 1910, p. 1921) has no application to this case. With this view we are also in accord. A devise in the language of that section before its enactment would clearly have invoked the rule in Shelley's Case, and, as the language or form of the devise in the present case is not subject to the application of that rule, the statute is necessarily equally inapplicable.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

FRANCES DENT GROSS

v.

CECIL GROSS, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 73 S. E. 961.)

Appeal and error — bill of exceptions — transcript of evidence — identification.

1. A vacation order of a judge certifies the presentation to him of bills of exception and a transcript of all the evidence, and certifies that for identification the bills were numbered as bills of exception by a number to each, and that the certificate of evidence was marked "Certificate of Evidence," and certifies that the bills were signed, and that the certificate of evidence was also signed by the judge, and the order says that bills and certificates were ordered to be made a part of the record. The bills refer to the "Certificate of Evidence" as part of them. The "Certificate of Evidence" is part of the record, and brings the evidence before this court.

Husband and wife — alienation of affections — action by wife.

2. A wife, though the husband be living, has the right of action in her sole name for wrongful alienation of her husband's affection, causing his separation from her.

Same — malice — burden of proof.

3. A father is liable to his son's wife for alienating the affection of the son from his wife, and causing him to separate from her, if the father is moved by malice towards the wife and without good faith and honest purpose and good motive for the welfare of his son. If his action is without malice, and springs only from what he honestly believes to be necessary for the welfare of his son, he is not liable; and the presumption is that he acts without malice and with such good motive until the contrary appears, and the burden is on the wife to show malice and absence of such good motive.

At common law a married woman could not maintain a suit of this character, because by her marriage her identity was completely merged in that of her husband, and a recovery would be a recovery for the husband, in his name; and while this is true, yet at common law a recovery might be had in some classes of cases in the joint names of the husband and wife, where the wife was the meritorious cause of action, such as in cases of assault and battery committed upon the wife, yet the recovery, when had, became and was the property of the husband alone.

Brannon, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Frances Dent Gross brought an action of trespass on the case in the circuit court of Randolph county against her father-in-law, Cecil Gross, charging him with having alienated the affection of her husband, Ivan Victor Gross, and inducing him to separate from her, and she recovered a verdict and judgment for $12,500, and Cecil Gross comes to this court for relief.

It is contended that no bill of exceptions brings the evidence before us so that we can review the case. The order of the judge says that the defendant presented fifteen bills of exception and also a transcript of all the evidence, and for their identification numbers the bills, and states that the transcript is marked "Certificate of Evidence," and orders that bills and said "Certificate of Evidence" be made part of the record. This certificate of evidence, so marked, is found in the record, and bills of exception, about which as parts of the record no question can be made, refer to it as "Certificate of Evidence." Thus this evidence has a distinct earmark of identification in the order of the judge and in bills of exception, so that there can be no difficulty in finding it. The point is technical and unsubstantial, too much so to shut a suitor out of court. State v. Legg, 59 W. Va. 315, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1152, 53 S. E. 545; Hughes v. Frum, 41 W. Va. 445, 23 S. E. 604; Kay v. Glade Creek & R. Co. 47 W. Va. 467, 35 S. E. 973.

Does the declaration show good cause of action? As one ground of demurrer, it is said that, the declaration showing the plaintiff to be a married woman, she cannot sue in her own name. Here we meet with a question somewhat difficult, more so than at first it appeared to me. The authorities differ somewhat. By the common law the suit for a tort to the wife could not be sued by her alone, by preponderance of authority. This was on account of unity of husband and wife placing her under disability; but we have a statute saying that "a married woman may sue or be sued in any court of law or chancery." Is such a demand as this arising from tort, a mere claim for unliquidated damages, a property right, so as to be considered a separate estate of the wife? If so, there is no difficulty in saying that she may sue to enforce it under that statute giving her full capacity to sue. I think, with some hesitation, that it is a property right, as held in Jaynes v. Jaynes

39 Hun, 40. It has been held otherwise. Gibson v. Gibson, 43 Wis. 23, 28 Am. Rep. 532. It is true that it does not seem comprehended by §§ 1, 2 and 3 of chapter 66 of Code 1906. It is not property acquired "by inheritance or by gift, grant, devise, or bequest." It is a right to demand money. It must be in favor of someone. This tort was to the wife's injury. She is the meritorious cause of action. By the common law action for tort injurious to the wife must be by husband and wife. The right was in the wife, but, owing to disability, she could not sue alone. 1 Minor's Inst. 387. It is suggested that § 13 of chapter 66 specifies three cases where the married woman may be sued alone one being where the action concerns her separate property, and it is said that this § 13 limits the right of action under § 15, and must be read with it; but those two sections have different functions, one giving the right of action to the wife to sue in her own name, the other gives right to sue the wife without joining her husband,—two different purposes. I do not see how § 13 has anything to do with a suit by the wife, since it touches only suits against a married woman, and does not give action in her favor. We think that § 15 should be given a liberal construction to enable a married woman to sue, and that § 3 should be liberally construed to make such a demand separate property. The old rules of the common law laid down centuries gone, making the wife the inferior, practically a slave, have become wholly distasteful to enlightened public sentiment, and from statute and refusal of many courts to follow them have "gone glimmering through the dream of things that were, the school boy's tale, the wonder of an hour." The rule saying that for a tort against the wife she could not sue during wedlock, but could do so after its close, arose from the old rule stated by Blackstone thus: "The inferior hath no kind of property in the company, care, or assistance of the superior, as the superior is held to have in those of the inferior, and therefore the inferior can suffer no loss or injury." 3 Bl. Com. 143. The old rule made the two persons a unit, and sunk the individuality of the woman in the individuality of the man. Her property rights were sunk largely. Therefore she could not alone sue to enforce her right. But in our day, when we look at not merely the letter, but the purpose, of acts giving the wife separate estate, and right to sue, and modern decisions, we conclude that old rules have perished, that a wife is not the legal inferior, but the equal, of the husband. Reflect that in sustaining the wife's capacity to sue we only say that her incapacity to sue for a tort affecting her was only a disability to sue during wedlock, and that is removed by a broad statute giving her absolute right to sue. We do not go far. We do not legislate. The legislature has plainly legislated this result by fair construction of the letter and spirit of its acts. There are older cases denying the right of a married woman to sue for alienation of the affection of her husband. Duffies v. Duffies, 76 Wis. 374, 8 L.R.A. 420, 20 Am. St. Rep. 79, 45 N. W. 522; and Doe v. Roe, 82 Me. 503, 8 L.R.A. 833, 17 Am. St. Rep. 499, 20 Atl. 83. But in later days since the separate estate acts protecting the property of the wife, many many cases assert this right of action in the wife. Cooley on Torts, 475, says that twenty states concede this right of action to the wife in her own name. For the proposition that such action lies, I cite Tiffany on Domestic Relations, 78; note in 94 Am. Dec. 593; note in 20 Am. St. Rep. 88; Williams v. Williams, 20 Colo. 57, 37 Pac. 614; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 864; Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 621, 32 Am. Rep. 397; Jaynes v. Jaynes, 39 Hun, 40; Gerner v. Gerner, 185 Pa. 233, 39 Atl. 884, 40 L.R.A. 549, 64 Am. St. Rep. 646, and note. I refer particularly to the well-considered case of Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L.R.A. 553, 23 N. E. 17. It holds that whilst, before the late statute of New York providing that "in an action or special proceeding a married woman appears, prosecutes, or defends alone or joined with other parties, as if she were single," the action had to be in the name of the husband and wife, yet that statute would entitle the wife to an action in her own name for the alienation of the affection of her husband. Our statute is to the same effect as the New York statute. As said above, if this demand is separate property, there can be no question that the wife can sue alone; but, even if we cannot regard it as separate property, then I would say that § 15, giving her right to sue, even if this demand be not property, it is an actionable right springing from a wrong to her, and she has a right to sue. That section alone vests in her power to sue, and thus abolishes former laws disabling her to sue alone because of the unity of husband and wife. This was so held in Beach v. Brown, 20 Wash. 266, 43 L.R.A. 114, 72 Am. St. Rep. 98, 55 Pac. 46, and Seaver v. Adams, 66 N. H. 142, 19 Atl. 776, 49 Am. St. Rep. 597, and cases in note. Some cases hold that without an enabling statute the wife may sue alone. Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 6 L.R.A. 829, 18 Am. St. Rep. 258, 18 Atl. 1027; Williams v. Williams, 20 Colo. 57, 37 Pac. 614. There is reason why we should not expect the husband to unite in a suit against his father. And generally why should not a wife sue alone for such a wrong? Should the old unjust rule of the common law still prevail, allowing a husband to sue and pocket the proceeds? It is undoubted that a husband may sue for the seduction of his wife, and there is no reason why the wife should not have equal right to sue for seduction of her husband. The ground of action is the loss of consortium.

A second ground presented to sustain the demurrer is that the declaration should state that Cecil Gross is father of Ivan Gross, and allege that the defendant's act was not actuated by parental solicitude for the welfare of the son, and that it is not enough to charge malice, as in the case of a stranger, but the declaration must also negative good motive on the part of the father. We do not see that these points are tenable. It is enough to charge malice. This contention is rested on the law universally stated, that a parent is not liable for causing his child to separate from husband or wife, if the counsel given the child is such as he fairly and honestly considered to be called for by the life or health or welfare of his child. This is a favor shown to a parent, the law realizing the impulse of a father for an unfortunate child. To justify recovery, the plaintiff carries the burden of showing malice and of overcoming the presumption that he acted under the influence of natural affection, and for what he believed to be for the real good of the child. He may lawfully do so, if he honestly believes that the continuance of the marriage relation will injure health or mind, or destroy peace of mind, even though it turn out that he acted on mistaken premises or false information, and that the result of his intervention has been unfortunate. The rule is more liberal to the parent than to a stranger. Multer v. Knibbs, 193 Mass. 556, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 322, 79 N. E. 762, 9 Ann. Cas. 958. "In every suit of this character the prime inquiry is, from what motive did the father act? Was it malicious, or was it inspired by proper parental regard for the welfare and happiness of the child?" Tucker v. Tucker, 74 Miss. 93, 32 L.R.A. 623, 19 So. 955. The act must be shown to be malicious, "as all legal presumptions, in such cases, are that the parent will act only for the best interests of the child." Reed v. Reed, 6 Ind. App. 317, 51 Am. St. Rep. 310, 33 N. E. 638; Brown v. Brown, 124 N. C. 19, 70 Am. St. Rep. 574, 32 S. E. 320. In an early leading case on this subject (Hutcheson v. Peck, 5 Johns. 196), the great Chancellor Kent said: "If the defendant did not stand in the relation of father to the plaintiff's wife, I should not, perhaps, be inclined to interfere with the verdict. But that relationship gives the case a new and peculiar interest. . . . A father's house is always open to his children, and, whether they be married or unmarried, it is still to them a refuge from evil, and a consolation in distress. Natural affection establishes and consecrates this asylum, . . . and, according to Lord Coke, it is 'nature's provision to assist, maintain, and console the child.' I should require, therefore, more proof to sustain the action against the father than against a stranger. It ought to appear, either that he detains the wife against her will, or that he entices her away from her husband from improper motives. Bad or unworthy motives cannot be presumed. They ought to be positively shown, or necessarily deduced from the facts and circumstances detailed. . . . The quo animo ought, then, in this case to have been made the test of inquiry and the rule of decision." Whilst such is the law, I think it sufficient to charge, as the declaration in this case does, that the defendant, "contriving wilfully, knowingly, wrongfully, unjustly, and maliciously intending to injure, prejudice, and aggrieve the plaintiff" in her enjoyment of the companionship, aid, society, comfort, protection, and happiness derived from her husband, did the acts.

There are a great many bills of exceptions and assignments of error. We have considerably gone over them. We have not found reversible error in evidence admitted or rejected. It is useless to detail it. Nor have we found error in instructions. As we have sought in this opinion to state the law applicable in such a case, we shall not incorporate the mass of instructions, as they do but reflect the law above stated. We think the court fairly and clearly presented the law suited to the case, leaving it to the jury to pass on the evidence. The court refused a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendant, and overruled a motion for a new trial, and overruled a motion to render judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto. Thus we are called upon to say whether the verdict is warranted by the evidence. Here we state that this depends on a large volume of oral evidence, consisting of the conduct and action of the parties, letters, conversation, a great array of circumstances, and conflicting oral evidence. A verdict in such circumstance is well nigh conclusive. A verdict on evidence, not violating law, approved by a judge, is virtually above the touch of an appellate tribunal. On this principle, spoken by so many precedents, this court acts in the present case. The jury found the action of the father malicious and without good motive. We are asked also to set aside the verdict for excessive damages. Here, again, we are confronted with that verdict. The law gives a jury in the matter of amount of damages in tort cases, where the damages are indeterminate, measured by no fixed measure or rule, almost unlimited discretion. Unless we can clearly find that bias, prejudice, passion, or corruption animated a jury, its estimate must stand. It is hard to fix such an imputation. So, in favor of the plaintiff stands that bulwark, the verdict, sometimes the bulwark of justice, sometimes of error and oppression. Speaking only for myself, I doubt whether the jury accorded to the defendant the favor allowed him by law as a parent in the distressing circumstances surrounding him. His son had been in a hospital from a three months' period of typhoid fever. He came from it weak in body, weak in mind, suffering from post typhoid insanity. He suffered from acute Bright's disease, and from orchitis, an ailment of the testicle. He had been nursed while in the hospital by the plaintiff, a young girl. A few days after leaving the hospital they were married, without knowledge of Ivan's family. Continuing ailing, he went for a few weeks' rest to visit a brother in Indiana. When he returned, he resumed work, clerking at his father's lumber plant, but unable to do the work. Leaving his wife at his father's home in Randolph county, he went to Pennsylvania to visit sisters of a former wife, who kept his three children by that wife; and while there was visited by his father; and while there he wrote his wife that the marriage was void, that she had taken advantage of him while weak in body and mind, and allured him into a marriage, and notified her of cessation of marriage relations. The father was in far off Oregon when this letter was written. No doubt the jury had the right to say that the father assented to this absence, or advised it. He knew of the son's condition. Two physicians, the hospital physician and one in Pennsylvania, as well as other persons, had told the father that continuance of married relations would either retard the son's recovery, or permanently ruin body and mind. I doubt whether the jury gave Gross the right of a father. I doubt whether the proof does overcome the presumption of law that a parent acts under such conditions honestly, with good faith, moved by parental love. I doubt whether the evidence comes up to the standard fixed by law. "The measure of proof must be exceedingly high." Beisel v. Ger- 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) lach, 221 Pa. 232, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 516, 70 Atl. 721. Speaking again for myself, it seems to me that the damages found are heavy, almost confiscatory. If the defendant had murderously slain the plaintiff, her father could not have recovered beyond $10,000. Under the circumstances, and there are those mitigating, I would say that the verdict is heavy. If on the jury, I would not have found it; but there it is. We are led to affirm the judgment.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, Appt.,
v.
R. F. RICE.

(158 N. C. 635, 74 S. E. 582.)

Municipal corporations — extraterritorial jurisdiction — form of government.

1. Statutory authority to exercise police power over territory outside their corporate limits is applicable to municipal corporations which are under commission form of government with initiative, referendum, and recall.

Same — forbidding keeping of hogs — authority.

2. Statutory authority to make rules for the preservation of health includes power to forbid the keeping of hogs within the territory over which the municipal authority has jurisdiction.

(Walker and Allen, JJ., dissent.)

(April 10, 1912.)

Note. — Power of municipality to prohibit keeping of live stock.

As to the power of municipal corporation to prevent stock yards within city limits, see note to Colton v. South Dakota Central Land Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 122.

As to right of municipal corporation to prohibit the keeping, standing, or exhibition of stallions and jacks, see note to State v. Iams, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 736.

The question as to consent of neighbors as a condition of obtaining a license or permit to erect or conduct livery stables, etc., is included in the note on delegation of power as to licenses, franchises, and buildings in St. Louis v. Russel, 20 L.R.A. 721.

A stable for horses as a nuisance is the subject of a note to Oehler v. Levi, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1025.

And as to dairies as a nuisance, see subdivision 9, in the note to Ex parte Lacey, 38 L.R.A. 640.

STATE V. RICE, holding an ordinance pro-

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Superior Court for Guilford County granting defendant's motion, upon a trial in the Municipal Court, to quash a warrant for his arrest for the violation of a municipal ordinance forbidding the keeping of hogs within certain territory. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. W. Bickett, Attorney General, and A. Wayland Cooke, for the state:

It is entirely competent for the legislature to confer power to pass ordinances which will operate beyond the corporate boundaries of municipalities, for the purpose of suppressing or preventing nuisances which affect the inhabitants of the corporation, and for preserving the public health.

hibiting in toto the keeping of any hog in the town valid and reasonable as within the statutory power conferred upon the town to make rules for the preservation of health, is in entire harmony with Darlington v. Ward, 38 L.R.A. 332, where the earlier cases dealing with the validity of an ordinance forbidding the keeping of animals within the city limits are collected in a subdivision of that note.

So, in Brunson v. Youmans, 76 S. E. 128, 56 S. E. 651, which is set out in STATE v. RICE, it was said: "We are unable to see how the testimony which was only designed to show the condition of other lots than that of defendant could be a material circumstance in determining whether the town . . . had the power under statute and constitutional law to forbid the keeping of hogs within the corporate limits within 125 yards of a dwelling house in which persons lived, and provide punishment therefor. Whether such particular lots were large or small, low or high, sand or clay, drained or undrained, wooded or clear, cultivated or uncultivated, clean or unclean, would constitute no test of the power of the municipality to pass the ordinance in question."

An ordinance of a municipal corporation which declared that "no hogs shall be permitted to remain within the corporate limits. . . between the 1st of April and the 1st of October" is not, upon its face, so unreasonable as that it would be the duty of the courts to declare it void. Smith v. Collier, 118 Ga. 306, 45 S. E. 417.

Under legislative authority to define and abate nuisances a municipal corporation may forbid the keeping of hogs in a pen within the corporate limits and within 200 feet of any street or alley, and such regulation will not be declared to be unreasonable by the courts. Miller v. Syracuse, 168 Ind. 230, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 471, 120 Am. St. Rep. 367, 80 N. E. 411.

But in Comfort v. Kosciusko, 88 Miss. 611, 41 So. 268, 9 Ann. Cas. 178, it was said: "Section 2928 of the Annotated Code of 1892 empowers municipalities to suppress hogpens. It also gives the power to make regulations to secure the general health of municipalities, and to prevent, remove, and abate nuisances. The keeping of hogs in a municipality, or the erection of hogpens, may or may not be a nuisance, and it is only when they are such that a municipality has the power to interpose and suppress hogpens or prevent the keeping of hogs in a municipality. An ordinance which provides generally that hogs may not be kept in a municipality, without reference to whether they are or are not a nuisance, is too broad and sweeping in its provisions, and cannot be upheld. When the keeping of hogs within a municipality becomes a nuisance, no matter where they may be kept therein, it not only has the power, but it is its duty, to abate the same. In the case of Darlington v. Ward, 48 S. C. 570, 38 L.R.A. 326, 26 S. E. 906, cited by counsel, we think the court went too far. In truth, this case seems to stand by itself in the extent to which it has gone in upholding municipalities in the right to prohibit the keeping of hogs within its borders."

And in Com. v. Rawson, 183 Mass. 491, 67 N. E. 605, it was held that a town is not authorized to adopt a bill prohibiting the keeping of more than five swine, exclusive of their offspring less than five months old, which will prohibit one from conducting a swine business, so long as his premises are clean and the premises conducted in the best possible manner.

Likewise, in Phillips v. Denver, 19 Colo. 179, 41 Am. St. Rep. 230, 34 Pac. 902, it was held that provisions of a charter granting power to a city to regulate lawful occupations and business places, as well as to regulate and prevent the carrying on of business dangerous or detrimental to public health, and to declare, prevent, or abate nuisances, conferred no authority upon a city council to pass an ordinance prohibiting the location of a livery stable "in any block in which a school building is situated, or in any block opposite to a block in which a school building is situated," irrespective of the question whether the stable is well constructed, well regulated, and well conducted, and without specifying

A municipal corporation is, as a general rule, restricted to its corporate limits in the exercise of its corporate powers.

Donable v. Harrisonburg (Switzer v. Harrisonburg) 104 Va. 533, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 910, 113 Am. St. Rep. 1056, 52 S. E. 174, 7 Ann. Cas. 519.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, who lives outside the corporate limits of Greensboro, was indicted in municipal court of the city of Greensboro for unlawfully and wilfully "keeping and running hogs in a lot within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of the corporate limits of the city of Greensboro," in violation of the city ordinance, which is set out, and which provides: "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to keep any hogs or pigs within the corporate limits of the city of Greensboro or within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of said limits." On appeal from the municipal court the warrant was quashed and the state appealed.

The general assembly provides in the charter of Greensboro (Private Laws 1911, chap. 2, § 27) that all ordinances of the city of Greensboro enacted "in the exercise of police powers given to it for sanitary purposes or for the protection of the property of the city, shall apply to the territory outside of said city limits, within 1 mile of same in all directions." The legisany definite distance from school buildings within which a livery stable is prohibited. The court said: "The ordinance in question must, therefore, be subjected to the test of reasonableness; and the particular provision under consideration cannot stand, in any event, unless its adoption was a reasonable exercise of the incidental or general grants of power contained in the charter. . . . The ordinance in question is not directed against livery stables improperly kept or used, but against all livery stables within prescribed limits. There is nothing to indicate that there was anything improper in the construction, keeping, or use of defendant's stable. The sole contention on the part of the city, therefore, is confined to the single fact, that defendant had located and conducted his stable within the limits prohibited by the ordinance,—that is, in a block opposite to a block in which a school building was situated. The ordinance, however, does not undertake to declare that a livery stable conducted within the interdicted limits shall be deemed a nuisance per se. . . . An ordinance so uncertain, so indefinite, so unsuitable, and unsatisfactory to accomplish the desired object, cannot be regarded as reasonable; and so cannot be upheld under the authority supposed to be granted by the city charter."

Although in Caskey v. Edwards, 128 Mo. App. 237, 107 S. W. 37, the defendant, before the passage of an ordinance prohibiting the location, erection, or construction of a livery stable within 200 feet of a residence, had maintained a stable on land within the prohibited distance, it was held that she could not, under the pretense of repairing the old building, erect a new structure more than twice the size of the old and covering more than twice the area of the original.

In State v. Hord, 122 N. C. 1093, 65 Am. St. Rep. 743, 29 S. E. 952, which is set out in STATE v. RICE, it was held that the ordinance was not void because of discrimination in that it did not also prohibit one from keeping a hogpen within 100 yards of his own house. "It is an anomaly," said Mr. Justice Clark, "that the defendant, who has disobeyed the ordinance forbidding him to commit a nuisance upon the public, should be complaining that the town did not go further and forbid him being a nuisance to himself. He could refrain from that without official help."

And a municipality which has voluntarily passed under the dominion of act No. 136 of 1898 cannot, under any general or implied authority, "suppress" or "locate" at pleasure a lawful business which is not a nuisance per se, where the act confers authority, and specific terms, merely to prescribe regulations whereby the establishment in which such business is conducted shall be kept clean and in good order. Crowley v. West, 52 La. Ann. 526, 47 L.R.A. 652, 78 Am. St. Rep. 355, 27 So. 53, wherein it was held that it is incompetent for such municipality to enforce an ordinance, whether before or after its acceptance lature has unquestioned authority to confer upon the town authorities jurisdiction, for sanitary or police purposes, of territory beyond the city limits. 28 Cyc. 704; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1148, and cases there cited. This is sometimes conferred for police protection, but oftener for the preservation of public health. Power is often granted to the town authorities to police the watershed beyond corporate limits, so that the city may have pure water; also to insure cleanliness, to protect the sewerage, and for many like purposes to protect the health of those living within the city. Among the most notable cases are Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85; Chicago Packing & Provision Co. v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 221, 30 Am. Rep. 545; Emerich v. Indianapolis, 118 Ind. 279, 20 N. E. 795; Albia v. O'Harra, 64 Iowa, 297, 20 N. W. 444; State ex rel. Humphrey v. Franklin, 40 Kan. 410, 19 Pac. 801; Jordan v. Evansville, 163 Ind. 512, 67 L.R.A. 613, 72 N. E. 544, 2 Ann. Cas. 96. There are many other cases to like effect, and none to the contrary. Among the late cases are Gower v. Agee, 128 Mo. App. 427, 107 S. W. 999; Ex parte Glass, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 87, 90 S. W. 1108. In this last case the court sustained an ordinance forbidding the keeping of hogs within 1 mile of the courthouse. The court held that this was a matter within the discretion of the town commissioners, though it permitted hogs to be kept at places within town limits beyond that distance from the courthouse. In 2 Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 562, it is said: "It is, of course within the power of the state legislature to authorize . . . [a town] to pass ordinances . . . which shall have a restricted effect beyond their limits." In Chicago Packing & Provision Co. v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 221, 30 Am. Rep. 545, the court said: "Persons then desiring to engage in particular avocations in or near to cities must submit to have their pursuits limited and controlled, at least so far as the preservation of health and to a reasonable extent the comfort of the people may require. . . . The lives, the health, and the comfort of the people are the highest [claim], and demand the first and greatest protection. . . . They do have the right to be protected against all kinds of business that endanger life and health, and from intolerable nuisances that destroy their comfort. To accomplish this purpose, the power was conferred upon cities and villages to regulate these establishments for the distance of 1 mile be-of the act of 1898, the effect of which is to permit four livery stables to be maintained in its business center, while the fifth stable and all others which may be hereafter established are to be relegated and confined to a designated locality remote from such center. It was said: "The proposition that the defendant can be thus discriminated against, and that his four competitors in business can be thus secured the monopoly, in perpetuity, of the livery-stable business in . . . cannot be seriously entertained." And see Billings v. Cook, 35 Mont. 95, 119 Am. St. Rep. 845, 85 Pac. 656, a very similar case, to the same effect.

In People v. Davis, 78 App. Div. 570, 79 N. Y. Supp. 747, it was held that § 799 of the New York Sanitary Code providing that "no live chickens . . . or other fowls shall be brought into or kept . . . in any yard . . . within the built-up portions of the city of New York, without a special permit, in writing, from the department of health, as subject to the conditions thereof," is not to be invalidated by the fact that at the time of its adoption no lawful authority existed in the health department to grant any such permit; especially where it appears that it has been ratified and confirmed by repeated legislative enactments. The court said: "That the health authorities of the city of New York have, for a long period of time, exercised and regulated by ordinance the right of granting permits of the character now questioned, is praec-tically undisputable. While it is probable that no specific legislative authority exists for the regulation of the keeping and killing of poultry in the city of New York by limiting the act to such times and places as the health department may see fit to sanction by permit, the whole tenor and scope of the laws applicable to that city, and the history of the legislation upon the general subject of the public health, clearly indicate that such is the meaning and intent of the law; and that the power has been and is conferred upon the local authorities of confining the keeping and slaughtering of poultry within the thickly settled sections, to such places as the health officials, in the exercise of their judgment and discretion, may find to be possessed of sanitary adjuncts and surroundings consistent with a due regard for the public health and cleanliness. This view results from a consideration of the more extended powers conferred upon the department in the city from time to time, the general practice of issuing permits in this and other cognate matters which has existed for a long period with the legislative sanction, the express recognition by the legislature of the binding authority of the ordinances which provide for such permits, and the creation and growth of the Sanitary Code, also providing for such permits in numerous cases, adopted under the legislative authority, and from time to time ratified and confirmed by legislative enactment."

yond their corporate limits, even if that should lap over and embrace a portion of territory included in the boundaries of another municipality. Each, to that extent, has the right to protect its inhabitants, and such establishments, located in such territory, are subject to the police power of both corporate bodies." The ordinance there sustained was for the regulation of the great packing houses located outside of Chicago, and which had been licensed by a neighboring town.

The argument that the town of Greensboro is governed under the commission form of government with "initiative, referendum, and recall," and therefore that its municipal authorities should have no control outside the city limits, is wanting in application. The question is not how the city authorities are chosen, but what power the legislature has conferred upon them over adjacent districts beyond the city limits, in which may be set up establishments, business, or other things which would be injurious to the health of its people. There is nothing in our Constitution which restricts the legislature in the exercise of its police power from conferring upon the municipal authorities of Greensboro such power. Indeed, the municipal court of Greensboro is given jurisdiction outside the city limits, and such jurisdiction has been affirmed at this term in State v. Brown, — N. C. —, 74 S. E. 580; citing State v. Shine, 149 N. C. 480, 62 S. E. 1080; State v. Baskerville, 141 N. C. 811, 53 S. E. 742, and divers other cases.

The city therefore had the same power to pass this ordinance and make it applicable to a district within a quarter of a mile outside the city limits as it had to prohibit "keeping any hogs or pigs within the corporate limits." The question, therefore, is whether it could pass such ordinance applicable within the city limits. In State v. Hord, 122 N. C. 1093, 65 Am. St. Rep. 743, 29 S. E. 952, the court held that the town authorities could forbid keeping a hogpen within the city limits. In that case the prohibition was against keeping a hogpen within 100 yards of the residence of another, which was, of course, practically an entire prohibition. In 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. [§ 693] it is said that "the keeping of hogs and swine is a generally recognized subject of regulation by municipal ordinance." In Darlington v. Ward, 48 S. C. 570, 38 L.R.A. 326, 26 S. E. 906, it is said: "An ordinance cannot be held invalid because it is unreasonable when the power to pass ordinances on the subject is conferred by a constitutional statute." It is further held: "An ordinance making it unlawful to keep any hog within the corporate limits of a town cannot be held void." In Skaggs v. Martinsville, 140 Ind. 476, 33 L.R.A. 781, 49 Am. St. Rep. 209, 39 N. E. 241, the court held that it would not "inquire as to the reasonableness of an ordinance, when the power exists to pass it." The same was held in the late case of Brunson v. Youmans, 76 S. C. 128, 56 S. E. 851, in which the court held valid a town ordinance which made it unlawful to keep any hogs within the town, —citing Darlington v. Ward, supra. Ordinances to prohibit hogs within a town have also been sustained in Quincy v. Kennard, 151 Mass. 563, 24 N. E. 860; Smith v. Collier, 118 Ga. 306, 45 S. E. 417; Ex parte Glass, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 87, 90 S. W. 1108.

Even if this court were of opinion that the ordinance is not sound public policy and might work hardship, we could not declare it invalid. The legislature has conferred jurisdiction upon the town commissioners "to make such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the state, for the preservation of the health of the inhabitants of the city as to them may seem right." Pr. Laws 1911, chap. 2, § 17. An appeal in such case must be to the lawmaking power. Red "C" Oil Mfg. Co. v. Board of Agriculture, (1912) 222 U. S. 380, 56 L. ed. 240, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 152. But, as a matter of fact, there are some 20,000 people within the limits of the town of Greensboro, and they have a right to be protected against such matters as their local legislature may deem unsanitary. If that body is wrong, it will be influenced by their constituents to repeal or modify the ordinance. But the authority to make the ordinance, and to extend its limits, not to exceed 1 mile, beyond the city boundaries, has been conferred by the legislature. Of their own volition the city authorities made the ordinance applicable only to the extent of one quarter of a mile beyond the city boundaries. The language of the ordinance forbids "keeping any hogs or pigs within the corporate limits of the city of Greensboro or within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of said limits." The warrant charges that the defendant "did unlawfully and wilfully keep and run hogs in a lot within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of the corporate limits of the city of Greensboro." It therefore comes within the terms of the ordinance. It does not appear what size the lot was, nor is it material. The ordinance prohibits "keeping hogs" within the limits named. In Darlington v. Ward, 48 S. C. 570, 38 L.R.A. 326, 26 S. E. 906, there was a single hog kept within a 2-acre lot. The court held that the question was not whether the keeping of that particular hog was injurious to the health of the town, but whether the town had authority to prohibit the "keeping of hogs" within the limits prescribed, and whether the defendant had violated that ordinance. The court said that the nature and condition of the premises were immaterial, and that "the power of the town council to preserve the public health cannot be measured by the size of Ward's lot," nor by the cleanly condition in which he kept his premises. The court further said: "Courts 'cannot run a race of opinions upon points of right, reason, and expediency with the lawmaking power.' No act of a legislature can be declared void or unconstitutional, unless it conflicts with some provision of the Constitution. Nor can any ordinance of a municipal corporation within the power conferred by the legislature, and not in conflict with the laws and Constitution of the state, be impeached in a court for unreasonableness. A critical examination of cases holding police regulations void, because unreasonable, will disclose that the attempted police regulations violated some constitutional guaranty. The right asserted by some courts to declare municipal ordinances invalid because unreasonable is limited to ordinances passed under the implied or incidental powers of the municipality." The greatest advance of the age probably is towards the preservation of the public health, and in measures for the prevention of disease. The legislature conferred power upon the municipal authorities of Greensboro to adopt sanitary regulations. In passing this ordinance, they acted within this authority, and doubtless upon the advice of the sanitary board. The necessity and the benefit of sanitation cannot be better shown than by a statement which recently appeared in a government publication, that in Cuba, a tropical country, under the impetus given by United States supervision, there is an expenditure now of 46 cents per capita for better sanitation and an annual mortality of 15 per 1,000 of the population, while in North Carolina, in naturally a healthy climate, there is an expenditure of only 1 cent per capita and a mortality of 18.3 per 1,000 of population, or 22 per cent greater. In view of such fact the courts will be slow to interfere with sanitary regulations which have been adopted by city authorities, presumably in accordance with the wishes of the most intelligent and advanced portion of its population, even if we possessed the power to interfere. It is not our province to review the action of boards of sanitation, within the limits of their powers. The judgment quashing the warrant is reversed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

K. E. HANGER et al., Trading as Hanger Brothers, Plffs. in Err.,
v.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 73 S. E. 713.)

Railroad — negligence — headlights.

1. It is negligence per se for a railroad company, in the nighttime, to run an engine backwards over its main track without a proper headlight on the tender sufficient to enable the enginemen, in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, to see ahead a reasonable distance, so as to avoid doing injury to dumb animals astray upon the track.

New trial — railroads — negligence absence of headlight.

2. Where a railroad company, in so operating an engine in the nighttime, runs over and kills a horse astray upon its track, and the evidence is such that the jury may reasonably infer that had there been a proper headlight on the tender, in front of the moving train, the enginemen, in the exercise of due and reasonable care, would probably have discovered the horse on the track in time to avoid injuring him, the question of negligence is one of mixed law and fact for the jury; and the court should not, for want of sufficient evidence to support it, set aside a verdict in favor of the owner of the horse, and award defendant a new trial.

(January 23, 1912.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Fayette County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of a Justice of the Peace in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the killing of plaintiffs' horse alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick, & Baker, for defendant in error:

The authorities relied on by defendant in error are cited in the opinion.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs seek reversal of the judgment below, on appeal from the judgment of a justice, setting aside the verdict of the jury in their favor, for $175, and awarding defendant a new trial.

The action begun before a justice was for damages for alleged negligence of defendant in killing plaintiffs' horse.

One of the questions presented in the court below, on the evidence, and by instructions to the jury proposed by defendant, and in the petition filed in this court, is whether the alleged negligence, if any, in killing the horse, was that of the defendant or of the White Oak Railway Company, operating the engine and cars that killed the horse.

The evidence shows that the railway track where the killing occurred, the engine, and at least one of the cars, belonged to the defendant company, and that the movement of the train over said track was controlled by the train despatcher of defendant company, at Hinton. There is evidence that after the horse was killed servants of the defendant company took charge of its carcass, and buried it, and that when other animals had been killed on the same branch the defendant settled the damages. The point does not seem to be relied on in argument here, and we think we may properly regard it as having been abandoned.

The main question presented is whether it is negligence per se for a railroad company, in the nighttime, to run an engine backwards over its main track, as was done in this case, without a proper headlight on the tender, sufficient to enable the engineers, in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, to see ahead a reasonable distance, and to avoid doing injury to dumb animals astray upon the track? It is conceded that the horse was not killed at a public crossing, and that it was a trespasser on the defendant's right of way, and that defendant owed it no duty except to observe ordinary care to not wantonly and wilfully run it down and kill it. That this measure of duty is imposed by law upon a railway company with respect to stock estray upon its private right of way is fully established by prior decisions of this from liability on that ground, it must maintain headlights having sufficient power to enable the engineer to see stock upon the track for a sufficient distance to enable him to stop the engine before colliding with it.

Thus in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Jones, 71 Ala. 487, a charge was sustained which in effect permitted the jury to find defendant negligent if it failed to provide a headlight of sufficient power to enable those in charge of the engine to see objects on the track, on a clear night, at a distance within which a collision could be avoided.

In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Moody, 92 Ala. 279, 9 So. 238, it is held that whether the headlight reflected its light far enough to enable the engineer to discover obstruction the size of the stock killed, in time to avoid a collision therewith, being a material question, testimony that headlights on other engines, at other times, on the same road, showed objects at a greater distance under similar circumstances, was admissible to show either that the headlight on that particular engine was defective, or that the engineer failed to keep a proper lookout.

In Western R. Co. v. Mitchell, 148 Ala. 35, 41 So. 427, the court says that the general rule is well settled in Alabama that it is per se negligence, as matter of law, for a railroad company to run its trains in the nighttime with a headlight not having sufficient capacity to cast light upon the track so that the engineer may see obstructions for the distance within which the train may be stopped.

And to the same effect is Western R. Co. v. Stone, 145 Ala. 663, 39 So. 723.

In Jonesboro, L. C. & E. R. Co. v. Guest, 81 Ark. 267, 97 S. W. 71, evidence that the headlight was so dim that objects could not be seen more than 50 yards ahead of the engine, and that there was every opportunity for the engineer to have seen the horses in time to have avoided striking them had the headlight been in proper condition, was held to be sufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff.

But if the engine is equipped with a proper headlight which becomes obscured from natural causes, such as rain, fog, or snow, the company is not obliged to cease running its trains or to run them at the peril of being liable for the killing of any live stock because of the obscured headlight. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Melton, 2 Lea, 262; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Jones, supra.

court. Layne v. Ohio River R. Co. 35 W. Va. 439, 14 S. E. 123, and the cases cited and reviewed therein.

This and other cases, with no less exactness, we think, require of a railroad company and its servants operating its trains, that they use like ordinary care in providing the means of discovering such stock on its track. Does this rule require of a railroad company operating trains at night, to equip its engines or cars with reasonably sufficient headlights and other appliances necessary to avoid doing injury to trespassing animals? It would clearly be negligence giving a passenger injured thereby right of action. But will it give right of action to the owner of animals killed by such negligence? By defendant's instruction number 3, given, the court below, in substance, told the jury that the railway company was not negligent in not having a headlight on the engine which ran over and killed plaintiffs' horse, unless the killing took place at a public crossing. As it was not killed at a public crossing the practical effect of the instruction, therefore, was to tell the jury that defendant was not negligent, and not liable. The jury evidently did not regard the instruction, for they found a verdict for plaintiffs notwithstanding the instruction.

In discussing the rule requiring of a railway company ordinary care and precaution to discover animals on its track and right of way, 3 Elliott on Railroads, § 1205, supported by numerous decisions cited, says: "It is held to be the duty of the company to use care to equip its locomotives with such headlights as would render a lookout effective." And in § 1206 this writer says: "The company is bound to use ordinary care to prevent injuries to animals, and where ordinary care requires the use of signals the company may be guilty of negligence in omitting them although they are not required by the statute." In Layne v. Ohio River R. Co. supra, it is also held that the servants of a railway company are "equally bound to adopt the ordinary precaution to discover danger as to avoid its consequences after it becomes known." Our case of Kirk v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 41 W. Va. 722, 32 L.R.A. 416, 56 Am. St. Rep. 899, 24 S. E. 839, says: "If the servants of the railroad company in charge of a train, by exercise of ordinary care, can see and save domestic animals which have wandered on the railroad, it is their duty to do so; but this duty must be exercised consistently with the paramount duties they owe to the passengers on the train under their charge." What rule of reason or policy then could excuse a railway company, operating trains at night, from equipping its engines with proper headlights to aid its servants in the performance of their duty? If it is the duty of its servants, by the exercise of ordinary care, to see and endeavor to save such animals, estray upon its track, there must certainly be a corresponding duty on the part of a railway company to use ordinary care in providing its trains with sufficient headlights in aid thereof. The proposition seems so fundamental and self-evident as not to require further elaboration. It is sustained not only by the authorities already referred to, but by 33 Cyc. 1218, and cases cited in note 57.

As opposed to this rule defendant's counsel cite and rely on Melton v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 64 W. Va. 168, 61 S. E. 39, point 2 of the syllabus, saying: "Signals or lights or watchman are not required on a backing train, elsewhere than at public crossings, to warn trespassers using the track for their own convenience as a foot-path." Does this rule, applicable to persons using the track, affirmed in this and in the prior decisions cited, apply also to dumb animals? In Melton v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. the fact is emphasized that it was not claimed that the trainmen saw or could have seen Myers, the deceased, before hitting him with the backing engine. In Huff v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 48 W. Va. 45, 35 S. E. 866, the same rule was applied to a trespasser in the yards of the defendant company. It is there held that, unless guilty of wanton or gross negligence, a railroad company cannot be held liable in damages to persons so trespassing. In the present case the horse was not injured by a backing engine and tender, in the yards of the defendant, but outside, on the main track, and by an engine being operated in that way, in hauling a regular passenger train, and it was a dumb animal, not a live sentient person, of mature years, that was killed. Our decisions hold, with respect to dumb animals, as to helpless, insane, or infant persons, that a railroad company owes a duty to the owner to keep a careful lookout ahead to discover them upon the track and to use ordinary care to avoid injuring them. Besides the cases already cited, see cases cited in 11 Cyc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Reports, pp. 586-599.

With respect to persons of mature years, possessed of all their faculties, a railroad company and its trainmen have the right to assume, unless circumstances indicate the contrary, that they will hear the approaching train, and get out of the way in time to avoid injury. Not so with respect to dumb animals and helpless persons. And, as we have already said, this duty must also include the corresponding duty to provide and keep in order sufficient headlights.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that a railroad company, in operating its trains in the nighttime over its main tracks, owes a duty to the owner of domestic animals to provide and keep installed and in order sufficient headlights to enable its trainmen, by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, to see them on the track in time to avoid injuring them, and that it is negligence to omit this duty, for which an action will lie, if its omission be the proximate cause of the injury.

If such be the law the remaining question is, did the court err in setting aside the verdict and awarding defendant a new trial? The evidence shows that there was a headlight on the tender of the backing engine, but that it had been broken, was out of repair, and that in place of having it repaired, the trainmen were using an ordinary train lantern hung out on the drawhead of the tender. The evidence is that this lantern did not enable the trainmen to see ahead for more than from 12 to 15 feet, while with a proper headlight they could have seen about a hundred yards ahead, and that the track was straight for some 400 or 500 yards back from where the horse was struck, with nothing intervening except the darkness of the night to obstruct their view; and that the distance from the point where the horse apparently went upon the track to the place where it was killed is about 175 feet, a bridge or culvert intervening, showing evidences of the horse's foot having slipped through the ties on the bridge. The trainmen say they were looking ahead, but did not see the horse. At what rate the train was traveling and within what distance it could have been stopped is not clearly shown by the evidence. Defendant's counsel claim in their brief that the train was moving at about the rate of 12 miles an hour. We know from the evidence that the train was moving backwards on a dark night with a light in front that would not enable the trainmen to see more than 12 to 15 feet ahead, and we may safely conclude that they were not going at a very great rate of speed.

On this evidence was the court below justified in setting aside the verdict? Defendant's counsel rely on Toudy v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 38 W. Va. 694, 18 S. E. 896; Maynard v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 40 W. Va. 332, 21 S. E. 733; Lovejoy v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 41 W. Va. 693, 24 S. E. 599; and Kirk v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 41 W. Va. 722, 32 L.R.A. 416, 56 Am. St. Rep. 899, 24 S. E. 639, and characterize the killing of the horse in this case as one of inevitable accident, for which under those decisions L.R.A. (N.S.) sions, defendant cannot be held liable. They say that the horse was killed because it was a very dark, rainy night, and the vision of the trainmen obscured thereby, and by the fact that the lantern on the tender did not throw the light far enough ahead to enable them to see the horse in time to avoid hitting, and killing it. This proposition, as we see, excludes the idea of negligence in failing to provide a suitable headlight, which we hold to be negligence per se. Both engineer and fireman swear they were looking ahead at the time the horse was evidently struck by their train, but did not see him, and to that extent performing their duty to the owner of the horse. Why did they not see him on a straight track of some 400 or 500 yards in time to avoid killing him? The jury might justly have inferred that it was because of the absence of a sufficient headlight. The question was one of mixed law and fact peculiarly within the province of the jury, and not one for the court, independently of the jury, to decide. As was said by Judge Snyder in Johnson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 25 W. Va. 570, apropos to this discussion: "If the engineer had discovered them [the horses] promptly as he should and would have done had he exercised due care, he could, by blowing his whistle and stopping his train, have, perhaps, prevented any collision and saved the horses. This was at least a probability for the consideration of the jury." So we may say in the case, if the engine had been provided with a sufficient headlight, the trainmen, who claim to have been looking ahead, as it was their duty to do, consistent with their paramount duty to the passengers, would in all probability have seen the horse of the plaintiff in time to have avoided killing him. At all events the probability was one for the consideration of the jury, and which they evidently resolved, as they had the right to do, in favor of the plaintiff.

Our opinion, therefore, is to reverse the judgment below, and enter judgment here in favor of plaintiff for the amount of damages as found by the verdict of the jury, with costs incurred here and in the court below, and it will be so ordered.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

TERESA TOMBARI

v.

JOHN P. CONNORS, Appt.

(85 Conn. 231, 82 Atl. 640.)

Master and servant — druggist — liability for negligence of clerk.

1. A druggist is not relieved from liability

ity for injuries caused by the negligence of his clerk in compounding a prescription by the fact that the clerk is a licensed pharmacist.

Druggist — filling prescription — care required.

2. A druggist, in the filling of prescriptions, must exercise the highest practicable degree of prudence, thoughtfulness, and vigilance, and the most exact and reliable safeguards, consistent with the reasonable conduct of the business.

Same — illegible prescription — care required.

3. A druggist who reads the name of a drug called for by an illegible Latin prescription, as one which he knows in the quantity specified is likely to do great harm, is bound to take reasonable precautions to ascertain that his reading is right.

(March 7, 1912.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Hartford County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for in-

Note. — Does the fact that a drug clerk is a licensed pharmacist relieve his employer from liability for his negligence or lack of skill.

The decision in TOMBARI v. CONNORS, that a druggist cannot escape liability for injuries caused by the negligence of his clerk in compounding a prescription, by showing that the clerk is a licensed pharmacist, is sound, and is supported by the scant authority upon the point.

Thus, in Burgess v. Sims Drug Co. 114 Iowa, 275, 54 L.R.A. 364, 89 Am. St. Rep. 359, 86 N. W. 307, it was held that a druggist was not relieved from liability for injuries caused by a prescription negligently put up, by the fact that the negligence was that of a registered pharmacist employed by him, which class alone was allowed by statute to fill prescriptions. The court said: "The master who undertakes to perform a service is liable for the negligence of his servant in performing the service undertaken. This proposition is too elementary to require the citation of authorities. It is true that the Legislature has provided, as a police regulation for the protection of the public, that to one who is not a registered pharmacist shall fill prescriptions; but when the defendants undertook, as a part of their regular business, that the prescription should be filled, it was wholly immaterial to the customer, so far as defendants' liability was concerned, whether the prescription was filled by one of the defendants or by an employee."

And in McCubbin v. Hastings, 27 La. Ann. 713, where a drug clerk negligently made a mistake in compounding a prescription, it was held that the fact that the clerk was a competent druggist did not relieve his employer from liability for his negligence. The court said: "It may, however, L.R.A. (N.S.)

juries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's clerk. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. F. Gaffney, for appellant:

The clerk who compounded the prescription in question was a competent druggist of experience and good reputation.

Smith v. Hays, 23 Ill. App. 244.

A compounding pharmacist cannot, and is not obliged to, know all the different ailments for which different prescriptions are compounded; but he is to exercise such care as would be proportionate to the gravity of the injury that would result from want of such care.

2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 691; Beckwith v. Oatman, 43 Hun, 265.

If the prescription of a physician is so illegibly written that a druggist, notwithstanding ordinary care, makes such a mistake in mixing the ingredients as to cause or hasten the death of the patient who partook of it, the druggist is not liable in damages.

McClardy v. Chandler, 3 Ohio Dec. Re-

be assumed that he was competent. The defendant's liability would be none the less certain. The defendant is himself represented as being a most competent druggist. If he had made the mistake, would his proficiency in his calling shield him? Or would it not rather aggravate the fault? Incompetency and carelessness—and such mistakes arise from one or the other of these causes—result in the same way. Either or both produce suffering and sometimes death. And can it be that if a physician should prescribe for his slightly ailing patient a small quantity of calomel and soda, and the druggist were to substitute arsenic for soda, that he would shield himself from the consequences which might result, by saying, if the prescription was compounded by himself, that it was a mistake, and if the act of his servant, that he could not have prevented it? The law does not place a community in the position of being poisoned by mistakes, with no one to be held responsible therefor. If it was the master who did the wrong, the master is responsible. If it was his servant who did it, he is still responsible, for the master is responsible for the acts of his servant when done in the course of his usual employment."

The rule of liability applicable to a druggist is the same as that which governs the liability of professional persons whose work requires special knowledge or skill, and a person is not legally responsible for any unintentional consequential injury resulting from a lawful act, when the failure to exercise due and proper care cannot be imputed to him.

Roraback, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is against a druggist for the negligence of a clerk employed by him in filling a prescription. The prescription as intended by the doctor who wrote it called for powders to be taken three times a day, each one containing 5 grains of calumba, with other ingredients. The drug clerk who compounded the prescription substituted calomel for calumba. The defendant denied the negligence alleged in the plaintiff's complaint, and also based his defense upon the allegation that his clerk was a duly licensed pharmacist. The court of common pleas found the issues for the plaintiff, and held that the clerk should, by the exercise of due care, have read the prescription as calling for calumba, or at least that there was such doubt as to the correct reading as should have led him to inquire of the doctor, and that there was negligence in compounding the powders which he delivered to the plaintiff. The substance of the defendant's appeal is that the court erred in reaching the conclusions just stated.

The finding shows that in July, 1910, the defendant, who is a licensed pharmacist, owned and conducted a drug store in New Britain, and that one Benjamin Cutner, who is also a licensed pharmacist, was in 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

his employ as a clerk. The plaintiff is living with her husband and children in New Britain. She is an Italian, and does not speak or understand the English language. On July 23, 1910, she was suffering from an attack of indigestion, and, with a friend who acted as an interpreter, went to a doctor's office in New Britain. The doctor diagnosed the plaintiff's complaint as indigestion, and gave her a prescription, with directions to have it filled at some pharmacy. Mrs. Tombari, with her friend, went to the drug store of the defendant, and gave the prescription to Cutner, the clerk, to be filled. The ingredients written in the prescription, as the doctor intended them to be read, are as follows: "Rhei, Calumba, Bismuth Sub., Sodii Bicarb, Zingibar, Fiat in Chart XXIV, One t. i. d." The interpretation as the doctor intended it to be read is as follows: "Rhubarb one drachm, calumba, subnitrate of bismuth, bicarbonate of sodium, and ginger, each 2 drachms. To be made into twenty-four powders. One three times a day." The clerk read the prescription as intended, except that he interpreted the second word to mean "calomel," instead of "calumba;" and he accordingly put up the powders, each containing 5 grains of calomel. Calumba is a mild bitter tonic, useful in functional disturbances of the digestive organs, and is not used frequently. Calomel is chloride of mercury, and is in frequent use in small doses as a purgative and stimulant of the liver. A prescription for 5 grains of calomel to be taken three times a day, making a total of 120 grains, or 2 drachms, in eight days, would be unusual, though not unprecedented in some violent diseases. The quantity of calomel compounded by the clerk attracted his attention, and he inquired of the plaintiff through her interpreter if she understood the dose, and had any special instructions from the doctor. The record does not disclose that any response was given to this inquiry. The taking of six of these powders by the plaintiff as prepared produced a very violent diarrhea and vomiting, by which she was rendered excessively weak, and also produced an excessive flow of saliva, which continually filled and flowed from her mouth; produced the unpleasant odor of mercury; and also produced great pain in her gums, and caused the temporary loosening of her teeth. Her lips and throat became swollen and painful. She sent for the doctor, who immediately discovered the mistake that had been made, and gave her remedies to relieve her of the effects of calomel.

It is elementary that the master who undertakes to perform a service is liable for the negligence of his servant who, when in the scope of his employment, is performing the services undertaken. McKiernan v. Lehmaier, 85 Conn. 111, 81 Atl. 969.

The fact that Cutner, the defendant's clerk who compounded the prescription in question, "was a competent druggist of experience," does not relieve the defendant from a claim for damages for injuries sustained on account of negligence of his clerk. "The most skilful and competent may be, and human experience teaches us will be, sometimes negligent. Hence the fact that one is skilful and competent may prove that he will generally be more careful than the unskilful and incompetent; but it has no tendency to prove due care on a particular occasion." American Straw Board Co. v. Smith, 94 Md. 19, 50 Atl. 414; Smith v. Middleton, 112 Ky. 588, 56 L.R.A. 484, 99 Am. St. Rep. 308, 66 S. W. 388; Burgess v. Sims Drug Co. 114 Iowa, 275, 54 L.R.A. 364, 89 Am. St. Rep. 359, 86 N. W. 307.

The legal measure of the duty of druggists towards their patrons, as in all other relations of life, is properly expressed by the phrase "ordinary care," yet it must not be forgotten that it is "ordinary care" with reference to that special and peculiar business. In determining what degree of prudence, vigilance, and thoughtfulness will fill the requirements of "ordinary care" in compounding medicines and filling prescriptions, it is necessary to consider the poisonous character of so many of the drugs with which the apothecary deals, and the grave and fatal consequence which may follow the want of due care. In such a case ordinary care calls for a degree of vigilance and prudence commensurate with the dangers involved. The general customer ordinarily has no definite knowledge concerning the numerous medicines and poisons specified in the United States Dispensatory and Pharmacopœia, but must rely implicitly upon the druggist, who holds himself out as one having the peculiar learning and skill, and conceptions of legal duty, necessary to a safe and proper discharge of that duty. Ordinary care with reference to the business of a druggist must therefore be held to signify the highest practicable degree of prudence, thoughtfulness, and vigilance, and the most exact and reliable safeguards, consistent with the reasonable conduct of the business, in order that human life may not constantly be exposed to the danger flowing from the substitution of deadly poisons for harmless medicine. Tremblay v. Kimball, 107 Me. 53, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 900, 77 Atl. 405. See cases cited note 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) pp. 900-903.

The trial court has found that the defendant's clerk was negligent in compounding the powders in question as he did, and then delivering them to the plaintiff. This conclusion is a question of fact, and must stand, unless it is inconsistent with the other subordinate facts which have been set forth in the finding. Wolcho v. Rosenbluth, 81 Conn. 358, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 571, 71 Atl. 566; Metcalf v. Central Vermont R. Co. 78 Conn. 614, 619, 63 Atl. 633. It is found that calumba was intended, and that calomel was given. Calomel was furnished by mistake. A prescription calling for 120 grains of calomel to be taken in twenty-four powders, one three times a day, is extraordinary, and, if taken as directed, was liable to be attended with serious results. Cutner was an experienced pharmacist, and, when he delivered the medicine as he had compounded it, he could have anticipated that an injury like that which actually occurred would naturally follow. He could have seen from the nationality and appearance of the plaintiff that she knew nothing of the property and uses of calomel. The prescription itself as he read it in connection with the surrounding circumstances excited his suspicion that calomel was not intended. The record does not disclose that he then made a reasonable effort to ascertain whether he might not be mistaken.

The defendant contends that the prescription was written in Latin, illegible, and doubtful as to what drug was really intended. Assuming this to be true, it did not lessen the duty of the clerk to be alert to avoid a mistake. If there was any reasonable doubt as to the identical thing ordered, the defendant's clerk should have taken all reasonable precaution to be certain that he did not sell one thing when another had been called for. The trial court has found that such precaution was not taken. There is nothing in any of the subordinate facts appearing in the record inconsistent with this conclusion.

There is no error.

In this opinion the other Judges concur.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Chancery Court for Marshall County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the penalties imposed by statute for an alleged violation of the anti-trust laws. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. B. Harris for appellant.

Messrs. S. S. Hudson, Attorney General, W. P. Shinault, and W. V. Sullivan for the State.

Mayes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The proceeding in this case is brought by the attorney general under chapter 145, § 5002, Code of 1906, as amended by Laws of 1908, p. 124. This suit was instituted on the 28th day of September, 1909, against the Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company for an alleged violation of the anti-trust laws, and the purpose of the suit is to recover the penalties imposed by § 5004. The trial court rendered a judgment in favor of the state for the sum of $116,400, holding that the contract which we shall set out in full a little later constituted a violation of the anti-trust laws, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The minimum penalty allowed to be imposed under the statute is $200 per day, and the minimum penalty was imposed by the trial judge, the time being fixed from the date of making the contract, which will hereafter be stated, to the date of filing of the bill as above specified, and making 582 days. The contract was made by the Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company on the 24th day of February, 1908, with the Oxford telephone system. The Cumberland Company is a corporation, but the Oxford system is unincorporated.

No testimony was taken, but the case was heard on the bill, answer, and exhibits; and the facts shown by same are substantially as follows: In the year 1901 W. H. Harvey owned and operated a purely local telephone system at Oxford, Lafayette county, Mis-issippi, and had no long-distance facilities or connections. The Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company at that time was not doing business in Oxford, or in Lafayette county, but had a long-distance line extending through the country into many other portions of the state and into many other states. Harvey desired to obtain for his subscribers the advantage of a connection with a long-distance line, and, with this object in view, solicited the Cumberland Company to allow a connection to be made between its long-distance lines and his local system. The arrangement desired by the local system was finally arranged between the two on certain terms and conditions expressed in a written contract made between them on the 23d day of November, 1901. The contract of 1901 is not important in this case, so its terms will not be set out. Suffice it to say that the system continued to operate under the above contract as long as Harvey owned the local system and until some time in 1903, when L. F. Tool and W. J. Clark purchased the local system from Harvey, and, after the purchase, they continued to operate the system under the same contract made by Harvey with the Cumberland Company, until the 24th day of February, 1908, when the Cumberland Company and the then owners of the local system made a new contract. Since this last contract is the one which it is claimed violated the anti-trust statutes of the state, we set out all of the contract involved.

It is as follows, viz.:

"Whereas, the second party (the Oxford Telephone Company) is the successor to the rights and privileges created or established by reason of a certain contract entered into on the 23d day of April, 1901, by and between the first party and W. H. Harvey, of Oxford, Mississippi, and under which contract the first party furnished to said Harvey certain telephone apparatus, which apparatus was turned over to the second party, and the first party has, since the transfer of said apparatus by Harvey to second party, furnished second party certain telephonic apparatus; and

"Whereas, the first and second parties desire to enter into a new contract to cover connection between the telephone exchange system of second party in Oxford, Mississippi, and the systems of the first party:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of one ($1) dollar each to the other in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the parties hereto mutually covenant and agree as follows:

"(1) Except as to amounts due from one party to the other under the aforesaid contract of date November 23d, 1901, and except as to the responsibility of second party to first party for telephone apparatus furnished it, the said contract of date November 23d, 1901, shall be and the same is hereby superseded by this contract.

"(2) The second party agrees to ship to the first party at Nashville, Tennessee, freight prepaid, the switchboard furnished first party under the aforesaid contract of November 23d, 1901, within ninety days from the date hereof, and to pay for the use of said switchboard at the rate provided in said contract until the same shall have been shipped to first party as aforesaid.

"(3) The first party agrees to furnish at its Memphis, Tennessee, office to the second party the standard form of transmitter and the receiver used by it, at the rate of $1 per annum, payable in advance for each set of instruments, consisting of one bi-polar receiver and one solid back transmitter, furnished; and second party agrees to pay for the use of such transmitters and receivers heretofore or hereafter furnished at said rate per annum at the office of first party, in Nashville, Tennessee, from date of this contract, and second party shall pay for the use of equipment furnished prior to the date of this contract at the rate provided in the aforesaid contract, dated November 23d, 1901. Each and every instrument embraced in the system of the second party shall be equipped with transmitters and receivers furnished by first party, and shall be used only on the telephone embraced in the system of second party in Oxford, Mississippi, and vicinity. Second party agrees not to extend its lines in such manner as to conflict with the business or interest of the first party or its subscribers, and not to make any connection, directly or indirectly, with any other telephone lines, nor to extend its lines outside of Lafayette county, Mississippi, without the written consent of the first party. In the event transmitters and receivers furnished hereupon become defective and are returned to the first party at Memphis, Tennessee, freight prepaid, first party will repay or replace same without additional charge.

"(4) Oxford shall be in the future, as in the past, the connection point between the systems of the parties hereto, and the second party agrees to make such connection for direct communication between its subscribers and the system of the first party as it may be called upon to make, it being expressly agreed and understood that second party shall be responsible to the first party for all messages sent from stations embraced in its system to points on the long-distance lines or connecting lines of first party, and that the messages sent over the lines or connecting lines of first party shall be subject to the rules, rates, and regulations of the first party, and the second party shall receive a commission of 15 per cent on all moneys (except messenger fees) collected by it for messages sent from stations embraced in its system to points on the long-distance lines of the first party; but no commission will be allowed second party on moneys collected by it for messages sent over the lines of any other company than first party.

"(5) In the event the second party shall decide to cancel this contract before its expiration, or to dispose of its property, or the control of stock of its company, the first party shall, in the event second party shall decide to cancel the contract before its expiration, have the right to purchase the property of second party by arbitration, one arbitrator to be selected by each party, the two so chosen to select the third and fix the price, and each party shall be bound by the finding of such arbitrators; in the event the second party shall desire to sell the property or control of stock of the company, the first party shall have the refusal of such property or stock at the same price second party may be offered for the same.

"(6) A diagram of the lines of the second party is hereto annexed and made a part hereof.

"(7) Settlement for tolls shall be made monthly for the month next preceding.

"(8) In case of any failure of payment or other violation of any of the terms of this agreement by the second party, continued for ten days after notice or demand by the first party, or in case the second party shall become bankrupt or insolvent, the first party may at its option immediately terminate this contract by written notice to the second party, or to those in charge of its principal offices.

"(9) This contract shall become effective and be in force for five years from date hereof, and thereafter until thirty days written notice of intention to terminate the same be given by either party to the other."

The bill of complaint makes the contract on the 24th day of February, 1908, fully set out above, an exhibit to same, and asserts that its purpose and effect was to shut out competition, and to monopolize and control the prosecution and management of the telephone business. The bill concluded with a prayer for the recovery of the penalties provided for in § 5004 of the Code of 1906, and also prayed for an injunction to restrain the further continuance of the contract. The Cumberland

Company filed a lengthy answer to the above suit. We shall not undertake to give it in full, but will state only the material parts of same. It is stated in the answer that neither at the date of the contract nor at any time since then has the Cumberland Telephone Company been engaged in a local telephone business in Oxford or in the county of Lafayette, nor has the Oxford system then, now, or at any other time engaged in the long-distance business, nor was it facilitated for same or contemplating engaging in the long-distance business; that the Oxford system was in no sense a competitor, for the two companies were not seeking to do the same character of telephone business; that numerous contracts of this character are made, but the contracts are not made for the purpose of suppressing competition, or for the purpose of monopolizing, or attempting to monopolize, the control or management of the telephone business in the communities where made, but for the purpose of extending the telephone business, and giving communities telephone service and facilities which they could not otherwise obtain; that the provisions in the contract in reference to extending the lines of the local systems and making connections with other lines are solely for the purpose of protecting the Cumberland Company against such extensions and connections as would be ruinous to its business, and prevent its efficient service to its numerous patrons; that the contracts simply provide that the extensions and connections made by a local connecting line must be with the written consent of it, the licensor, in order that the facilities furnished the local company by the Cumberland Company shall not be used in a manner detrimental to its interests, and that of its numerous subscribers. In other words, the answer states that it is necessary for the proper conduct of its telephone business, and the proper service of its numerous subscribers, and the proper discharge of its public duties, that the Cumberland long-distance should have some supervision in the connections and extensions which are made by the local companies with which it contracts, and to which it furnishes apparatus and equipment, which otherwise might prove ruinous to the business and very detrimental to the public service. If no restrictions were placed upon extensions and connections, its lines might in a short time become connected with and used by other lines, over which it had no sort of control, and which are actual competitors, and which would greatly interfere with the Cumberland Company's business.

In short, the answer states that these contracts are made with noncompeting local telephone systems; the object of the contract being to give the local telephone systems with which they are made, and which are not in competition with the Cumberland system, all the advantage offered by the long-distance system of the Cumberland Company. In doing this and yielding its long-distance system to the patrons of the local phone system, the Cumberland claims the right to protect itself from abuse by requiring the local connecting system to use certain standard transmitters and receivers, and to patronize the Cumberland system alone in sending long-distance messages, and not to extend its lines so as to be detrimental to the interest of the Cumberland Company so long as the contract lasts, unless the local system obtains permission of the Cumberland. The facts further show, according to the answer, that there has not in fact been any monopoly or suppression of competition, because no competition ever existed or was in contemplation, nor does the bill allege that competition was desired or intended. It is alleged in the answer that the sole purpose of this contract is to protect the Cumberland Company in the use of its property, and that the restrictions placed on the contracts are for the legitimate, regular, and normal prosecution of the Cumberland's business. It is further shown that the Cumberland gives the same facilities to all local systems desiring them, reserving the right to make them exclusive when more than one local system is in operation at the same place, and that a copy of the contract is on file with the railroad commission of the state, and has been on file for many years; that the desire of local systems to take advantage of the facilities for long-distance arrangements offered by the Cumberland exceeds the ability of the Cumberland to furnish; and that these connections thus allowed greatly benefit the public.

In deciding this case, the distinguished chancellor places in the record a written opinion. The reason assigned by him for holding this contract in violation of the anti-trust statutes is put in the following language: "This case was submitted on bill, answer, and exhibits, without proof. Counsel for defendant urges that, the cause being thus submitted, the state is precluded from recovery on all allegations in the bill of complaint to which the answer is responsive. This is correct as to everything specifically denied, but the defendant in its answer admits entering into the contract, the illegality of which is the crux of this case. The real question then is: Was the contract violative of the anti-trust law?" We set out the above quotation for the purpose of showing that the court below shut out all explanations made by the answer, and considered the case on the contract alone, holding that the contract on its face violated the anti-trust laws of the state, because it so far controlled the Oxford Company as to require it to send "all long-distance messages over the Cumberland's line," and because it "prohibited the Oxford Company from making any connection with other telephone companies, or extending its lines, so as to conflict with the business or interests of the Cumberland Company, without the written consent of the latter company," during the existence of the contract. While the trial court held that the contract was a violation of the anti-trust laws and imposed a penalty on appellant on account of same, the court refused to enjoin the continued operation under the contract.

As only one of the contracting parties was a corporation and the other was an individual, § 5005, Code of 1906, as amended by the Laws of 1910, p. 222, which prohibits one competing corporation from buying out the stock of another competing corporation, has no application, and there was, therefore, no law of this state which prevented either system from, in good faith, buying out the other; yet no law could compel either to allow a connection by the other. Under the contract, the local system became fully equipped as a local and a long-distance system, while the long-distance system interfered in no way with the local business of the local system, but received a small rental for transmitters and receivers furnished under the contract, and additionally obtained its subscribers as possible patrons of the long-distance facilities. In considering this contract, it must be considered in the light of the facts set up in the answer as explanatory thereof, since the questions here involved are questions of both law and fact. But, if this were not true, and we should consider this case on the contract alone without the explanations made by the answer, this contract standing by itself would constitute no violation of the anti-trust laws of the state, as we think will appear in the reasoning of the court a little later on in this opinion. The anti-trust laws of the state and the United States have been so frequently before the state and Federal tribunals, and every phase and feature so ably and exhaustively discussed, that any attempt to improve on these discussions would be vain. One of the ablest discussions to be found in the books on this subject is the case of Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Searles, 85 Miss. 520, 68 L.R.A. 715, 37 So. 939, wherein Justice Truly rendered the opinion of the court. We shall have occasion to refer still further to this case later on, as well as many others on the 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

same subject. In considering this case, a little review of the anti-trust laws may help us to better understand their application and purposes. Section 5002 of the Code of 1906, as amended by the Laws of 1908, p. 124, makes unlawful as a trust and combine any "combination, contract, understanding, or agreement, expressed or implied, between two or more corporations, or firms, or associations of persons, or between one or more of either with one or more of the others," to accomplish many purposes specified in the act. In discussing this act we shall only set out those clauses which are involved in this litigation. The statute makes unlawful as a trust and combine any such contract, etc. (a) in restraint of trade; (k) or who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, the production, control, or sale of any commodity, or the prosecution, management, or control of any kind, class, or description of business. If this contract is illegal, it falls under the inhibition of one or the other of the above clauses. When this statute was enacted, it introduced into the law no new definition of what constituted a "restraint of trade" or "a monopoly." It did not attempt to define either. These are questions to be determined in the light of the facts of each case and under the law relating to same as it stood before the statute was passed; otherwise there is no guide for the persons charged with the enforcement to be governed by. What does the statute mean when it prohibits contracts "in restraint of trade?" Does it mean that any contract which in any way restrains trade shall be illegal? If so broad a meaning should be given to the statute as this, it would involve a destruction and disaster to the commercial world never dreamed of by its authors, and not comprehended within the evil intended to be rectified. The statute only intended to include within its provisions those contracts in restraint of trade, those monopolies and attempts to monopolize that were invalid as against public policy before the enactment of the statute, and under it such contracts in relation thereto could not be enforced as between the parties. A contract in reasonable restraint of trade was valid before the enactment of the statute, where its design and purpose is not to create a monopoly; and such contract is valid now where "it is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in whose favor it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public." Edgar Lumber Co. v. Cornie Stave Co. 95 Ark. 449, 130 S. W. 452; 3 Paige, Contr. p. 588; 27 Cyc. 900, and notes; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 396, 32 L. ed. 979, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553; Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v.

While contracts in restraint of trade, monopoly contracts, and monopolies were held to be illegal under the law as it stood before the anti-trust statutes, such contracts could be avoided and injury done thereby rectified only by the parties themselves. While this was the case, the evil continued because those persons were frequently satisfied by the parties engaged in the prejudicial and unlawful enterprise, and the public at large left to suffer. In order to obviate these difficulties, anti-trust laws have been enacted enabling the state in its sovereign capacity to sue for and recover penalties in all such cases; in addition to this, giving any member of the public suffering injury or damage the right to sue also. In other words, the law as to what it now takes to make a contract in restraint of trade to monopolize or attempt to monopolize any business remains the same, but the parties who may sue and the penalties have been broadened. As to what does nor does not constitute a monopoly within the meaning of the statute is not always easy to decide. The courts must be left to determine these questions when they arise. The question is one of mixed law and fact of necessity. To illustrate, suppose there are only two grocery stores in a town. Suppose the business of the town is so small as that a continuance of the two means a ruination of both. May not the one sell out to the other for the protection of both? This same illustration might be used in a countless number of instances. It is plain to be seen that it will not do to so construe the statutes as that one person may not sell to another when the very business life of the seller depends upon it. Yet there may be a character of business where these same acts would be held to be unlawful. But our own court has expressed the thought in the case of Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Searles, 85 Miss. 520, in part of opinion to be found on page 529 in such apt phraseology that we here quote it, viz.: "An analytical study of this section demonstrates that it was the legislative design to prohibit and provide punishment for the formation of any criminal conspiracy by which the interest of the public might be in any manner injured or jeopardized, whether such combination was intended to be in restraint of trade, to limit, reduce, or increase the price or the production of any commodity, or to hinder competition in the importation, manufacture, transportation, sale, or purchase of any commodity, or to do certain other enumerated acts which would, in the judgment of the legislature, prove prejudicial to the interest of the public or any part thereof, or of any individual. . . . The design of the legislature was to protect the public, not to unlawfully restrict the transacting of business by either corporations or individuals. The various kinds of legitimate business rendered necessary by the multiform demands of public convenience, the manifold callings which are an incident of this progressive age, all demand that the individual right of contract shall be given full sway, conditioned only that the rights of the public and the welfare of the people and the public policy of the state shall be held sacred. Says Terral, J., in Houck v. Wright, 77 Miss. 483, 27 So. 617: 'The legislature, by the chapter in trust and combines, did not intend to debar a person from conducting his own private business according to his own judgment.' . . . 'It was not the purpose of the convention or the legislature to limit either the term used in the Constitution or in the statute by any narrow definition, but leave it to the courts to look beneath the surface, and, from the methods employed in the conduct of his business, to determine whether the association or combination in question, no matter what its particular form should chance to be or what might be its constituent elements, is taking advantage of the public in an unlawful way. Harding v. American Glucose Co. 182 Ill. 551, 64 L.R.A. 738, 74 Am. St. Rep. 189, 55 N. E. 577. In each case, therefore, under these provisions, the nature of the arrangement or combination is a question of fact to be determined by the court from the evidence before it or from the vice which inheres in the contract itself.' MacGinniss v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. 29 Mont. 428, 75 Pac. 94; Ceballos v. Munson S. S. Line, 93 App. Div. 595, 87 N. Y. Supp. 811, and cases cited. Nor is the rule of construction different when applied to the Federal anti-trust statute. . . . 'This act of Congress must have a reasonable construction. It was not its purpose to prohibit or to render illegal the ordinary contracts or combinations of manufacturers, merchants, and traders, or the usual devices to which they resort to promote the success of their business, to enhance their trade, and to make their occupations gainful, so long as those combinations and devices do not necessarily have a direct and substantial effect to restrict competition in commerce among the states.' Phillips v. Iola Portland Cement Co. 61 C. C. A. 19, 125 Fed. 594." Again the court says on page 528 of 85 Miss.: "Section 198, Constitution 1890, commands the legislature to 'enact laws to prevent all trusts, combinations, contracts, and agreements inimical to the public welfare.' It must be observed at the outset that not all trusts, combinations, contracts, and agreements were to be prohibited because the great lawmakers who framed the fundamental law of this commonwealth as the same is embodied in our present Constitution well knew that such legislation would be palpably intrenching upon, if not absolutely violative of, the inherent rights of the citizen, and would be restrictive to an unwarranted degree of the privilege of contract which every man is entitled to enjoy under our form of government. Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 244. No such legislation was authorized, because no such legislation was demanded. Only such trusts, combinations, contracts, and agreements were to be prevented as would be 'inimical to the public welfare.'"

We have quoted largely from the opinion in the Searles Case, because the rule laid down in that case is narrow enough to exclude from its scope unlawful contracts and agreements, combinations, and monopolies in their true sense, and yet broad enough to leave life in all legitimate undertakings and enterprises. If the anti-trust laws are given a scope sufficient to throttle and choke out lawful business transactions, its effect upon the public would be as detrimental as the evils which it is designed to break up. Under the law as it stood before the enactment of the anti-trust statutes, courts were astute enough to discover these unlawful enterprises and apply such correction as the law then gave power to apply. As the law now stands, differing only in the fact that some new causes of illegality have been added for the avoidance of these unlawful agreements and combinations, penalties made more severe, and the parties who may sue made more numerous, the courts may still be relied upon to discover and punish in all proper cases.

The contract in this case is simply this: The Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company had a long-distance line passing through Oxford, and Lafayette county. It was not doing any business of any kind in the town or in the country. The Oxford telephone system wanted to obtain for its patrons and itself the advantage of long-distance connections. The Oxford system proposed to the Cumberland to let it connect, and in consideration of this connection agreed to take certain improved transmitters and receivers and to pay a small rent therefor, further agreeing that, so long as it retained this connection under the contract, it "would not extend its lines so as to conflict with the business or interests of the Cumberland Company, and would not make any connection with any other telephone lines; and would not extend its lines outside of Lafayette county, and would give its long-distance business exclusively to the Cumberland." What was unlawful about this agreement? What is unreasonable about it in the absence of proof showing that it was designed for the purpose of stifling competition or creating a monopoly? These two companies were not competitors. This contract bears every mark of a contract entered into in good faith and only for the purpose of affording a fair protection to the interests of the party in whose favor it was made, and not so wide in its scope and operation as to interfere with the interests of the public. If the Cumberland could not thus protect itself, the Oxford system, having obtained the right to connect, might have connected itself with other systems, and by its contract and through its exchange have connected all the systems around there with the long-distance lines of the Cumberland, thus using the Cumberland's line, not only for itself, but for other companies. The contract promoted the efficiency of both systems, and made both of greater use to the public as well as more valuable to the owners. If the contention that this contract is illegal is to prevail, the court must hold that while either of these systems could lawfully purchase the other, and stipulate that the selling system would not engage in business for a reasonable period of time and within a territory reasonably necessary for the protection of the purchasing company, yet when they do the lesser thing of only buying and selling the right to use the long distance in connection with the local business, leaving both systems to manage and control their business without interference by the other, the lesser contract is illegal. We shall not undertake in this case to lay down any fixed rule by which it may be determined in all cases what constitutes a monopoly. This question must be left to the facts of each case, but the fact must exist before the penalties can be imposed. A profitable case upon this subject is the case of State v. Duluth Bd. of Trade, 107 Minn. 506, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1260, 121 N. W. 395. In the authorities cited in this case will be found nearly every decision in the United States, both state and Federal, on the subject involved in this case. In that case it is pertinently said: "It does not follow that every contract or combination which in any degree tends to restrict competition is illegal. So strict a rule would invalidate innumerable ordinary business transactions, which are unobjectionable and necessary that business shall not completely stagnate. As said in Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S. 578, 592, 600, 43 L. ed. 290, 296, 299, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40: 'The contract condemned by the statute is one whose direct and immediate effect is a restraint . . . of commerce. . . . The act . . . must have a reasonable construction or else there would be scarcely an agreement or contract among business men that could not be said to have, indirectly or remotely, some bearing upon interstate commerce and possibly to restrain it.' The anti-trust statutes were never designed to forbid such transactions, and it has been universally held that contracts and combinations which tend to promote business, and which only remotely, incidentally, and indirectly restrain competition, are not forbidden. If the necessary effect of the combination is to stifle or to directly or necessarily restrict free competition, it is under the ban of the law, whatever may have been the intention of the parties. But if 'it promotes or but incidentally or indirectly restricts competition, while its main purpose and chief effect are to foster the trade and to increase the business of those who make and operate it, then it is not a contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade within the true interpretation of this act, and it is not subject to its denunciation.'

The contract on the part of the Oxford system to give its long-distance messages to the Cumberland, exclusively for the period of the contract, was not in violation of the law. It was based upon a valuable consideration to both systems, and was not inimical to the public interest in any way. This character of contract is sustained by numerous authorities cited in brief of counsel for appellant. Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car. Co. 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. ed. 55, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 478; St. Louis Drayage Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (C. C.) 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 137, 65 Fed. 39; Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. (C. C.) 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 249, 51 Fed. 405; United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. 46 L.R.A. 134, 29 C. C. A. 141, 54 U. S. App. 723, 85 Fed. 271; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. West Coast Stores Co. 198 U. S. 497 49 L. ed. 1140, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 745.

Reversed and dismissed.

Smith, J., dissenting:

I am of the opinion that this contract, and the acts of the parties under it, constitute an attempt on the part of appellant to monopolize the long distance telephone business in Oxford and its vicinity within 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the meaning of subsection "k," chap. 119, Laws of 1908.

I doubt the validity of this contract at common law; but conceding that it was valid at common law, and conceding, as the fact is, that there was no competition between the parties to this contract at the time it was entered into, the result, in my judgment, must be the same. The effect of this contract was to remove, or to put it in the power of appellant to remove, at least one of its possible competitors, the local telephone company, to prevent the local company from doing business with anyone desiring to compete with appellant, and to practically prohibit all of the subscribers of the local company, as long as it operated the only exchange in the town of Oxford, from using the long-distance telephone facilities which might be offered to them by any possible competitor of appellant. That the monopoly may not have been complete does not negative the fact that appellant attempted to make it so. An attempt is simply an intent to do a thing, coupled with an act which falls short of the thing intended. That appellant may have had the right to purchase the exchange and equipments of the local company, as to which I express no opinion, is immaterial. By merely purchasing the exchange and equipments, appellant would not thereby have deprived anyone of the right to deal with other persons who might desire to compete with it. But had it gone further, and, after purchasing the exchange, required its subscribers to agree to use only its telephones, it would then have monopolized, or at least attempted to monopolize, the telephone business in that community. The mere furnishing of telephone facilities to a community does not, of course, constitute an attempt to monopolize the telephone business; but such an attempt is committed when, in addition to furnishing telephone facilities, an attempt is made to prevent the citizens of a community, by contract or otherwise, from dealing with possible competitors of the person furnishing such facilities.

OAKDALE TOWNSHIP.

Township — division — right to assets.

1. Where part of an existing township was detached by an order of the county commissioners in 1904, and the part so detached was organized as a new township, no provision being made in the order, and no statute existing, for the division or apportionment of the assets of the old township, held, that the new township cannot recover of the old any part of the cash in the hands of the county treasurer and due the old township at the time of division, or received by the treasurer for it after division, from tax levies made prior to the division.

Same — rights and liabilities of old township.

2. Where a new township is created out of a part of the territory of an old one, unless some provision is made in the act creating the new, or exists under the statute, respecting the property and existing liabilities of the old township, the old township retains the title to all the public property, except such as may be located in the detached territory, and is responsible for the debts contracted before the division.

The question of the division of taxes

Note. — Division of territory of municipality, town, or county as affecting its assets and liabilities, in absence of statute on the point.

This note is confined strictly to cases involving the division of municipalities, towns, or counties, and therefore does not include the cases of annexation, consolidation, or dissolution. As to the liability of territory annexed to a county, city, or other municipality, to pay the proportionate share of existing debts, see the note to Blake v. Jacks, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1147. See also White v. Fuller, 38 Vt. 193, taking the view that the severance of territory from one town and its annexation to another simply transfers the right of municipal jurisdiction, and that therefore it does not affect the proprietary right in lands whose legal title it holds as trustee for a use which is perpetual. And, too, it is held that a county to which certain territory is added does not become liable for the debts of the county from which it was taken. (Chickasaw County v. Sumner County, 58 Miss. 619. The reason for the exclusion of cases of dissolution of towns is found in the distinction observed in Mt. Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514, 25 L. ed. 699, which recognizes the doctrine of Laramie County v. Albany County, 92 U. S. 307, 23 L. ed. 552, that where a new town is formed from the portions of an old one, the old corporation is responsible for all the old debts, in the absence of statute to the contrary, but holds that where a town is extinguished by merger into two others, the latter succeed to all the public property and immunities of the extinguished municipality, and they therefore become liable for all the debts previously contracted by it.

And it will also be observed that this note includes only cases in which it was assumed or decided that the division and its attendant proceedings were legal. For a case on the liability of the original county for debts of a county defectively organized from part of its territory, reference may be had to George D. Barnard & Co. v. Polk County, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 791.

And it remains to be noted that the decisions involving the division of school districts are not herein treated. As to the effect of changing boundaries of a school district upon the right in real property, see the note to Pass School Dist. v. Hollywood City School Dist. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 485.

It has been frequently declared in general terms that, in the absence of a specific statutory adjustment of the matter, the old corporation owns all the public property within her new limits, and is responsible for all debts contracted by her before the act of separation was passed; and that the new subdivision has no claim to any portion of the public property except what falls within its boundaries. The greatest number of cases in which this declaration is found hold only that the new corporation is not liable for any of the old debts. Laramie County v. Albany County, 92 U. Brewer, C., filed the following opinion:

This is a suit for money had and received. On January 22, 1908, the defendant in error, Oakdale township, as plaintiff below, filed its petition against Union township, plaintiff in error, as defendant below, in the district court of Washita county. The petition stated substantially the following state of facts: That prior to January 4, 1904, Union township embraced all the territory in both plaintiff and defendant townships at the time of suit. That on January 4, 1904, the board of county commissioners of Washita county divided Union township, creating the south half thereof into Oakdale township. That at the time of such division and creation of plaintiff, there was certain cash in the hands of the county treasurer due defendant. That said funds were derived from taxes collected from persons on property situated in defendant township before division. That thereafter the county treasurer collected other taxes during the year 1904 under the levy of 1903 from said property, and paid them over to defendant. That one half of the property from which said taxes were collected was situated in ing right to surplus in treasury); Cooke v. School Dist. No. 12, 12 Colo. 453, 21 Pac. 496, 719 (school fund); Hartford Bridge Co. v. East Hartford, 16 Conn. 149, affirmed in 10 How. 511, 13 L. ed. 518 (ferry franchise); People ex rel. Richberg v. School Trustees, 86 Ill. 613 (school fund); North Yarmouth v. Skillings, 45 Me. 133, 71 Am. Dec. 530 (obiter); School Comrs. v. School Comrs. 35 Md. 201 (obiter); Hampshire County v. Franklin County, 16 Mass. 76 (obiter); Clay County v. Chickasaw County, 64 Miss. 534, 1 So. 753 (county and school fund); Winslow v. France, 20 Okla. 303, 94 Pac. 689 (denying right of new county to share of funds of old); Reeves County v. Pecos County, 69 Tex. 177, 7 S. W. 54 (same). But, as pointed out under the next heading, this general statement has been questioned so far as it suggests that the new subdivision is entitled to the public property which falls within it.

Assets—generally.

See also infra, under the heading "Time" and its subdivisions.

In the light of general principle referred to, it is held that a provision in the act of separation that the town farm shall belong to the new town does not transfer to it the personal property belonging on such farm. Frankfort v. Winterport, 54 Me. 250.

And the right of a school district to a fund held in trust for it continues after the portion of a town in which the district is located is organized into a new town. Goulding v. Peabody, 170 Mass. 483, 49 N. E. 752.

It was held in Willite v. Mansfield, 23 Okla. 246, 99 Pac. 1087, that where the new county is formed from territory which embraces a high school building, it becomes the property of such county.

And it was said in North Hempstead v. Hempstead, 2 Wend. 109, that upon the division of a town, each community was entitled to hold in severalty the public property which fell within its limits, but this was obiter dictum, since it was further held in the case that even if one community had a right to property in the other after the 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

division, such right had become barred by the lapse of time.

And it has been held that lots conveyed to a township for the purposes of a township hall which has been erected by money raised by taxation on all the property of the township passes to a city of the second class when it is formed from a city of the third class which embraced such lots and was a part of the township, at least where the lots were conveyed to the township and "its successor or successors," and were held in the township's governmental rather than proprietary capacity. Wellington v. Wellington Twp. 46 Kan. 213, 26 Pac. 415.

And it is held in Prescott v. Lennox, 100 Tenn. 591, 47 S. W. 181, that each division will hold in severalty for public purposes the public property which falls within its limits, in the absence of legislative regulations. This case involved a dispute as to the ownership of a lot, and supports its position by the citation of cases which really do not decide the point. Some of the cases so cited are appended to the statement of the so-called general rule, which is set out at the beginning of this note, and which really oversteps the mark in one particular. While it clearly intimates that after the division each municipality is entitled to the property that falls within it, it is to be observed that the cases (or most of them) which contain the intimation involved nothing that required a decision on the point. Indeed, anything that may be regarded as statements to that effect are characterized, in Winona v. School Dist. No. 82, 40 Minn. 13, 3 L.R.A. 46, 12 Am. St. Rep. 687, 41 N. W. 539, as purely obiter, unaccompanied by any real discussion of the question or citation of authority. The Winona Case holds that if a part of a municipal corporation is separated from it by annexation to another, or by its erection into a new corporation, unless some other provision is made in the act authorizing the separation, the old corporation (it not having been abolished) remains subject to all its liabilities, and retains all its property including that which, upon the change of boundaries, happens to fall within the limits of the other corporaplaintiff township after the division, and therefore one half of said taxes were the property of plaintiff. That defendant township had failed and refused to pay to plaintiff its said one half of taxes so collected, and had appropriated and converted them to its own use.

Demand and filing of claim for same with defendant and refusal to pay are alleged by plaintiff. The defendant filed demurrer and answer to petition. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant excepted. The cause was referred to a special referee. Defendant objected to introduction of evidence. The referee found the law and facts in favor of plaintiff over exceptions of defendant. The report was confirmed by the district court, and judgment entered for plaintiff in the sum of $525.41, interests and costs.

Several alleged errors are assigned and urged by plaintiff in error, but under our view of the case a consideration of the demurrer to the petition will dispose of the whole matter. The county commissioners, when they made the order creating plaintiff out of territory theretofore a part of defendant, made no attempt, by order or otherwise, to provide for any apportionment or division of the assets of defendant on hand, or to be collected from prior levies of taxes. No statute in force when this matter arose providing for such division or apportionment has been called to our attention, and we know of none.

The question, then, is: Where part of tion. In other words, it is held that the old corporation retains all the corporate property regardless of situation. With respect to the rights in property where the old corporation is abolished, the court had this to say: "There is a line of cases, often confounded with, but clearly distinguishable from, that now under consideration, where the old corporation was entirely abolished, and new ones created out of its territory. In such cases it is well settled that the new corporations are to be deemed the successors of the old one, and as such liable for all its debts, and entitled to all its property. And in the absence of any legislative provision on the subject, it is held in such cases that each of the new corporations will take the property which happens to fall within its limits."

There is some authority for the position taken in the last case. Thus, it is held that, in the absence of statute, a township which holds land in trust for cemetery purposes continues to hold the property, notwithstanding the cemetery is embraced in a city carved from a part of the township territory. Board of Health v. East Saginaw, 45 Mich. 257, 7 N. W. 808.

And it was held in an early New Hampshire case that the title to land granted to a town for pious uses remained its property, notwithstanding the formation of a new town from a part of the former's territory, so as to include the land within the latter. Union Baptist Soc. v. Candia, 2 N. H. 20.

So, too, it was held that land conveyed to a town "for the use and benefit of the public, and to be improved for a public common, and no other purpose," remained the property of the town, notwithstanding its division so that the disputed land was included within the limits of the new town. Troy v. Haskell, 33 N. H. 533. This case was cited with approval in South Hampton v. Fowler, 52 N. H. 225.

And the last two cases were cited in Greenville v. Mason, 53 N. H. 515, as settling the law in New Hampshire, that when a town is divided by the creation of a new corporation, it still retains all its property, real and personal, the title thereto being unaffected by the change, unless a different provision is made in the act authorizing the separation. The question arose in the Greenville Case over the right of the new town to share in a school fund donated by an individual.

The Colorado supreme court holds that the rule of nonparticipation in the old county's assets is applicable to a surplus of assets over liabilities. Washington County v. Weld County, 12 Colo. 152, 20 Pac. 273.

The view has, however, been taken that equitable principles should be applied in the apportionment of assets in the form of money, choses in action, or kindred property in existence at the time of the division; and that the application of such principles requires an equitable adjustment between the old and new townships of unexpended funds at least, where there are no debts of the old corporation to be provided for. Towle v. Brown, 110 Ind. 65, 10 N. E. 626, followed in a subsequent action between the same parties in 110 Ind. 599, 10 N. E. 628.

—fund appropriated to territory divided.

The new county has no right to a share of a fund for the reclamation of swamp lands, established in the old county in such a manner as to create a trust fund only in the latter, in the absence of a legislative distribution of the fund: and this, of course, notwithstanding the new county embraces a portion of the swamp lands previously located in the old. Kings County v. Tulare County, 119 Cal. 509, 51 Pac. 866.

—fund arising from tax on property in new division.

There are cases which involve the question as to which municipality has the right to collect taxes after the division, but such cases do not seem to involve the question whether the county adjudged entitled to make the collection is entitled to the full an existing township is detached, and created into a new one, and no provision is made by statute, order, or otherwise for an apportionment of the assets of the old, is the new one entitled to part of such assets, and can it recover them in a suit for conversion or for money had and received? The defendant in error on this proposition relies mainly on the doctrine announced by the supreme court of Indiana in Towle v. Brown, 110 Ind. 65, 599, 10 N. E. 626, 628. This authority supports its contention fully. It also cites Mt. Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514, 25 L. ed. 699. This case we do not think in point. Under the decisions of this court, the position of defendant in error cannot be sustained. In the case of Winslow v. France, 20 Okla. 303, 94 Pac. 689, Justice Williams, for the court, says: "It is well amount collected. In other words, it is not purposed to consider herein cases which pass upon the matter of which municipality shall collect the taxes, but do not determine whether the municipality entitled to collect does so solely for its own benefit, or wholly or partially for the benefit of the other municipality. In this connection cases may be noted which hold that property transferred to the new division remains liable to the old corporation for a tax which became due before the separation (Eskridge v. McGruder, 45 Miss. 294); but in the absence of statute, the right of the authorities of the old corporation to sell property now embraced within the new, for such a delinquent tax, ceases upon the division of the territory, but the owner's property remaining within the old division may be sold for the entire tax (Deason v. Dixon, 54 Miss. 585).

The right of the old county to collect taxes previously levied by it upon property now located in the new corporation is not affected by the fact that they were not paid until the latter's formation. Colusa County v. Glenn County, 117 Cal. 434, 49 Pac. 457, subsequent appeal, 124 Cal. 498, 57 Pac. 477.

And the right of a township to liquor taxes within its territory attaches at the time the taxes become due, and is therefore not affected by the subsequent detachment of a part of its territory and its annexation to another municipality. Springwells Twp. v. Wayne County, 58 Mich. 240, 25 N. W. 329.

The new county is not entitled to that part of a fund which arose from a tax levied during the year of its formation and upon territory now within its boundaries, by the parent county, which has collected and is holding it under a statutory provision that all taxes due the state and county by persons residing in the new county, or upon property included within limits of the new county, shall be payable to the tax collector of the county from which such territory was taken, and the same shall be enforced and collected by the officers of the parent county. Tift County v. Berrien County, 131 Ga. 259, 62 S. E. 204.

And the new county is not entitled to any part of a fund arising from taxes collected between the date of the act authorizing its creation and the time when the organization was perfected. Reeves County v. Pecos County, 69 Tex. 177, 7 S. W. 54.

But it has been held that where the 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

commissioners for the formation of the county and the division of the assets and liabilities have not apportioned an overdue tax previously levied by the old county upon a railroad, the old county cannot recover from the new the proportion of the tax paid to it by the railroad, where the payment was made upon the basis of a reassessment and apportionment by the state board of equalization in the ratio of the mileage of the railroad in the respective divisions. San Diego County v. Riverside County, — Cal. —, 55 Pac. 7. In this case it seems not to have been urged that the board of equalization was without power to make the reassessment. However, in a later California case it was held that where the taxes were lawfully levied by the old county before the formation of the new, the former was entitled thereto, and the state board of equalization was without power to make a reassessment after the formation of the new county and to apportion the same between the two divisions; and that where the tax was paid by the tax debtor in pursuance of such apportionment, the amount paid the new county was recoverable from it by the old. Colusa County v. Glenn County, 124 Cal. 498, 57 Pac. 477. The ground of the decision is that the statute authorizes a reassessment only where the first assessment is invalid; and this broad ground forestalls the making of any distinction between the two cases upon the ground that in the former the legislature authorized the commissioners to apportion the assets of the old county, whereas it made no such provision in the latter, but left the case free for the application of the general rule, which, it may be noted, the court did discuss.

—right of new corporation in assets when made liable for share of debts.

The rule that the new corporation cannot participate in the assets of the old is not affected by a provision that the new division shall be liable for its pro rata share of the existing debts of the old division, whether such provision be statutory (Houston County v. Henry County, 157 Ala. 246, 47 So. 710, subsequent appeal, 162 Ala. 488, 50 So. 311), or constitutional (Washington County v. Weld County, 12 Colo. 152, 20 Pac. 273).

Indeed, it is held that even where the new county is, under the statute creating it, liable upon bonds previously issued by the old county for the purpose of aiding settled that if a new county is created out of the territory of an old county, or if part of its territory or inhabitants is annexed to another county, unless some provision is made in the act respecting the property and existing liabilities of the old county, that the old county owns all the public property except such as may be located within the detached territory, and is responsible for the debts contracted by it a railroad by the purchase of its stock, it is not entitled to any portion of the proceeds of the sale of such stock. Dare County v. Currituck County, 95 N. C. 189.

But it is intimated in Houston County v. Henry County, supra, that the new corporation may lay claim to the funds of the old corporation which have been specially collected for or appropriated to the meeting of a specific obligation, at least where a statute makes the new corporation liable for its pro rata share of the existing debts.

Obligations—generally.

See also infra, under the heading "Time" and its subdivisions.

The operation of the general rule is not affected by a constitutional provision that every county which shall be created from territory taken from another shall be liable for a just proportion of the existing liabilities of the latter, for in such circumstances it is for the legislature to determine what is "a just proportion" of such obligations, or to provide the machinery for its determination; and until the legislature has done this, the old corporation cannot maintain an action against the new for any part of the debt. Tulare County v. Kings County, 117 Cal. 195, 40 Pac. 8.

And while it has been held that the operation of this rule should not be suspended in a particular case, upon the ground that it will work a hardship upon a corporation which has contracted a large indebtedness and will have a great amount of taxable property withdrawn from its power of taxation, and given to the new corporation (Laramie County v. Albany County, 92 U. S. 307, 23 L. ed. 552, affirming 1 Wyo. 137), the application of the rule has been denied in circumstances which literally came within it, where its application would have constituted more of a mockery of justice than anything else. For instance, it was held in Brewis v. Duluth, 3 McCrary, 219, 9 Fed. 747, that where the legislature carved a village out of the territory of a city in such a manner as to include within the village substantially all of the city's inhabitants and most of its taxable property, and apportioned the indebtedness of the city between it and the village in such a manner as to interfere with the rights of creditors, the holder of bonds previously issued by the city to meet the costs of improvements was entitled to maintain a bill in equity to enforce against the village its proportionate share of the indebtedness, and that such proportion should be in ratio to the taxable property set off respectively to the city and the village.

And a tax is a debt within the meaning of the general rule, and therefore, when a county is divided, the old county may be compelled to pay the whole of the state levy charged upon the county at the time the division took place. Gilliam County v. Wasco County, 14 Or. 525, 13 Pac. 324.

Property which was within the corporate limits of a city at the time of the issuance of bonds, but which is now outside the corporation by reason of the reduction of its limits, cannot be assessed for the purpose of aiding in paying the bonds. Miller v. Pineville, 121 Ky. 211, 89 S. W. 261.

And it is held that a township remains liable upon bonds issued by it, notwithstanding that after the issuance of the bonds all but a small portion of its territory became incorporated into a new county which was formed from a portion of the county of which the township was formerly a part, and although some new territory was added to the township in the course of the change. Taylor v. Pine Grove Twp. 132 Fed. 565, followed in Susong v. Cokesbury Twp. 132 Fed. 567. These cases hold that neither the fact that a portion of the territory of the township remained in the old county, nor the fact that new territory was added to the township which was not a part of it at the time the bonds were issued, affected its liability thereon.

A fortiori, the liability of a township upon such bonds is not affected by the mere fact that it was wholly transferred from the old county into a new county. Planters' & Sav. Bank v. Huie Twp. 132 Fed. 627.

On the other hand, the view has been taken that where the territory of a township is transferred to a new county, the township is thereby abolished; and therefore, the subsequent division of such territory into two townships, one of which bears the name of the original township, does not render them the successors of the original township, so as to make them liable for its debts, at least where, due to the fact they were contracted without a vote of the people, they did not become a lien upon the territory. Vandriess v. Hill, 58 Kan. 611, 50 Pac. 872. The court stated in this case that the new county was the municipal successor of the old township, ing liabilities of the old county, the territory or inhabitants detached from the original county lose all claim to share in the property belonging to the county from which it was taken. Whilst it is thus relieved from the indebtedness resting upon the latter, yet it incurs the liabilities and shares in the property of the county to which it is attached, and is equally subject to assessment and taxation for that purpose. Currituck County v. Dare County, 79 N. C. 565; Watson v. Pamlico County, 82 N. C. 17; Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Cuming County, 81 Neb. 374, 47 N. W. 1121; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 123." The doctrine of the above case has been quoted but that, since no liability for the debt was alleged against it, the matter of its liability need not be adjudicated.

It was held in Watson v. Pamlico County, 82 N. C. 17, that, just as territory detached from one county and added to another is relieved of the liability for the pre-existing indebtedness of the county from which it is taken, so it must contribute to the existing indebtedness of the county to which it is attached.

And the organization of a new township severs its territory from the school district within which it was formerly embraced, and, in the absence of statute, the township cannot be charged with debts created for school purposes which existed at the time of the division. People ex rel. School Dist. No. 1 v. Ryan, 19 Mich. 203.

But where a part of the territory of a county is formed into a new county and the boundary line between the two bisects a township, and each resulting township bears the name of the original township in its respective county, both townships remain liable for a pre-existing debt of the old one. Plunkett's Creek Twp. v. Crawford, 27 Pa. 107.

In Higginbotham v. Com. 25 Gratt. 627, it was held, in respect of a debt owed by the state of Virginia at the time of its dismemberment and the formation of the state of West Virginia, that each state was, as between herself and the creditor, bound for the whole debt, but it was intimated that, as between themselves, the states were liable ratably.

It is held in Partridge v. Dennie, 105 Minn. 60, 117 N. W. 234, that, in the absence of a specific statute on the question, the interested towns, through their proper officers, may, as between themselves, adjust and settle their respective rights and liabilities on such terms as they deem fair and just; and that an agreement entered into for that purpose will be valid and binding upon each town, at least after performance by one of the towns, though possibly not as against holders of the indebtedness.

A town formed from a portion of the territory of a city is not liable for the support of a pauper who has no settlement in the territory from which it was formed; and it cannot be charged there-with upon the theory that it is bound by a contract made by the city before the town's formation, whereby the city and another municipality adjusted a dispute in respect of a pauper family, by stipulating that a part of the family should be deemed to 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

have a settlement in the city and the other part in such municipality. Veazie v. Howland, 47 Me. 127.

And it was held in an early Massachusetts case that, upon the division of a town and the formation of a new town, a pauper who had a settlement in the former, but was absent at the time of the division, continued to have his settlement in the former, notwithstanding that before his absence he had resided in the territory from which the new town was formed. Windham v. Portland, 4 Mass. 384.

—liability for injury by defective highway now in new division.

The new county cannot be held responsible for injuries caused by a defective highway received before its formation, merely because it now includes the territory in which the highway is located. Askew v. Hale County, 54 Ala. 639, 25 Am. Rep. 730.

And a township a part of whose territory has been made into a new township cannot escape liability upon a judgment previously rendered against it for injuries received upon a defective highway located in territory now within the new township, either upon the theory that, upon the division, the old township was abolished and that two new ones instead of one were created, nor because the statute prescribed no criterion for the apportionment of the liability between the townships. Court-right v. Brooks Twp. 54 Mich. 182, 19 N. W. 945.

—location of improvement as affecting liability for expense.

While the fact that a bridge for which bonds were issued is located in territory which remained in the old division does not affect the liability of property in the detached territory upon the bonds, which became a lien thereon before the detachment (Marion County v. Harvey County, 26 Kan. 181), the county in which the proceedings were taken and closed, for the condemnation of land to construct a road, is solely liable for damages to the landowners, notwithstanding the portion of its territory which concluded the road was incorporated into another county before the road was completed (Jones v. Oxford County, 45 Me. 419).

In this connection it has been said that the fact that a large portion of the taxable property and of the population in the old municipality has been transferred to the new one, and the further fact that the latter profits most from the improvement for which the obligations are incurred, constiwith approval in Wilhite v. Mansfield, 23 Okla. 246, 99 Pac. 1087. To the authorities cited above may be added as strictly in point 1 Cooley, taxn. 3d ed. 414, 415; Comins Twp. v. Harrisville Twp. 45 Mich. 442, 8 N. W. 44. From the above authority it appears that the petition in this cause does not state a cause of action. Therefore the cause should be reversed, with instructions to the trial court to set aside the judgment, sustain the demurrer, and dismiss the action.

Per Curiam.

Adopted in whole.

tute good reasons why the legislature ought perhaps to have made some provision for an equitable apportionment of the burden, but that they furnish no ground for any equitable relief by the court, either in favor of the old municipality or its creditors. State ex rel. Minnesota R. Constr. Co. v. Lake City, 25 Minn. 404.

The contention that the new county should be responsible for a portion of the old debts, since some of them were created in making improvements in a part of what had become its territory, was, to all appearances, ignored in Laramie County v. Albany County, 92 U. S. 307, 23 L. ed. 552, affirming 1 Wyo. 137.

And it has been held that the liability with which a town became charged for the debt of another town which was attached to it continued and was enforceable against it, and not against the attached territory, notwithstanding such territory was subsequently detached and formed into a town which bore the same name as before its previous attachment. Shriber v. Langlade, 66 Wis. 616, 29 N. W. 547, 554.

It has been further held that an old municipality which remains solely liable upon bonds issued for the construction of sewers retains title and control of such sewers, although they are embraced within the limits of the new corporation. Bloomfield Twp. v. Glen Ridge, 55 N. J. Eq. 505, 37 Atl. 63.

See also Means v. Williamson, 37 Me. 556, infra, under "Time—date of obligation."

—liability of territory exempt when detached.

The liability of detached territory upon bonds issued before the division is not affected by the fact that before the division a part of such territory was exempt as government land. State ex rel. Robb v. Kiowa County, 41 Kan. 630, 21 Pac. 601.

Time—when organization deemed complete.

It has been held that the new township does not become a complete and independent organization until its officers enter upon the discharge of their duties; and that therefore territory in the new township is subject to taxation under a vote of the old township authorizing a tax to raise a fund for railroad aid, before such complete organization of the new corporation. Lamb v. Burlington, C. R. & M. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 333.

And it is said in Comins Twp. v. Harrisville Twp. 45 Mich. 442, 8 N. W. 44, that a township is not completely organized for the assessment, levy, and collection of taxes, until the election of its proper officers, and that, until then, the township from which it is set off may make the levy and collection.

But the commissioners of the parent county cannot bind the new subdivision by a tax levied after the passage of the act to lay out the new county, and for the expense of a public improvement thereafter to be constructed. Pope v. Matthews, 125 Ga. 341, 54 S. E. 152; Yow v. Sullivan, 129 Ga. 187, 58 S. E. 662.

—when fund available.

The old county retains a school fund collected, but not accredited to the school district, before the formation of the new county. Cooke v. School Dist. No. 12, 12 Colo. 453, 21 Pac. 496, 719.

—date of obligation.

The old corporation remains liable for a pre-existing debt, notwithstanding it was merged in a judgment before the division. McCully v. Tracy, 66 N. J. L. 489, 49 Atl. 436.

And the liability of a township for the expense of a road constructed by a duly appointed agent, whose appointment the statute authorizes in case of the township's neglect to build the road, is not affected by the fact that, owing to such neglect, the road was not constructed until after the formation of a new township from territory which embraced the road. Re Page, 37 Me. 553.

The making of the contract for the building of a bridge, and not the vote authorizing such contract, creates the liability of the town, and therefore, where such contract is not made until after the division of the town, the new town is not liable for any of the expense of construction. Westbrook v. Deering, 63 Me. 231.

So, the new township is not liable upon railroad aid bonds which, although voted before the division of the old township, were authorized upon condition that the railroad deliver to the township treasurer an equivalent in stock of the company, and such condition was not complied with nor the bonds issued until after the formation of the new township. Pierson Twp. v. Reynolds, 49 Mich. 224, 13 N. W. 525.

But funding bonds, although authorized and issued after the detachment, are a lien upon the detached territory, where they were issued in lieu of bonds which became a lien upon the entire county before any territory was detached. Marion County v. Harvey County, 26 Kan. 181. L. A. W.

ARDMORE STATE BANK, Plff. in Err.,
v.
I. R. MASON.

(— Okla. —, 120 Pac. 1080.)

Corporation — compelling transfer of stock.

1. A purchaser of bank stock may compel, by bill in equity, the transfer of the same on the books of the corporation, or he may sue in conversion and damages for the failure to so transfer.

Pleading — demurrer — sufficiency.

2. Where a general demurrer is filed to a petition, if any paragraph states a cause of action, the demurrer should be overruled.

I. Scope.

This note does not include cases where the indebtedness to the corporation was for the stock itself or for an assessment upon the stock. It is limited to the question of priority of lien, and presupposes or assumes that the corporation has a lien as between it and the stockholder. Therefore the general question as to what is required to create a lien is excluded except in so far as the courts have drawn a distinction between what will create a lien between the company and the stockholder, and what will create a lien as between the company and a pledgee or assignee of the certificate of stock. The reader is reminded that the corporation has no common-law lien upon the stock of its stockholders. (10 Cyc. 580). The question of waiver of a lien is excluded.

For validity of pledge or other transfer of stock of corporation when not made on 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Pledge — statutory right — waiver.

3. The statute requiring the pledgee, before the sale of pledged property, to give notice and sell same at public auction, was enacted for the benefit of the pledgor; and he may waive, by stipulation, both the notice and the public sale, and in that event a private sale is valid.

Bank — loan — lien on stock — prior pledge — rights.

4. McL. owned ten shares, fully paid up, in the A. State Bank. On June 24th he was indebted to said bank for borrowed money in the sum of $2,000. On the same day he borrowed $5,255 from the F. State Bank, and secured the same by pledging, among other things, his ten shares of stock in the A. State Bank. On June 25th he paid in full his indebtedness to said A. State Bank, and from June 25th to July 8th he was not books of company, as against attachments, executions, or subsequent transfers, see the notes to Mapleton Bank v. Standrod, 67 L.R.A. 656, and Everitt v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 996.

For cases on restriction by by-law or articles of association on the right to sell shares of stock, see the note in New England Trust Co. v. Abbott, 27 L.R.A. 271.

II. Priority as affected by time of incurring indebtedness.

As will be seen, the question of importance is one of notice, not one of the time of incurring the indebtedness.

Thus the fact that the debt to the corporation is incurred after a pledge or assignment of the stock to a third party will not in itself prevent the priority of the corporation's lien in cases where the pledgee or purchaser is presumed to take notice that the corporation claims the right to a lien. Mobile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Cullom, 49 Ala. 558; People's Bank v. Exchange Bank, 116 Ga. 820, 94 Am. St. Rep. 144, 43 S. E. 269; Mt. Holly Paper Co.'s Appeal, 99 Pa. 513; Sproul v. Standard Plate Glass Co. 201 Pa. 103, 50 Atl. 1003; George H. Hammond & Co. v. Hastings, 134 U. S. 401, 33 L. ed. 960, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 727 (obiter).

The same was held where there was a transfer on the books in trust for the corporation, although the certificates were not produced, as they were held by the pledgee for an earlier debt. Platt v. Birmingham Axle Co. 41 Conn. 255.

While in the foregoing cases the lien was statutory, no doubt the same rule would apply where the lien was provided for by the articles of incorporation.

Such was evidently the theory of the court in Dempster Mfg. Co. v. Downs, 126 Iowa, 80, 106 Am. St. Rep. 340, 101 N. W. 735, 3 Ann. Cas. 187, where possibly some of the indebtedness to the company was later than the pledge.

In Gibbs v. Long Island Bank, 83 Hun, 92, 31 N. Y. Supp. 406, affirmed in 151 N. Y. 657, 46 N. Y. 1147, where the lien was indebted to it in any sum whatever. On the latter date he borrowed $1,500 from the A. State Bank. During the time in which he was not indebted to said bank, actual knowledge was given to said bank of the pledging of his ten shares of stock to the F. State Bank, yet, notwithstanding such knowledge, the last loan of $1,500 was made. The contract of pledge stipulated that upon default of payment of the principal sum the pledgee might sell the pledged stock without notice and at private sale. On November 12th plaintiff bought, at private sale, the said shares and thereafter presented the same to the A. State Bank, and demanded that the certificate be canceled and a new certificate be issued, and that the said shares be transferred on the books of such A. State Bank, which was refused on the grounds that McL., the original owner and pledgeor, was then indebted to said A. State Bank, and that said bank had a statutory lien on said stock for such indebtedness, and also for the further reason that the by-laws of said A. State Bank prohibited a transfer of stock by its stockholders who were indebted to said bank either as principal or surety. Held:

First. That the statutory lien which the A. State Bank had against such stock on June 24th was discharged when the owner of such stock, on June 25th, paid all his indebtedness to said bank; and Second. That after June 25th and up to July 8th, when McL., the owner of such stock, was not indebted to said bank, he had a right to sell, assign, or transfer by way of pledge the said stock, and that the same was free from statutory lien; and provided for by the articles of association, the original debt to the company preceded that to the pledgee, and was paid, but the stockholder was continuously indebted to the company, which was given priority.

Third. That when said A. State Bank,

Within the foregoing rule, authority for the lien is unnecessary where notice thereof is upon the certificates of stock and there is no statutory prohibition of such a lien. See the following cases cited infra, III. a, 3: Jennings v. Bank of California, 79 Cal. 325, 5 L.R.A. 233, 12 Am. St. Rep. 145, 21 Pac. 852; Stafford v. Produce Exch. Bkg. Co. 61 Ohio St. 160, 76 Am. St. Rep. 371, 55 N. E. 162; State Sav. Assn. v. Nixon-Jones Printing Co. 25 Mo. App. 642.

On the other hand, where the bona fide pledgee or purchaser for value is not presumed to take notice of any claim to the right of a lien on the part of the company, his rights will be prior to those of the company although it claims upon an earlier debt. Bank of Culloden v. Bank of Forsyth, 120 Ga. 575, 102 Am. St. Rep. 115, 48 S. E. 226; Bank of Holly Springs v. Pinson, 58 Miss. 421, 38 Am. Rep. 330; Anglo-California Bank v. Grangers' Bank, 63 Cal. 359; Driscoll v. West Bradley & C. Mfg. Co. 59 N. Y. 96; Carroll v. Mullanphy Sav. Bank, 8 Mo. App. 249 (where the corporation probably had no lien at all).

The same has been held where there was a failure of constructive notice that the right to a lien was claimed by reason of the certificate referring to the articles, instead of to the by-laws (Re McKain, 7 Ont. L. Rep. 241); or because of the failure of statutory posting of by-laws (Des Moines Nat. Bank v. Warren County Nat. Bank, 97 Iowa, 204, 66 N. W. 154); or failure to place by-law upon the certificate, as required by resolution (Brinkerhoff-Farris Trust & Sav. Co. v. Home Lumber Co. 118 Mo. 447, 24 S. W. 129).

As to the effect of statutes on prior pledges, see infra, IV.

In Louisiana the question would seem to be one of time, not notice. Thus in Pitot v. Johnson, 33 La. Ann. 1286, where by the charter (not, it seems, a legislative charter) stocks could not be transferred "while any 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) matured indebtedness to the association exists on the part of the holders," the court said it had already been decided "that a sale or pledge of the stock of an incorporated company is, under article 3158, complete, even as to third persons, by the delivery to the vendee or pledgee of the certificates of stock; and that notice to the corporation is not necessary to the perfection of the sale or pledge, or to protect the stock from seizure by the vendor's creditors, or from other rights of third persons arising subsequently to the sale or pledge." And the court said further: "It . . . appears that, at the date of the pledge, the holder of the stock owed nothing to the corporation. If notice had been necessary to the validity of the pledge, and had been given, it would not be pretended that, after such notice, indebtedness of the stockholder, arising subsequently, could, in any manner, operate to the prejudice of the rights of the pledgee. But since it is held that, without notice, and by the mere delivery of the certificates, the pledge is binding as to the corporation and all third persons, it logically follows that the pledge fastens on the rights of the pledgeor as they stood at the moment of the pledge, and cannot be affected by subsequent transactions between him and the corporation. A different question might present itself if the indebtedness to the company had existed at the date of the pledge."

III. The question of notice.

a. Notice to the pledgee or assignee.

1. Actual notice of prior debt and claim of lien.

It would seem free from doubt that one who lends upon, or buys, stock, knowing that the stockholder is indebted to the corporation which claims a lien thereon, must be postponed to the claims of the corporation, unless there be statutory prohibition against the corporation having a lien upon its own stock.

with knowledge of the pledge, again made McL. a loan, it did so at its peril, and that it was not entitled to a priority lien on such stock as against the pledgee, who had received such stock in hypothecation when there was no indebtedness to the issuing bank at the time when its second credit was extended to said McL., and that such subsequent loan to said McL. by said A. State Bank made it statutory lien subsequent and secondary to that of the pledgee of such stock; and

Fourth. The pledgee, by virtue of the stipulation between the parties, had a right to sell such pledged stock at private sale, without notice, on November 12th, and the purchaser became the equitable owner and entitled to the legal title to said stock by having the same transferred on the books of the said A. State Bank; and Fifth. The by-laws of said bank which prohibited the sale of stock by a stockholder while indebted to the bank was made for the benefit of the corporation, and its provisions do not apply to bona fide purchasers of stock in good faith at pledgee's sale, especially when the corporation has actual knowledge of the pledge, and such pledge was made at a time when there was no statutory lien on the pledged stock, and the indebtedness by which the bank now claims its lien was created after the stock was pledged.

2. Where no actual notice.

(a) Lien by express terms of statute.

It is a general rule that where, by express terms of statute, a lien is given to a corporation upon the stock for the stockholder's indebtedness to it, or where by statute express power is given to the corporation to refuse to transfer the stock of a stockholder so indebted, its lien is prior to the rights of a pledgee or a bona fide purchaser for value, that is to say, he must take notice of the statute. Union Bank v. Laird, 2 Wheat. 390, 4 L. ed. 260; Mobile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Cullom, 49 Ala. 558; Platt v. Birmingham Axle Co. 41 Conn. 255; Reese v. Bank of Commerce, 14 Md. 271, 74 Am. Dec. 536; Russel Wheel & Foundry Co. v. Hammond, S. & Co. 130 Mich. 7, 89 N. W. 590; Michigan Trust Co. v. State Bank, 111 Mich. 306, 69 N. W. 645; Citizens' State Bank v. Kalamazoo County Bank, 111 Mich. 313, 69 N. W. 663; Schmidt v. Hennepin County Barrel Co. 35 Minn. 511, 29 N. W. 200; Dorr v. Life Ins. Clearing Co. 71 Minn. 38, 70 Am. St. Rep. 309, 73 N. W. 635; Moore v. Royal Oak Lumber & Supply Co. — Mich. —, 137 N. W. 270; Rogers v. Huntingdon Bank, 12 Serg. & R. 77; Sproul v. Standard Plate Glass Co. 201 Pa. 103, 50 Atl. 1003; Bohmer v. City Bank, 77 Va. 455; George H. Hammond & Co. v. Hastings, 134 U. S. 401, 33 L. ed. 960, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 727 (obiter).

See also as asserting the rule, Oakland County Sav. Bank v. State Bank, 113 Mich. 284, 67 Am. St. Rep. 463, 71 N. W. 453, where, however, it was held that on the facts the corporation was estopped from claiming a lien.

In People's Bank v. Exchange Bank, 116 Ga. 820, 94 Am. St. Rep. 144, 43 S. E. 269, where there was a statutory lien in favor of the corporation, it was held that it is the right of the corporation to treat the stockholder as the rightful and legal owner of the stock, and to deal with him accordingly up to the time that it receives notice of the equity of another party, and that therefore loans made by a corporation to its stockholder after his stock has been pledged, but before the corporation is aware of it, are prior to the rights of the pledgee.

In Farmers' Bank v. Iglehart, 6 Gill. 50, where the legatee of a remainder interest in certain stock in a company, being indebted to the company, and while the life beneficiary was living assigned his interest to a purchaser for value, it was held that the company's lien under its statutory charter was prior to the rights of such purchaser.

In Sproul v. Standard Plate Glass Co. 201 Pa. 103, 50 Atl. 1003, where a stockholder, after assigning his stock as collateral security, became indebted to the company by a defalcation, and after the defalcation the company learned of the transfer or pledge of the stock, it was held that while a statute providing that no certificate should be transferred so long as the holder thereof was indebted to said company, unless the board of directors should consent thereto, did not give an express lien, it did give power to negative the transfer.

As the theory of the above rule is that the pledgee or assignee of the certificate is bound to take notice of the statutory lien, a fortiori the same result will follow when the statutory lien is asserted on the certificate. German Nat. Bank v. Kentucky Trust Co. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 361, 40 S. W. 458.

See also dictum in Franklin Bank v. Commercial Bank, 5 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 339, where the pledgee, by virtue of a statute, was prohibited from taking stocks as a pledge.

(b) Lien by articles of association.

It has also been held that a pledgee was required to take notice of a lien provided for by the articles of incorporation.

Thus, in Dempster Mfg. Co. v. Downs, 126 Iowa, 80, 106 Am. St. Rep. 340, 101 N. W. 735, 3 Ann. Cas. 187, where the corporation had no notice of a pledge at the time its claims arose (some at least of which preceded the pledge), it was held that its lien provided for in its publicly filed and recorded articles of incorporation was prior the transfer on the books of the defendant bank of certain shares of stock purchased at pledgee's sale and for damages. Affirmed.

Statement by Robertson, C.:

This action was tried to the court on an agreed statement of facts, which statement contained all the facts save and except one question, as follows, to wit: "Did the Ardmore State Bank have notice at any time between the date of June 24, 1908, and July 8, 1908, that Richard R. McLish had pledged his ten shares of stock represented by certificate No. 3 to the First State Bank?"—which issue was submitted to a jury and was decided in the affirmative, and thus declared that the Ardmore

State Bank did have notice between the said dates that McLish had pledged his ten shares of stock, represented by certificate No. 3 of the First State Bank. Thereafter the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law as follows:

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law.

(1) The court finds: That the Ardmore State Bank is a corporation incorporated under the laws of the state of Oklahoma, with a capital stock of $25,000 paid up, and that the said bank was authorized by the state bank commission to do business on May 19, 1908, and that it opened for business at Ardmore on June 1, 1908.

(2) That Richard R. McLish was one of the organizers of said bank, and on June to that of the pledgee, although there was no distinct statutory authority for the lien, and the certificate did not refer to the lien or the articles, and the pledgee had no actual notice of the articles or of the debt to the corporation.

Where the certificate refers to the articles of incorporation, a pledgee or assignee must take notice of their provisions. Gibbs v. Long Island Bank, 83 Hun, 92, 31 N. Y. Supp. 406, affirmed in 151 N. Y. 657, 46 N. E. 1147; Leggett v. Bank of Sing Sing, 24 N. Y. 283.

(c) Lien by by-law.

Where the lien is based on a by-law, while there is general agreement that, in the absence of statutory prohibition, it will be good as against the stockholder, there is some difference of opinion in the authorities as to its effect upon pledgees and bona fide purchasers. Some of the earlier cases hold that such a by-law will be authorized by general words in the statute, and therefore will be something of which a pledgee or bona fide purchaser is presumed to have notice, while the trend of the modern cases is to the contrary. Whether a by-law of this character enacted under express statutory authority would be a matter of which the present courts would require a pledgee or bona fide purchaser to take notice would seem at least doubtful.

Where by-law expressly authorized by statute.

In Planters' & M. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Selma Sav. Bank, 63 Ala. 585, infra, VII., where the court does not refer to the statute further than to say that the corporation's by-law was "passed in the exercise of its corporate powers," it seems that the statute expressly authorized a by-law restricting transfers of indebted stockholders; and the pledgee, who apparently had no actual notice of such by-law, was held bound by it. There appears to be no other case where this precise question has been decided, although there are cases which seem to disclaim holding that a pledgee or assignee would not be deemed to have notice of a restricting by-law expressly authorized by the statute (and the question is of course included in the cases cited infra, holding that such a by-law authorized by general words in a statute must be taken notice of by pledgees and purchasers).

In Bank of Culloden v. Bank of Forsyth, 120 Ga. 575, 102 Am. St. Rep. 115, 48 S. E. 226, where there was no lien by the charter, but the statutes permitted a lien by by-law, as against transferees "with notice," it was held that as there was no notice of lien on the certificate that the pledgee was not required to take notice of such by-law, of which he had no actual notice, and that his lien was prior to that of the corporation whose debt existed at the time of the pledge.

Lack of express statutory authority.

The reader will understand that it is not the purpose of this note to discuss the question what statutory words will authorize a by-law restricting transfers by a stockholder indebted to the corporation, but only the question whether a pledgee or purchaser of the stock is bound to take notice of a by-law reserving the right to a lien adopted under a statute which, though not explicit on the point, is construed to authorize the same.

Some of the earlier cases hold that general statutory words are sufficient authority for such a by-law, and that a transferee must take notice of it.

Thus in Cunningham v. Alabama L. Ins. & T. Co. 4 Ala. 652, it was held that such a by-law was not inconsistent with the charter, which contained a provision that the certificate of stock "shall be assignable on the books of the corporation, to be kept at such place or places, and under such regulations, as the board of trustees shall establish;" and that a purchaser for value without notice of any encumbrance was not entitled to the transfer of stock, where the note of the firm of the transferrer was held by the corporation.

Similarly in Pendergast v. Bank of Stockton, 2 Sawy. 108, Fed. Cas. No. 10,918, such 4, 1908, there was issued to him certificate No. 3, representing ten shares of the capital stock of the par value of $1,000.

(3) That on June 13, 1908, the Ardmore State Bank loaned to the said Richard R. McLish $2,000, which was paid on June 25, 1908. That on July 8, 1908, the Ardmore State Bank made a second loan to the said Richard R. McLish in the sum of $1,500, which amount was due and unpaid on November 12, 1908, at which time the plaintiff herein purchased the stock issued to the said Richard R. McLish by the Ardmore State Bank.

(4) That a meeting of the directors of the Ardmore State Bank was held January 12, 1909, at which meeting a dividend of 5 per cent was declared on the capital stock of said bank, and the dividend on the $1,000 stock standing in the name of Richard R. McLish was not paid to this plaintiff because the books of this bank showed said stock to be the property of the said McLish.

(5) That a short time subsequent to January 12, 1909, the plaintiff presented to the president and cashier of the bank certificate No. 3, representing $1,000 of the capital stock of said bank issued to Richard R. McLish, and requested and demanded that said certificate be canceled, and, in lieu thereof, a new certificate be issued to this plaintiff by virtue of his having purchased this stock from the First State Bank of Ardmore on November 12th as aforesaid, and that the officers of the said a by-law was held to be authorized by a statute providing that the stock should be transferable in such manner as should be prescribed by the by-laws, and that therefore an assignee of stock certificates (which apparently did not refer to the by-law) could not have them transferred, where at the time of the assignment the assignor was indebted to the company. The court, however, did not discuss the question of notice, but simply that of power.

In this connection, while there was notice of the by-law on the certificate, reference may be made to St. Louis Perpetual Ins. Co. v. Goodfellow, 9 Mo. 149, holding such a by-law authorized where by statutes the stock was assignable and transferable according to such rules as the board of directors should establish, and the company empowered to make and prescribe such by-laws and regulations, as to them should seem proper, touching the interest and business of the company, and that if at the time an assignee of stock applied to have shares transferred, there was an indebtedness from the assignor to the company, the company was not bound to transfer the stock. But the modern Missouri cases do not consider general statutory words as authority for by-laws of this character.

The better opinion is against the authority under indefinite statutes to pass by-laws restricting the transfer of stock by owners indebted to the corporation. Bank of Atchison County v. Durfee, 118 Mo. 431, 40 Am. St. Rep. 396, 24 S. W. 133; Driscoll v. West Bradley & C. Mfg. Co. 59 N. Y. 96.

In Anglo-California Bank v. Grangers' Bank, 63 Cal. 359, it was held that such by-law was inconsistent with a statute which provided: "Whenever the capital stock of any corporation is divided into shares, and certificates therefor are issued, such shares of stock are personal property, and may be transferred by indorsement by the signature of the proprietor, or his attorney or legal representative, and delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid except between the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by and to whom transferred, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer."

In Bronson Electric Co. v. Rheubottom, 122 Mich. 608, 81 N. W. 563, where the statutory provisions were very general, the court seems to have followed the doctrine that, generally speaking, a by-law creating a lien would not be binding upon an innocent purchaser for value, but would be otherwise binding and valid; and it held in this case that the pledgee having taken the stock as collateral security for an antecedent debt, and not having definitely agreed to forbear, could not be considered as a purchaser for value, and therefore its claim was subordinate to that of the company, which seems in fact to have arisen prior to the claim of the pledgee.

And the modern cases hold that where there is no clear authority by statute or charter to make such by-law, the pledgee or purchaser without actual notice of it will be preferred to the corporation. Anglo-California Bank v. Grangers' Bank and Bank of Atchison County v. Durfee, supra.

See also to similar effect Brinkerhoff-Farris Trust & Sav. Co. v. Home Lumber Co. 118 Mo. 447, 24 S. W. 129 (where, however, a resolution that the unauthorized by-law should appear upon the face of the certificate had not been carried out).

The same was held in Bank of Holly Springs v. Pinson, 58 Miss. 421, 38 Am. Rep. 330, where the charter provided that the board of directors might by by-law provide for the mode and manner of transferring the stock; but the case contained the further elements that notice of the by-law did not appear upon the certificate as the by-law required, and the corporation received in silence the notice given by the pledgee to it before advancing her money. And the court, besides holding that the pledgee was not required to take notice of the by-law, held further that the omission in the certificate of the notice required by the by-law was an engagement by the corporation not to assert the by-law against a person not having notice of it. The court said: "It seems to be well recognized that a by-law has no bank refused to cancel said certificate and issue new certificate to plaintiff, because they claimed to have a lien on the stock of the said Richard R. McLish by virtue of the fact that the said McLish was indebted to them, and, under the statute, they had a lien on said stock for such indebtedness.

(6) That the said Richard R. McLish is now indebted to the Ardmore State Bank in an amount exceeding the book value and the market value or the par value of said stock.

(7) That the plaintiff herein purchased said certificate of stock from the First State Bank of Ardmore, Oklahoma on November 12, 1908, who obtained the same from Richard R. McLish on June 24, 1908, as part security for a loan made to the said McLish by the First State Bank, and that the First State Bank held said stock until sold to the plaintiff herein as pledgee of the said McLish.

(8) That the said Richard R. McLish on the 24th day of June, 1908, made, executed, and delivered to the Ardmore Loan & Trust Company his promissory note for the sum of $5,250 to become due and payable October 1, 1908, as part collateral of which he pledged the ten shares of stock in question, and that in said note the said McLish gave the legal holder of said note full power and authority to sell said ten shares of stock of the Ardmore State Bank, or any portion thereof, at public or private sale, at the option of the holder, on the extracorporate force, and is only binding on those dealing with the corporation who have notice of it, or who deal with it under such circumstances that they are bound to take notice of it. A solution of the question will be found in the right determination of the categories in which notice is inferred. By-laws of private corporations are not in the nature of legislative enactments, so far as third persons are concerned. They are mere regulations of the corporation for the control and management of its own affairs. They are self-imposed rules, resulting from an agreement or contract between the corporation and its members to conduct the corporate business in a particular way. They are not intended to interfere in the least with the rights and privileges of others who do not subject themselves to their influence. It may be said with truth, therefore, that no person not a member of the corporation can be affected in any of his rights by a corporate by-law of which he has no notice. In some instances, as we have seen, if he have no actual notice he will be held to have constructive notice."

In Just v. State Sav. Bank, 132 Mich. 600, 94 N. W. 200 (referred to and quoted from in ARDMORE STATE BANK v. MASON) where the statutory lien covered only debts due, but a by-law extended it to debts whether due or not, it was held that a pledgee without notice of the by-law who extended the time of his claim when taking the pledge was a bona fide holder and entitled to priority over the company's unmaturing claim, but that the company had a subsequent lien to the pledgee by reason of a special agreement and the by-law.

In New Orleans Nat. Bkg. Asso. v. Wiltz, 4 Woods, 47, 10 Fed. 330, it was held that the corporation to hold a lien must show its authority for the restrictive provisions, in some statute or law of the state; but in that case a lien of the corporation would have been of no effect against third persons, there being no record as required by the local state law.

In Bank of Attica v. Manufacturers' & T. Bank, 20 N. Y. 501, where the statute declared that the shares should be transfer-able on the books in such manner as might be agreed in the articles of association, it was held that a restricting by-law would not avail the corporation as against a purchaser of stock for value without notice of the by-law,—but the decision rested particularly on the lack of power.

3. Notice of lien on certificate.

In the absence of a statute prohibiting a lien to the corporation, a notice upon the certificate that its transfer is subject to the payment of the stockholder's debts to the corporation will give it a lien prior to the rights of pledgees or assignees for value of the certificate.

Thus in Jennings v. Bank of California, 79 Cal. 323, 5 L.R.A. 233, 12 Am. St. Rep. 145, 21 Pac. 852, where the certificate provided that the stock might not be transferred without the payment of the indebtedness "of the person in whose name the stock stands on the books of the bank," though there was no by-law to this effect nor any express statutory authority for it, it was held that stock in a bank corporation having been transferred for value, at a time when the holder was largely indebted to the corporation, the transferee could not object to the corporation's lien for advances made after the transfer, he having given no notice to the bank of the transfer, but allowed the assignor to continue to draw the dividends and to act as owner.

So, where the certificates of stock stated: "Not transferable by any stockholder liable to this company, as principal debtor or otherwise, without consent of the board of directors," and the stockholder pledged the certificate for a loan, and afterwards became indebted to the corporation which at the time had no knowledge of the pledge, it was held that the corporation's rights were prior to those of the pledgee, although there was no statute or by-law authorizing such a contract. Stafford v. Produce Exch. Bkg. Co. 61 Ohio St. Rep. 160, 76 Am. St. Rep. 371, 55 N. E. 162.

So, in Morison-Wentworth Bank v. Ker-dollf, 75 Mo. App. 207, where it was urged nonperformance of the obligation expressed in said note, and without advertising the same and otherwise giving notice.

(9) The court further finds that the question as to whether the Ardmore State Bank at the time it made its second loan of $1,500 to Richard R. McLish on July 8, 1908, had notice that McLish's stock was pledged to the First State Bank, could not be agreed upon by the plaintiff and defendant; the plaintiff contending that the Ardmore State Bank had notice and the defendant denying this. The question of fact was left to a jury, who, after hearing the testimony of the respective cashiers of each bank, found that Harold Wallace, cashier of the Ardmore State Bank, had been notified by J. B. Boone, cashier of the First State Bank, that this stock was pledged to the First State Bank, and the court further finds that the Ardmore State Bank by reason of this notice to its cashier is chargeable with such notice.

(10) The court finds that the original indebtedness of McLish to the defendant bank existing on the 24th day of June, 1908, was paid by McLish on the 25th day of June, 1908, by check on the First State Bank of Ardmore, and that McLish had obtained the funds upon which this check was drawn by obtaining a loan from the First State Bank for which he gave a mortgage on various and sundry chattels, and, in addition thereto, pledged his ten shares of stock in the Ardmore State Bank.

that the by-law was invalid and contained a statement that it was agreed that the corporation shall have a lien, etc., it was held that an assignee of a certificate must take notice of such a lien.

In view of the claim which was made that the by-law was invalid, reference may be here made to State Sav. Assn. v. Nixon-Jones Printing Co. 25 Mo. App. 642, where a lien was claimed under a by-law passed by the board of directors composed of all the stockholders of the company, and this by-law was in substance upon the certificate of stock. It was held that the lien of the corporation for a debt incurred after a pledge of the stock, but before the corporation knew of the pledge, was prior to the lien of the pledgee.

But a reference on the certificate to the articles of incorporation will be no notice of a by-law. Thus in Re McKain, 7 Ont. L. Rep. 241, where the certificate of stock stated that the articles of the company were part and parcel of the contract, and were accepted as part of the contract between the company and the shareholder, and there was a by-law giving the company a lien on the stock of a shareholder for any indebtedness to the company, a shareholder owning two parcels of shares,—three shares which were fully paid and seven which were not fully paid,—assigned for value the certificate for the three shares, and it was held that the assignee was not bound to take notice of the by-laws of the company and was entitled to priority over the company's claim for the unpaid part of the seven shares.

Where other security is taken.

The taking by the corporation of other security for the stockholder's debt to it was held to be no waiver of the lien reserved by its charter, where the certificates state that the stock "is subject to all claims of the company against the owner." Kenton Ins. Co. v. Bowman, 84 Ky. 430, 1 S. W. 717.

The same was held where the statutory charter reserved a lien which was asserted on the certificate. German Nat. Bank v. Kentucky Trust Co. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 361, 40 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

S. W. 458, where, however, there was also a by-law that the lien could not be waived.

Failure to post by-law.

Where the certificates stated that they were subject to the by-laws and articles of incorporation, it was held that a pledgee without actual notice of a restricting by-law was not bound by it, where it had not been posted as required by the statute, which provided that "a copy of the by-laws of the corporation, with the names of all its officers appended thereto, must be posted in the principal place of business, and be subject to public inspection." Des Moines Nat. Bank v. Warren County Bank, 97 Iowa, 204, 66 N. W. 154.

b. Where corporation has notice of the pledge or sale.

Where the corporation's claim against the stockholder arises after notice to it of the pledge or assignment, its lien is subordinate thereto. ARDMORE STATE BANK v. MASON; Hotchkiss & U. Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, 15 C. C. A. 264, 37 U. S. App. 86, 68 Fed. 76; Curtice v. Crawford County Bank, 56 C. C. A. 174, 118 Fed. 390, modifying 110 Fed. 830; Bank of America v. McNeil, 10 Bush, 54; Bank of Kentucky v. Bonnie Bros. 102 Ky. 343, 43 S. W. 407; Conant v. Reed, 1 Ohio St. 298; White River Sav. Bank v. Capital Sav. Bank & T. Co. 77 Vt. 123, 107 Am. St. Rep. 754, 59 Atl. 197; Bradford Bkg. Co. v. Briggs, 3 Times L. R. 170; Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Co. 53 L. T. N. S. 219, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1035, L. R. 32 Ch. Div. 266, 34 Week. Rep. 669.

Where by the articles of association the company had a lien for debts of its stockholders to it, whether due or not, the owner of shares pledged them for an antecedent debt, to a stranger, who promptly notified the company and later paid instalments on the shares, and, after giving the pledge, the owner guaranteed dividends to the company, which was pressing him with a claim that he had misrepresented the value of property sold by him to the company on its forma-

Conclusions of Law.

The court holds as the questions decisive of the case, that the First State Bank, the holder of the McLish note, had a right to offer for sale the ten shares of McLish stock at private sale under the authority contained in the note, and that I. R. Mason was a bona fide purchaser of same for value, and is legally entitled to have said shares transferred to him on the books of the bank.

The court holds that the lien of the Ardmore State Bank, by reason of McLish's first indebtedness of $2,000, was removed by the payment of the indebtedness, and that in making the second loan of $1,500 to McLish, by which the defendant bank tion, it was held that the pledgee's right was superior to the right of the company on the guaranty. Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Co. 53 L. T. N. S. 219, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1035, L. R. 32 Ch. Div. 266, 34 Week. Rep. 669.

In Neamith v. Washington Bank, 6 Pick. 324, it was held that a corporation which, after notice of the transfer of stock and the receipt of an instalment thereon from the transferee, lends money to the original stockholder, cannot claim that its loan was made on the faith of the stock, under a by-law giving a lien.

In Hotchkiss & U. Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, 15 C. C. A. 264, 37 U. S. App. 86, 68 Fed. 76, where, after a pledge of stock became known to the corporation, the stockholder embezzled money of the corporation, it was held that the pledgee's right was superior to that of the corporation, although no copy of a power of attorney authorizing the transfer had been filed with the corporation, as the statute required in order to hold such stock against anyone except the pledgee or his personal representatives; and the statute further provided that the corporation should at all times have a lien upon all the stock owned by any person therein for all debts due to it from him. The appellate court, while deciding the case upon the question of actual notice as equivalent to that required by the statute, doubted whether a debt by embezzlement would not give a lien under the statute. This last question was not raised by the appeal, but the lower court, on another branch of the case, directly decided that there was such lien for a debt by embezzlement.

Corporation may be put on inquiry.

In Bank of Kentucky v. Bonnie Bros. 102 Ky. 343, 43 S. W. 407, where a stockholder in a bank owed money to the bank, and afterwards obtained a loan from a third party, to which he assigned his bank stock as collateral, and thereafter the bank, having reason to be put on inquiry as to the pledge of stock, discounted other later paper 36 L.R.A. (N.S.)

seeks to assert its lien, was made by the bank at its peril, in view of its knowledge of the pledging of the stock, and, being chargeable with that knowledge, it virtually waived its right to an assertion of its statutory lien.

The court holds that the provisions giving the issuing bank a lien upon the stock do not mean a priority of lien as against a pledgee who has received the stock in hypothecation when there is no indebtedness to the issuing bank at the time of the hypothecation, and when its credit was extended to its stockholder at a time when his stock was known to be so hypothecated elsewhere. And such subsequent loan to its stockholder by the issuing bank made its lien secondary.

of the stockholder then held by another customer of the bank, it was held that the pledgee's lien, while secondary to that of the bank on the first loan, was prior to that of the bank on the second loan.

In Bank of America v. McNeil, 10 Bush, 54, it was held that where at the time of making a loan, the corporation, while knowing of an original pledge, might not have known that the original loan had been canceled, a new note being given for part thereof and a repledge made of the stock, nevertheless it was put upon its inquiry by its knowledge of the original pledge.

Knowledge of equity.

In Prince Invest. Co. v. St. Paul & S. C. Land Co. 68 Minn. 121, 70 N. W. 1079, it was held where a stockholder was bound in equity to transfer his stock to another corporation, and the corporation of which this was the stock was aware that in equity the stock belonged to the other corporation, that it was not entitled to any lien upon this stock by reason of obligations of the stockholder arising subsequent to its knowledge of the equity of the other corporation.

In St. Paul Nat. Bank v. Life Ins. Clearing Co. 71 Minn. 123, 73 N. W. 713, where a subscriber for certain shares of stock in a new corporation was at the same time indebted to a bank on notes secured by mortgages, he represented to the bank and to the new corporation that if the bank would release the mortgages, he would then mortgage the same property to the corporation to secure his note for his subscription, and in that way obtain from the corporation fully paid certificates of stock, which he would lodge with the bank to take the place of the released mortgages. This arrangement was carried out, and the stockholder afterwards becoming insolvent, it was held that the corporation could not assert as against the bank, the lien upon the stock of the corporation (but the waiver or estoppel was not by reason of its taking other security).

Statute.

In Birmingham Trust & Sav. Co. v. Loui-

The court further holds that the provision in article 12 of the by-laws of the defendant bank, namely, "no transfer of stock of this association shall be made by any stockholder who shall be liable to this bank, either as principal debtor or otherwise, without the consent of the board of directors, and certificates of stock shall contain, upon their face, notice of this provision," does not affect the rights of pledgee who receives the stock when there is no liability to the issuing bank, and the rights of pledgee being not affected, if he received the stock when there is no liability a subsequent loan by the issuing bank, before the sale of the stock, cannot affect the purchaser, as the purchaser became subrogated to all the rights of the pledgee.

The court holds that the section of the state bank law regulating how a pledged stock should be sold when in the hands of a pledgee clearly means a public sale, but, as the pledgeor at a time when he was not indebted to the issuing bank stipulated that the pledgee could sell said stock at public or private sale at the option of the holder on the nonperformance of the obligations expressed in said note, and without advertising same or otherwise giving notice, it was a waiver which the pledgeor had a right to make, and the stock being sold at private sale, the purchaser obtained a good title, and one which the issuing bank cannot complain of in view siana Nat. Bank, 99 Ala. 379, 20 L.R.A. 600, 13 So. 112, where by the statute the corporation had a lien on the stock for any debt or liability incurred to it by the shareholder, before notice of a transfer or of a levy thereon, the court, in holding that the corporation had no lien where it had notice of a pledge of the stock at the time it made its loan, said: "The lien which the corporation can assert and enforce against a prior transfer of the stock, though the transfer may create only an equity, binds the legal title of the shareholder, by the very terms of the statute. Like the protection extended to bona fide creditors, or subsequent purchasers, it is dependent on a want of notice of the transfer, if the debts or liabilities were incurred by the shareholder. The lien, being created by statute, is limited in operation and extent by the terms of the statute, and can arise and be enforced only in the event and under the facts provided for in the statute. If there is a levy on the stock, or a transfer of it, subsequent to the incurring of a debt or liability to the corporation by the shareholder, the levy or transfer is subordinate to the corporation's lien. But if the debt or liability does not precede the levy or transfer, the lien is subordinate, and must yield, unless the corporation dealt with the shareholder without knowledge or notice. Having knowledge or notice, in fair dealing, the corporation could not extend credit to the shareholder, relying upon the lien to displace whatever of right the levy or transfer may have conferred."

IV. Effect of changes in statutes, by-laws, etc., with respect to liens.

A number of cases have arisen construing changes in the statutes, by-laws, or articles of association with respect to liens.

In Birmingham Trust & Sav. Co. v. East Lake Land Co. 101 Ala. 304, 13 So. 72, where a stockholder had become indebted to the corporation prior to the statute giving the corporation a lien on shares for debts incurred before notice of a transfer or levy, and after the statute he transferred the stock as collateral security for a debt owing to a third party, it was held that the lien of the company was superior to the lien of the third party.

Where a stockholder became indebted to the corporation at the time that the statute provided that every such corporation should have a lien upon all shares of stock for all debts due from the owners to such corporation, and after the repeal of this clause of the statute the owner of the stock pledged it to a third party, it was held that the corporation's lien was superior to that of the pledgee, there being a general statute preserving rights acquired under repealed statutes; but the court seemed to be of the opinion that, irrespective of such general statute, the result would have been the same. H. W. Wright Lumber Co. v. Hixon, 105 Wis. 153, 80 N. W. 1110, 1135.

Where the statute provided that no pledge of stock not consummated by an actual transfer to the name of the transferee should be effectual to hold the stock against any person but the pledgeor and his executors and administrators until a copy of the power of attorney for the transfer should be filed with the corporation, after a number of loans had been made on the security of stock in a certain corporation, a statute was passed which provided that every corporation "shall at all times have a lien upon all the stock owned by any person therein, for all debts due it from him;" thereafter another loan was made upon the security of additional stock of the corporation, and it was held that a subsequent loan made by the corporation to the stockholder had priority over all the other loans made by the pledgeor of which the corporation had no notice. First Nat. Bank v. Hartford Life & Annuity Ins. Co. 45 Conn. 22.

But in People ex rel. Bosqui v. Crockett, 9 Cal. 112, where after the transfer of shares for a valuable consideration the board of directors of a corporation passed a by-law that transfers would not be made while indebtedness existed, such board having power, under the charter, to pass such a by-law to operate prospectively, it was held that the transferee was prior in right to an of its notice that the stock was hypothecated before it made its loan of July 8th, and all the resulting injury such notice put upon it.

The court therefore holds that the prayer of the petitioner should be granted, as it is clearly warranted by the facts and pleadings in the case.

S. H. Russell,
District Judge.

Thereafter, in accordance with such findings and conclusions, the court entered judgment in favor of plaintiff, requiring defendant to transfer such stock on its books and to issue new certificate of stock to plaintiff as of date November 12, 1908, to the end that said plaintiff might have the dividends and other benefits growing out of said stock after November 8, 1908, to which judgment defendant excepted, and brings this appeal to reverse the same.

Messrs. H. C. Potterf and E. A. Walker, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff's prayer that defendant be compelled to transfer the ten shares of stock to him, and accrued dividends, and for damages, is in effect a suit in mandamus, and is not the proper remedy.

State ex rel. Stevenson v. Russell, 21 Okla. 58, 95 Pac. 463; 26 Cyc. 139; Tanner v. Gregory, 71 Wis. 490, 37 N. W. 830; 10 Cyc. 608, 609; Kimball v. Union Water Co. 44 Cal. 173, 13 Am. Rep. 157; Rex v. Bank of England, 2 Dougl. K. B. 526; earlier debt of the stockholder to the corporation.

In Philadelphia S. S. Dock Co. v. Heron, 52 Pa. 280, where a stockholder died while indebted to the company, and after his death the company passed a by-law that transfers should not be made by anyone indebted to the company, etc., it was held that his administratrix, subsequent assignee for value, was entitled to have the stock transferred.

Where a debtor assigned stock in the defendant, an English corporation, as collateral security to his creditor, and subsequently, being unable to pay his debt, made his conveyance absolute, at the time of the pledge and for two years thereafter the articles of association of the defendant provided, in the case of shares not fully paid up, that the directors might refuse to register a transfer by a member against whom the company had an unsatisfied claim, and that the company should have a first and paramount lien upon such shares, registered in the name of any member for any debt due by him to the company. Prior to any notice of the pledge, the corporation amended its articles of association so as to give it a paramount lien against a stockholder's shares for any indebtedness from him to the company, whether the shares were or were not fully paid up, and during the whole time the pledgee was indebted to the corporation in an amount much exceeding the value of the shares. It was held that, whereas the corporation under the English law by its amendment would secure a lien upon the shares paramount to the one which the pledgee had obtained two years before, the corporation had a right prior to that of the pledgee. Hudson River Pulp & Paper Co. v. H. H. Warner & Co. 39 C. C. A. 452, 99 Fed. 187. (The report of the case seems to take for granted that the shares were fully paid up.)

In Sproul v. Standard Plate Glass Co. 201 Pa. 103, 50 Atl. 1003, it was held that where the indebtedness of a stockholder to the corporation arose prior to a repeal of the statute giving the lien, that such repeal would not affect the lien, there being nothing in the statute to show that it was intended to have any retroactive effect.

V. Statute of limitation barring debt to corporation.

That the statute of limitations has barred an action by the corporation on its claim will not release its lien upon the stock, as that statute in general bars the remedy, and not the debt. Brent v. Bank of Washington, 10 Pet. 596, 9 L. ed. 547; Farmers' Bank v. Iglehart, 6 Gill, 50; Sproul v. Standard Plate Glass Co. 201 Pa. 103, 50 Atl. 1003; Geyer v. Western Ins. Co. 3 Pittsb. 41 (action between the company and a purchaser at execution sale, where there had been an execution attachment in which the company had been summoned as garnishee).

VI. Obligations matured or unmatured.

While it is not intended to take up the general question of what obligations are included within the expressions in statutes or by-laws, etc., of "debt," "due," etc., reference is here made to cases where the question has arisen in respect to priority of lien.

Where the statute provided that no stockholder "indebted to the institution" should be authorized to make a transfer or receive a dividend until such debt should have been discharged, etc., it was held that the assignees of stock were not authorized to have it transferred ahead of notes discounted, but not due, at the time the transfer was asked. Grant v. Mechanics' Bank, 15 Serg. & R. 140.

So, in St. Louis Perpetual Ins. Co. v. Goodfellow, 9 Mo. 149, it was held that the expression "indebted" to the company applies to obligations whether matured or not, but it does not seem clear from the report that the obligations in the case were unmatured at the time a transfer was demanded.

In Leggett v. Bank of Sing Sing, 24 N. Y. 283, it was held that an unmatured obligation is a debt "due" to the corporation within the meaning of such expression in the articles of association.

Baker v. Marshall, 15 Minn. 177, Gil. 136; Dooley v. Gladiator Consol. Gold Mines & Mill. Co. 134 Iowa, 468, 109 N. W. 864, 13 Ann. Cas. 297; Jennings v. Bank of California, 79 Cal. 323, 5 L.R.A. 233, 12 Am. St. Rep. 145, 21 Pac. 852; Vansanda v. Middlesex County Bank, 26 Conn. 144; Union Bank v. Laird, 2 Wheat. 393, 4 L. ed. 270; Taylor v. Weston, 77 Cal. 534, 20 Pac. 62; Bohmer v. City Bank, 77 Va. 445.

Messrs. Moore & Bass for defendant in error.

Robertson, C., filed the following opinion:

For convenience plaintiff in error will hereinafter be designated as defendant and defendant in error will be designated as plaintiff. Defendant relies upon five assignments of error for reversal, to wit:

"(1) The court erred in overruling defendant's motion to strike out plaintiff's prayer for relief in its petition, wherein he prayed that defendant be compelled to transfer the ten shares of stock to him, and accrued dividends and for damages.

"(2) The court erred in overruling the defendant's general demurrer to the original petition of plaintiff.

"(3) The court erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's reply to defendant's first amended answer.

"(4) The court erred in overruling the plaintiff in error's motion for judgment on the pleadings.

"(5) The court erred in overruling the motion of the plaintiff in error for a verdict after all the evidence had been heard."

Did the court err in refusing to strike out the prayer of plaintiff's petition? The striking out of the prayer would have had the effect of dismissing the action, or

The same was held Re London, B. & S. S. Bkg. Co. 34 Beav, 332, where the articles of the company gave it a lien upon a shareholder's shares "for all moneys due to the company from him," and provided that it might decline to register a transfer while the transferor was "indebted" to it. After the banking company had discounted bills of a certain individual he became a shareholder in the company, and later he deposited the shares as security for an advance by a third party, who promptly notified the company. At that time his bills with the company had not matured, and it was held that the lien of the company was superior to that of the pledgee.

But in Re Stockton Malleable Iron Co. L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 101, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 168, where the articles provided that the company should have a lien "for any moneys due to the company," etc., and that it might decline to register transfers of shares while the member was "indebted" to the company, it was held where there had been a transfer of the shares, and at the time they reached the company it held an unmatured bill of exchange accepted by the shareholder, that the shares must be transferred to the transferee. Counsel cited the foregoing case of Re London, B. & S. S. Bkg. Co. but the court did not refer to it.

Where under the statute a corporation is not required to transfer any stock while the owner is liable to it for any debt which shall be due and unpaid, it was held that where the pledgee took the pledge at the time when the obligations to the company were unmatured, but did not ask the company to transfer the stock until those obligations had matured, that the company had the priority; the court not passing on the question as to what would have been the case had the demand been made before the obligation had matured. Michigan Trust Co. v. State Bank, 111 Mich. 306, 69 N. W. 645, followed in Citizens' State Bank v. Kalamazoo County Bank, 111 Mich. 313, 69 N. W. 663.

In Reese v. Bank of Commerce, 14 Md. 271, 74 Am. Dec. 536, where the statutory restriction upon transfers required the payment of "all debts actually due and payable to the corporation" by the stockholder requesting a transfer; and at the time that the transfer was first demanded by the pledgee, certain debts had matured and the transfer was refused without their payment, and after such demand and refusal other obligations had matured in favor of the company,—it was held that it would be necessary for the pledgee, in order to obtain a transfer, to pay all those obligations which had matured at the time of the transfer.

In this connection reference may be made to Brent v. Bank of Washington, 10 Pet. 596, 9 L. ed. 547, where the charter of a bank provided that debts "actually due and payable to the bank (days of grace for payment being passed) by a stockholder must be satisfied" before a transfer shall be made, etc., and a stockholder died indebted to the United States, and also indebted to the bank on several notes, one of which was unmatured at the time of his death, it was held that while the bank had no prior lien at law upon this note, that in equity such lien would be protected.

VII. Miscellaneous.

Where a shareholder transferred on the books of the company certain of his shares to a fictitious person, and afterwards became indebted to the company, and still later procured a person of the name of the fictitious person to transfer the shares to an assignee, to which assignee it seems the original shareholder had been indebted before the assignment, it was held that the corporation's rights under a statutory lien were superior to those of the assignee, as it was considered that the shareholder had not at any time parted with his shares, except by way of the assignment to his creditor, who would have required an amendment to the petition asking for different relief. Defendant insists that the action, in effect, is one of mandamus, and, being such, is not a proper remedy in such a case as stated in the petition. With this contention of counsel we cannot agree. This action has few of the characteristics of mandamus, although the relief sought might possibly lead one to such an inference. A purchaser of bank stock has a right to compel, by bill in equity, the transfer of the same on the books of the corporation, or he may sue in conversion and damages for the failure to so transfer. Plaintiff elected to pursue the former course, and the authorities are practically unanimous in support of the rule above announced. "Stated generally, equity will compel a corporation to register a transfer of shares upon its books and to admit the transferee to the rights of a shareholder, where he has become the purchaser of shares, and the certificate has been regularly transferred and delivered to him by the customary indorsement in blank." 10 Cyc. 605. Also: "Equity will under proper circumstances compel a corporation to transfer on its books shares of stock to the owner of the equitable title, and to issue to him certificates for the same." Ibid. In Cushman v. Thayer Mfg. Jewelry Co. 76 N. Y. 365, 32 Am. Rep. 315, where the same question was involved as the one under consideration, the court said: "The right of the plaintiff to maintain this action depends upon the question whether an equitable action will lie to compel a transfer of stock by a corporation to the owner of the same, or the plaintiff must seek a remedy by an action at law for damages. The latter action is frequently of no avail, and does not

was not a bona fide purchaser. Stebbins v. Phoenix F. Ins. Co. 3 Paige, 350.

In Bank of Commerce v. Bank of Newport, 11 C. C. A. 484, 27 U. S. App. 486, 63 Fed. 898, where the statute provided that the corporation should have a lien upon all stocks for debts of the stockholder to it, the firm of A. & Co., being stockholders of the corporation, sold its stock to B. & Co., indorsing the certificate in blank, and the corporation was notified of the sale and transfer, and made an entry on its books of the same, but did not issue a new certificate. B. & Co., later, after such notification, and while indebted to the corporation, delivered the certificate (indorsed as aforesaid) to a stranger as collateral security for advances made to them, and it was held that the company had a lien upon this stock superior to that of the pledgee, although a new certificate had not been issued.

In Planters' & M. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Selma Sav. Bank, 63 Ala. 585, where a firm owning stock in a corporation was indebted to the corporation, one of the partners retiring, the stock was turned over to the succeeding firm or its successor and the debt to the corporation somewhat reduced, but the certificates were not transferred on the books. One of the succeeding firms delivered the certificates to a third party in exchange for other collateral. (Whether the collateral replaced had originally been deposited upon a loan of the original firm or one of the succeeding firms was not clear, but apparently it was upon a loan of one of the succeeding firms.) And it was held that the equitable lien or right of the corporation under an authorized by-law continued throughout and was superior to that of the assignee, who held the stock as collateral.

In Mt. Holly Paper Co's Appeal, 99 Pa. 513, where the president of a corporation assigned certain shares of its stock to secure advances to a third party, and later the assignor became indebted to the corporation, it was held that the corporation's rights under the statutory lien were prior to those of the pledgee, and that it was immaterial that the shares were invalid, as in excess of those which might be lawfully issued.

Where the owner had pledged his stock in a company to secure an indebtedness to a bank and for future advances which were made, and the company, in order to benefit one of its officers, who had a claim against such owner, purchased such claim, it was held that the company could not enforce against the bank its statutory lien; and that if such purchase was merely to get rid of an insolvent stockholder, the same result would follow. White's Bank v. Toledo F. & M. Ins. Co. 12 Ohio St. 601.

Where an owner of stock payable in five instalments, after paying two of them, assigned his stock to the plaintiff, who paid the other instalments, and at the time the company was notified of the sale, the assignor owed the company upon certain notes (for insurance premiums) only one of which was then due, it was held that the company was entitled to hold dividends accruing after such notification of the sale and up to the time the final instalment became due, as against the note which was due at the time of the notice. By the articles of association no transfer could be permitted to be valid until all the instalments were paid. Bates v. New York Ins. Co. 3 Johns. Cas. 238.

While without the scope of this note, it may be noted that in Boyd v. Redd, 120 N. C. 335, 58 Am. St. Rep. 792, 27 S. E. 35, where the stockholder in a company, after pledging his stock as collateral security for a loan, executed notes to a third party, which were afterwards deposited by such third party with the company, as collateral security for an indebtedness to it, it was held that the statute giving the company a lien upon stock for the indebtedness of a stockholder to it would not be construed to give the company a lien upon such stock for a debt contracted by the stockholder to a third person.

always afford complete and full redress. It is easy to see that a party may have become the owner or purchaser of stock in a corporation, which he desires to hold as a permanent investment, which may be at the time of but little value,—in fact without any market value, whatever,—and its real worth may consist in the prospective rise which the owner has reason to anticipate will follow from facts within his knowledge. To say that the holder shall not be entitled to the stock because the corporation without any just reason refuses to transfer it, and that he shall be left to pursue the remedy of an action for damages, in which he can recover only a nominal amount, would establish a rule which must work great injustice in many cases, and confer a power on corporate bodies which has no sanction in the law. A court of equity will enforce a specific performance on a contract for the sale of real estate, and compel the execution of a deed by the vendor to the vendee, although an action at law may be brought to recover damages for the breach of the contract. Such a case bears a striking analogy to the one now presented, and the same principle is manifestly applicable where the remedy at law is inadequate to furnish the proper relief." Crawford County Bank*, 56 C. C. A. 174, 118 Fed. 390. The refusal of the court, therefore, to strike out the prayer of plaintiff's petition, was not error.

Entertaining this view of the case, it therefore necessarily follows that the second assignment of error urged by the defendant is untenable, for without doubt the petition in this case is good as against a general demurrer. "Where a general demurrer is filed to a petition, if any paragraph states a cause of action, the demurrer should be overruled." Hurst v. Sawyer, 2 Okla. 470, 37 Pac. 817; *Guthrie v. T. W. 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

This brings us to the third assignment of error, wherein defendant complains of the refusal of the trial court to sustain its demurrer to plaintiff's reply. Plaintiff in his reply alleges that he purchased the stock in controversy from the First State Bank of Ardmore at private sale, the same not having been advertised. Defendant contends that such sale was void, and that plaintiff acquired no rights as against defendant, and cites in support of such contention § 10, art. 1, chapter 6, Sess. Laws 1907-08, which reads as follows: "That any bank may sell any personal property which may come into its possession as collateral security for any debt or obligation due it, upon posting a notice in five public places in the county wherein the property is to be sold, at least ten days before the time therein specified for such sale, and which notice shall contain the name of the bank and the name of the pledgeor, the date of the pledge, the nature of the default, and the amount claimed to be due thereon at the date of the notice; a description of the pledged property to be sold and the time and place of sale." Plaintiff alleges that the shares of stock had been pledged by McLish on June 24, 1908, to the First State Bank of Ardmore to secure a note given it by him in the sum of $5,255, and that said note contained the following provision: "And I do hereby give to the legal holder of this note full power and authority to sell said collateral security or any portion thereof at public or private sale at the option of the holder on the nonperformance of the above promise, and without advertising the same or otherwise giving me notice." And contends that the notice required to be given by § 10 of the statute, supra, may be waived by the pledgeor. And we are of the same opinion and especially, as in this case, where the Ardmore State Bank after June 24, 1908, had actual notice of the pledge by McLish to the first State Bank of the Stock, and McLish was not at that time indebted to the Ardmore State Bank. At common law a pledgee could not sell without judicial process, unless reasonable notice to the pledgeor to redeem, but this common-law rule can be waived as to notice, and a public auction can be waived; and McLish under the facts of this case is the only person who could take advantage of this failure to give notice or sell at public auction, and from the record it clearly appears that he specifically waived such rights, and at a time, too, when he was not indebted to the issuing bank. Public sale of pledged property may be waived by stipulation of the parties, and in that event a private sale is valid. Carson v.

Iowa City Gaslight Co. 80 Iowa, 638, 45 N. W. 1068; Fitzgerald v. Blocher, 32 Ark. 742, 29 Am. Rep. 3; Hyatt v. Argenti, 3 Cal. 151; Jeanes's Appeal, 116 Pa. 573, 2 Am. St. Rep. 624, 11 Atl. 862; 31 Cyc. 874, and many cases there cited. Had he at the time he made the pledge of stock been indebted to the issuing bank, he would have had no right to, nor could he have waived such notice to the detriment of the issuing bank, and the lien created by statute against the stockholder in favor of the bank would have been sufficient to protect the bank as against the pledgee.

This brings us to the last assignment of error, relied upon, viz.: "The court erred in overruling motion of defendant for a verdict after all the evidence had been heard." Counsel for defendant insist that by virtue of the provisions of article 12 of their by-laws, which have been approved by the state banking commission, McLish could not transfer his stock to anyone, because of the fact that he was indebted to the bank; but the record discloses that from June 25 to July 8, 1908, McLish was in no manner indebted to the Ardmore State Bank, he having paid all that he owed on the former date, and that during this time the Ardmore State Bank had actual knowledge that McLish had pledged his stock to the First State Bank. Hence, if the Ardmore State Bank thereafter, with full knowledge of the stock having been pledged, permitted McLish to become indebted to it in the sum of $1,500, or any other sum, it did so at its peril, because, as found by the jury, it knew the stock owned by McLish had been pledged to the First State Bank. Surely the defendant could not prevent a transfer of stock when the owner of such stock was not indebted to the bank; and that McLish was not indebted to the Ardmore State Bank in any sum between June 25 and July 8, 1908, is an admitted fact by the bank. It does not matter what claims or liens the defendant bank may have had on the stock on or prior to June 24, 1908, because such liens, if any there were, had been discharged by McLish by paying all he owed the bank, and, when he had thus paid the bank all he owed it, the stock was clear, and the bank had no lien of any character on it, and McLish was its owner, and had a perfect right to pledge it to the First State Bank or anyone else whom he might choose. "Where a corporation has knowledge of a pledge of stock by one of its members, it will not be protected thereafter in extending credit to such member in reliance upon its lien on such shares." Helliwell, Stock & Stockholders, § 360, p. 676, note 37. "Where, by valid provision, a lien is given to the corporation, an assignee or pledgee of a certificate takes subject to a lien for a debt to the corporation incurred by the transferor subsequent to the assignment or pledge, and before notice thereof is given to the corporation, especially where the statute or charter provides that no transfer shall be valid until made on the books of the corporation. The corporation cannot assert a lien for a debt contracted subsequent to notice of a pledge or transfer of the shares, even though the transfer is made in violation of a charter provision prohibiting the transfer of shares for a specified length of time after organization. Nor can the corporation assert a lien for a debt contracted after it has notice that the shareholder has agreed to transfer his shares and has been paid therefor." 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. Stock & Stockholders, p. 872, and notes 6, 7, 8, and 9 thereunder. In Michigan the legal title or general property of shares of corporate stock is in the pledgee. In the case of Just v. State Sav. Bank, 132 Mich. 600, at page 606, 94 N. W. 200, 202, the court says: "Whatever may be the English rule, we think it is settled that the courts of this county repudiate the idea that a bona fide purchaser or pledgee of stock takes it subject to claims that may subsequently arise in favor of the corporation if it has notice of his purchase, and that notice of the purchaser's rights is sufficient to protect them, although a demand for a transfer of the stock on the books of the corporation be not made." Prince Invest. Co. v. St. Paul & S. C. Land Co. 68 Minn. 121, 70 N. W. 1079; Conant v. Reed, 1 Ohio St. 298; Bank of America v. McNeil, 10 Bush. 54; Des Moines Loan & T. Co. v. Des Moines Nat. Bank, 97 Iowa, 668, 66 N. W. 914; Hotchkiss & U. Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, 15 C. C. A. 264, 37 U. S. App. 86, 68 Fed. 76; Cook, Stockholders & Corp. Law, 532, 727. See also Michigan Trust Co. v. State Bank, 111 Mich. 310, 69 N. W. 645; Oakland County Sav. Bank v. State Bank, 113 Mich. 284, 67 Am. St. Rep. 463, 71 N. W. 453.

In Minnesota, where the statute is stronger and more comprehensive than our own, the rule is: "This provision relating to transfer on the books of the corporation is therefore solely for the protection and benefit of the corporation, but this protection does not go to the extent of empowering it to use its statutory authority as a weapon to deprive bona fide shareholders of their valuable property rights accruing prior to the claims of the corporation, obtained by it with notice of the rights of such shareholders. Corporations are bound equally as individuals by actual notice of the rights of others; thus, 'if the agents of the corporation should, with notice of the rights of the equitable owner, assist the legal holder to transfer the shares in violation of the trust, the company would be liable therefor.' . . . Hence the lien which a corporation has upon the stock or property of its members invested therein, due from them to the corporation, is such as it has acquired in good faith. The rights of the corporation are not therefore superior and paramount in all cases to those of the stockholders simply because of their not registering or transferring the sale of stock on the books of the corporation. . . . Therefore, that as against the land company, no lien could attach to the stock for the indebtedness of Moore to the Prince Investment Company, holding the naked legal title only with notice of agreement to transfer the stock and the entire condition of the matter. If the adjudications in other jurisdictions are at variance with this rule, we do not feel disposed to follow them, as we think that this doctrine is more in harmony with the general principles applicable to the sale of personal property, and where notice is actually brought home to the parties to be affected by it." Prince Invest. Co. v. St. Paul & S. C. Land Co. 68 Minn. 121, 70 N. W. 1079. And this case was cited and approved in St. Paul Nat. Bank v. Life Ins. Clearing Co. 71 Minn. 123, 73 N. W. 713. In Des Moines Loan & T. Co. v. Des Moines Nat. Bank, 97 Iowa, 668, 66 N. W. 914, in discussing a similar statutory provision, the court says: "Where the holder of stock assigned the same to defendant as collateral, the corporation being notified thereof, but no actual transfer was made on the corporation books, and afterwards the stock was assigned to the corporation as security for the registered holder's indebtedness, the corporation, having had actual notice of the transfer to defendant, cannot maintain a superior claim to the stock on the ground that no transfer was formally made on the books as required by a by-law providing that no transfer shall be valid unless so made." In White River Sav. Bank v. Capital Sav. Bank & T. Co. 77 Vt. 123, 107 Am. St. Rep. 754, 59 Atl. 197, a case where the charter provided a lien for the indebtedness of the pledgee, and refused to permit a transfer of stock until such indebtedness had been paid, a stockholder, with notice to the issuing bank, transferred certain shares of his stock; the issuing bank thereafter loaned the stockholder money, and, when the certificate was presented for transfer, the bank refused to make it upon its books until the indebtedness was paid. The court held that 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the holder of a certificate of stock assigned to him as collateral security by indorsement, with power of attorney to make the transfer, had the equitable interest, and that the legal title was in the assignor, though the corporation and other creditors were unaffected with notice, and the transaction was incomplete until the transfer was actually made on the books of the corporation, but also held: "Although a corporation charter provides that its stock shall be transferred only upon its books and that no transfer shall be valid until the assignor shall have paid all debts due from him to the corporation, yet the corporation cannot refuse to record a transfer of stock when it has notice thereof before the assignor becomes indebted to it." The same doctrine was upheld in Curtice v. Crawford County Bank, 56 C. C. A. 174, 118 Fed. 390; Hotchkiss & U. Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, 15 C. C. A. 284, 37 U. S. App. 86, 68 Fed. 76; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008; Birmingham Trust & Sav. Co. v. Louisiana Nat. Bank, 99 Ala. 379, 20 L.R.A. 600, 13 So. 112. In Jones on Pledges and Collateral Securities, § 223, p. 166, it is said: "But a corporation having notice that the stockholder has pledged his stock by a delivery of the certificate with a power to transfer the stock upon the books of the corporation cannot have a lien upon the stock for a credit afterwards extended to him upon the faith of its charter right to a lien to secure a stockholder's indebtedness. Such an equitable assignment of the stock affects one who has knowledge of it equally as much as if the transfer had been made upon the books. Notice to the executive officer of a corporation, such as the cashier of a bank, engaged in the active discharge of his duties, is notice to the corporation itself of such an equitable transfer; and such officer, knowing of the pledge of the stockholder's certificate to secure a promissory note, is presumed to know that it remains in pledge for a renewal of the original note. Knowledge of the original transaction should put the officer upon inquiry as to the state of the stockholders shares before the corporation gave him credit upon the faith of his having stock upon which a lien could attach in favor of the corporation." In Bank of America v. McNeil, 10 Bush, 54, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Lindsay, says: "The indebtedness this lien is intended to secure is such as may exist at the time the stockholder attempts to dispose of his stock. It is manifest that the lien cannot become effectual for any purpose until the stockholder contracts a debt to the bank. Until this is done, his power to sell, give, devise, or incumber his stock is as perfect and complete as is his right so to dispose of or encumber any other personal property he may own. He cannot pass the complete legal title to his stock except by a transfer entered upon the books of the bank, nor can he by any arrangement, not made known to the bank, deprive it of the right to look to his stock as an ultimate security for the payment of any indebtedness it may innocently permit him to incur; but he may, by bargain and sale, by gift, devise, or pledge, divest himself of title, and, when he has done so, and notice has been given to the bank, it has no right to extent credit to him upon the faith of his charter lien upon his stock."

It seems to us, therefore, in view of the foregoing authorities, that the only real question in this case is one of notice. The jury found that the defendant had actual notice that McLish had pledged his stock to the First State Bank, and that, too, at a time when he was not indebted to the issuing bank. It is going too far to say that, in view of his knowledge, the defendant bank had yet a lien on the stock superior to that of the pledgee or its assigns. We do not think the legislature intended to give to banks such an undue advantage in matters of this kind. Were such a thing necessary to protect the bank and its creditors, such intent might possibly be gathered from the statute, but this is not the case. The statute relied upon was not intended to restrict or hinder or control in any way a sale of bank stock by the owner, except in cases where he was indebted to the bank at the time of the sale. In the case at bar McLish was not indebted to the bank in any form between the 25th of June and the 8th of July; and any lien which the defendant may have had prior to June 25th had been fully satisfied and discharged, and after said date, when his stock was clear from the statutory lien, and McLish was not indebted to the bank, he had a right to sell, transfer, or encumber his stock in any manner he chose. If the defendant, with full knowledge of the pledging of the stock, ignored the ordinary rules of business, and permitted him to again become indebted, thereafter, and while his stock was pledged, it could not expect to hold said stock which was then pledged to another, under the statutory lien.

There is no merit in the contention that to uphold the sale of stock to plaintiff, under the circumstances of this case, would prove detrimental to the banking interests of the state. Banks have certain well-defined rights and privileges but those rights and privileges are no more sacred than are those of individuals, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and certainly it was not the intention of the legislature to enact laws more beneficial to one class than another. To sustain defendant's contention would result in placing a premium on knavery and trickery, and would open a way whereby dishonest bank officials might prey on an unsuspecting public. On the other hand, banks pursuing a careful and conservative business will not suffer. Where a bank loans money, especially to one of its stockholders, it should investigate and assure itself that the security taken is ample. If it fails to do so, it will not be heard to complain; and surely no fair-minded person would ask that an innocent party be made to suffer on account of the negligence and carelessness of the officials, who had every opportunity of protecting their bank, and especially, as in the case at bar (where the bank knew that the stock had been pledged), it could not knowingly make other loans to the original owner of such stock and expect to hold as security therefor, under a lien known to have been discharged, property that had been pledged to another.

We can see no error in the record, and the judgment of the District Court of Carter county should be affirmed.

SARAH F. EASTHAM, Appt.

(69 W. Va. 710, 73 S. E. 314.)

Dower — estate limited upon death without issue.

1. Where one is seised of an estate in land that is limited only on his dying without lawful children, the estate, being one that can pass to heirs if lawful children

Headnotes by ROBINSON, J.

Note. — Dower in conditional estates.

The case above reported appears to be the only one upon the question whether a widow is dowerable of an estate held by her husband upon a condition subsequent decided since the compilation of the note to Sullivan v. Sullivan, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 691, in which the decisions on the subject are collected.

As to the right of curtesy in determinable fees, see note to Carter v. Couch, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 858.

2. A widow is dowable to the extent of one third of the real estate whereof the husband, or any one to his use, at any time during the coverture, was seised of an inheritance, such as that issue of the marriage might inherit the same as heir to the husband, unless her right to dower therein has been lawfully barred or relinquished.

(November 14, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Mason County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to establish a dower right in certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mollohan, McClintic, & Mathews, Rankin Wiley, and Harry Couch Eastham for appellants.

Messrs. J. S. Spencer and Somerville & Somerville for appellee.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By this suit the widow of Peter S. Couch prays that dower be assigned her in the lands devised to her husband by the will of his father, Samuel Couch. Her right to dower therein is denied by the defendant, Sarah F. Eastham. The case presents a single question: Is the plaintiff entitled to dower?

The answer to the question must be determined by a consideration of the following paragraph in the will of Samuel Couch: "I give and devise unto my son Peter S. Couch the farm on which I reside in Mason County, West Virginia, containing about Nine Hundred and Fifty Acres, but it being my desire to divide my property as near equally as may be between my two children Peter S. Couch and Sarah Frances Eastham. I direct my said son Peter S. Couch to pay his sister Sarah F. Eastham the sum of Four Thousand Dollars and I hereby make the said sum of Four Thousand and Dollars a lien and charge upon the real estate aforesaid devised to said Peter S. Couch, until the same is paid to said Sarah F. Eastham or her heirs, but in event the said Peter S. Couch shall die leaving no lawful children surviving him, but leaving his wife Mary Catharine Couch surviving him, it is my will and desire that the title to all my real estate aforesaid shall pass to and be vested in my daughter Sarah Frances Eastham or her children if she be not living upon the payment by her or her said children to said Mary Catharine Couch of the sum of Four Thousand Dollars, but in the event that said Mary Catharine Couch shall not then be living, it is my will and desire that said real estate shall pass to and vest in my said daughter, Sarah F. Eastham, or in case of her death to her children without the payment of anything in consideration therefor." A codicil to the will reduced the last named sum of $4,000 to $2,000.

This same paragraph of the will of Samuel Couch, twice before, in the lifetime of Peter S. Couch, has been involved in suits in this court. Couch v. Eastham, 27 W. Va. 796, 55 Am. Rep. 346; Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 784, 3 S. E. 23. But, of course, in neither of those cases was the character of the estate devised to Peter S. Couch viewed in relation to dower. Now that he has departed this life leaving no issue, and Sarah F. Eastham has paid to his widow the $2,000 pursuant to the terms of the will and the codicil thereto, this subsequent controversy about the right of dower arises.

The will gave Peter S. Couch a defeasible fee in the land. He held an estate in fee simple, which would shift in the event of his dying without lawful children. The fee continued in him until he died without issue. If lawful children had been born to him, the estate was one which they could have inherited as his heirs. Since the estate of which he was seised was one that could pass to his heirs, it was an estate of inheritance. It is to estates of this character that dower attaches. Code 1906, chap. 65, § 1. "The widow is dowable of all the real estate whereof the husband, or any one to his use, at any time during the coverture, was seised of an estate of inheritance, such as that issue born of the marriage may, by possibility, inherit the same as heir to the husband, unless her right to such dower has been lawfully barred or relinquished." 2 Minor, Inst. 4th ed. 147. Though the estate of Peter S. Couch in the land expired when he died without leaving children, still his previous seisin of the estate of inheritance therein during the coverture is a basis of dower in his widow. "If the consort's estate expires by the regular efflux of the period originally marked out for its duration, leaving the previous seisin of the consort unimpaired, dower (and curtesy) are prolongations of the consort's estate, annexed by force of law." 2 Minor, Inst. 4th ed. 153. So, we must observe, Samuel Couch by his will vested such a title in his son, gave him such a seisin of the land, that dower in the son's widow was annexed thereto, by force of law, as a prolongation of the son's estate. That Peter S. Couch held a defeasible fee, and that his widow is dowerable therein, unless her right has been lawfully barred or relinquished, is clear. Tomlinson v. Nickell, 24 W. Va. 148; Nickell v. Tomlinson, 27 W. Va. 697.

It is, however, insisted that Samuel Couch did not intend that the widow of his son should take dower in the land. What he did intend must be determined from the will itself. The will is clear and unambiguous. We cannot change it and thereby make a new will. The testator plainly gave his son an estate in which the widow of the latter was dowerable. This imports that the testator intended her to have dower, after the son's death. He must be presumed to have known the legal consequences of his will. Whether Samuel Couch could have so devised an estate of inheritance to his son by terms of the will as to cut off right of dower therein, we need not decide. The will does not undertake to cut off dower; it does not directly affirm that the son's widow shall have no dower. Nor does it say that the $2,000 to be paid by Sarah F. Eastham to the son's widow shall be in lieu of dower. We cannot assume or conjecture that the testator meant that sum in place of dower when he says nothing to that effect. The plain import of the will from the terms used is that the widow of his son may take dower and receive the $2,000 also. We cannot hold that the will means that Sarah F. Eastham is to have the immediate possession of all the land at the death of Peter S. Couch, for none of the terms used warrant that meaning. The will does not say that the possession of the land is to pass to Sarah F. Eastham if Peter S. Couch dies without lawful children and leaves a widow. It says the "title" to the land is "to pass to and be vested in" Sarah F. Eastham in that event. The use of these words is consistent with the right of dower claimed. "Title" does not mean "possession." Dower is mere right to possession, not title. In short, Samuel Couch gave to his son an estate in which he must have known that the son's widow could take dower, and used no words promulgating an intention contrary to her taking dower. Why he gave a dowerable estate, and why he also provided that a sum of money should be paid to the widow, is not for us to inquire. It is enough that we see that he did so by the plain language of his will. It may be that he meant to return to the widow at least a portion of the $4,000 paid by her husband. Relative to this same will it was held in a former case: "In the interpretation of a will, the true inquiry is, not what the testator meant to express, but what do the words used express." Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 784, 3 S. E. 23.

The decree is a proper one. It will be affirmed.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.
L. O. ALLEN.

Carrier — shipment to consignor's order — shortage — suit by purchaser.

Prior to the 17th day of October, 1907, L. O. A., of P., ordered from W.-M. Co. of O., a car of coal to be shipped from H. to F. On said date said car, containing 76,800 pounds, was shipped by W.-M. Co. over plaintiff in error's line of railroad, to W.-M. Co., at P. shipper's order, "Notify L. O. A." The bill of lading so drawn and draft for the amount of the invoice, including freight, were delivered for collection to W. F.'s agent at P., who was also the agent of plaintiff in error at P. The car of coal arrived at P. on the 28th day of November, 1907. After it arrived, and on the same day, L. O. A. paid the draft. L. O. A. completed the unloading of the car on November 30, 1907. After having weighed the coal unloaded from said car, he found that he had received 67,880, instead of 76,800, pounds, as called for by the bill of lading. A's receipt shows W.-M. Co. to be both the consignor and the consignee, and states, "Notify L. O. A." There is no contention that W.-M. Co. had assigned its right of action to A. Held, that A. was not entitled to recover, as he showed no title in himself prior to the time he paid the draft and received the bill of lading,—all damage occurring prior to that time.

Headnote by WILLIAMS, J.

Note. — Right of one who is to be notified of arrival of goods consigned to another, to maintain action against carrier.

As is well known, the practice of "notifying" a person of the arrival of goods is resorted to when a vendor consigns goods to himself or to his own order, and the vendee is to be notified of the arrival of goods, and it to receive them from the carrier upon payment of draft drawn upon him, and the receipt of the bill of lading thereto attached. This situation, of course, immediately presents the question whether the title to the ERROR to the County Court for Kay County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the value of coal alleged to have been negligently lost while in defendant's possession as a common carrier. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. F. Evans, R. A. Kleinschmidt, and W. C. Mitchell, for plaintiff in error:

At the time of the loss, the legal title to the car of coal was in the Wise-Moist Coal Company, and it only was entitled to recover.

goods passed upon the delivery of the goods to the carrier, or upon the payment of the draft and the receipt of the bill of lading, or upon presentation of the bill of lading and delivery of the goods after the payment of the draft. In the few cases which have been found to involve the question in the foregoing title, it is agreed that the title does not pass until after the payment of the draft, and that therefore the vendee has no right of action for injury to or loss of the goods occurring before the title passed.

Where the plaintiff's name appears in the bill of lading only as the person to be notified of the arrival of goods consigned by and to another, the former does not have such an interest therein as will entitle him to recover for their loss. E. R. Dalbey & Co. v. Mexican C. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 105 S. W. 1154.

And the payment of the draft subsequently to the loss of the goods does not operate to vest the title in the vendee as of the date of the loss, so as to entitle him to maintain an action against the carrier. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Mt. Vernon Co. 84 Ala. 173, 4 So. 350.

So, in Cudahy Packing Co. v. Dorsey, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 484, 63 S. W. 548, in which the vendor sent goods to the plaintiff, and attached the bill of lading to a draft, and sent it to a bank with instructions not to deliver the bill of lading until the payment of the draft, the court declared that, if the carrier was instructed by the vendor not to deliver the property until it was paid for, then it did not belong to the plaintiff at 39 L.R.A. Mr. James Q. Louthan for defendant in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding in error is to review a judgment wherein the defendant in error, as plaintiff, sued the plaintiff in error, as defendant.

Prior to the 17th day of October, 1907, the plaintiff, L. O. Allen, of Peckham, Oklahoma, ordered from the Wise-Moist Coal the time of the alleged injury, and he could not maintain an action for damages against the carrier.

And since the title does not pass to a vendee to whom the goods are not to be delivered until the payment of the draft and presentment of the attached bill of lading and the acceptance of the goods, he cannot claim a right of action for damages for delay in the shipment, upon the theory that the contract of shipment was made for his benefit by the vendor. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Robinson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 131 S. W. 444.

But it has been held that where the bill of lading of goods consigned to the vendor, "notify" the vendee, bears an indorsement by the vendor to the vendee, which was dated before the delay occurred, the assignee is the owner of the goods at the time of the delay, and since, therefore, he alone sustains damages in consequence thereof, he has the right to bring an action against the carrier. Moore v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 85 S. C. 19, 67 S. E. 11.

Another point, although really constituting but a step in the process of reasoning by which the time or manner of passing of title is determined, is sometimes made by the statement that when a vendor consigns goods to himself or to his own order, "notify" the vendee, the carrier becomes the agent of the vendor, to consummate the sale upon the delivery to the vendee of the bill of lading after payment of the draft.

Thus, it is held in Asheboro Wheelbarrow & Mfg. Co. v. Southern R. Co. 149 N.

Company, of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, a car of Henryetta lump coal to be shipped from Henryetta, Oklahoma, to Peckham, Oklahoma. On said date, S. F. car No. 16,439, containing 76,800 pounds of Henryetta lump coal was shipped by the Wise-Moist Coal Company over defendant's line of railroad to themselves (Wise-Moist Coal Company), Peckham, Oklahoma, shipper's order, "Notify L. O. Allen;" and bill of lading so drawn, and draft for the amount of the invoice, including freight, were delivered for collection to the Wells Fargo Express Company's agent at Peckham, who was also the defendant's agent at Peckham. The car of coal arrived at Peckham on the 29th day of November, 1907, and after its arrival, and on the date therefor, plaintiff paid the draft.

Plaintiff completed the unloading of the car on the 30th day of November, 1907, and, after having weighed the coal unloaded from said car, found that he had received 67,880 pounds, instead of 76,800 pounds, as called for by the billing. Plaintiff's receipt shows the Wise-Moist Company to be the consignor and consignee, and states: "Notify L. O. Allen."

In Elliott on Railroads, vol. 4, 2d ed. § 1427, p. 64, it is said: "A direction in a bill of lading to consignor's order, to 'notify' someone else, does not warrant the carrier in delivering the property to the person so to be notified without the production of the bill of lading. The use of the term 'notify' shows that the party to be notified was not intended as the consignee, but was simply to be advised of the arrival of the goods. The fact that a bill of lading is made out to the consignor's order makes this still plainer. Indeed, it has been held that such a contract is so plain and unambiguous that a custom in a certain city to deliver property under similar bills of lading to the person to be notified cannot be shown." See also authorities cited in footnotes 79, 80, and 81.

In 1 Hutchinson on Carriers, 3d ed. § 187, at page 203, it is said: "It is a common practice, where the bill of lading provides for delivery to the consignor's order, and has gone forward attached to a draft on the purchaser or other person by whom payment is to be made, to give directions that such person be notified of the arrival of the goods, in order that he may pay the draft and procure the goods. Such a direction to notify, however, does not dispense with the production of the bill of lading as in other cases; and if the carrier

C. 261, 62 S. E. 1091, that where goods are shipped to the consignor's order, the carrier is his agent, and the person to be notified is not brought into any contract relation with the carrier, and must look to the consignor for any damage sustained by a delay. It appeared in this case that the person to be notified did not pay the draft until after the goods arrived, but this fact seems not to have entered into a decision of the case, which is placed upon the ground that the vendor placed the goods in the hands of the carrier as his agent, to be sold and delivered to the person notified when the draft was paid, and that both title and possession remained in the consignor until that time.

It will be observed that it is recognized in ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO. v. ALLEN, that the vendee could have taken an assignment of the claim against the carrier for loss, and then could have brought suit. But it seems not to have been urged in the few cases discussed in this note, that the sending of a bill of lading attached to the draft and indorsed to the vendee operates, upon the payment of the draft, and the presentation of the bill of lading, and delivery of the goods, not only as a consummation of the sale, but also as an assignment of all claims against the carrier for loss or damage to the property. Such a position, it is thought, might well be made, and certainly it would have the practical effect of according, in most cases, a right of action to the person really made to suffer by the loss or injury. Of course, quite another question is raised when, as in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Mt. Vernon Co. supra, it is contended that the payment of the draft operates to vest title in the vendee as of the date of the loss.

There are numerous cases which discuss the general question of when title passes under a contract of shipment, and many of such cases involve contracts in which the vendee appears in the bill of lading only as the person to be notified. But it will be observed that this note contains only such cases of this kind as arise from an attempt upon the part of the person to be notified to sue the carrier. Generally, as to the effect of attaching a draft to a bill of lading to prevent title passing on delivery of goods to carrier, see note in 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1078. The note in 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1056, on the liability of a carrier for property removed by or delivered to one whom it was directed to notify, has to do, of course, with whether the carrier is liable for misdelivery or conversion when it delivers the goods to the person to be notified without production of the bill of lading.

Somewhat analogous to the question indicated by the foregoing title is the question as to the right of an agent, factor, broker, or commission merchant to whom goods are consigned for sale, to maintain an action against the carrier for loss thereof or damage thereto. This question is discussed in the note in 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 437.

Generally, as to the right of a consignee to maintain an action against the carrier, see the note in 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 68.

delivers the goods to the person so to be notified, without requiring him to produce the bill of lading, he will be liable for any loss thereby incurred. The very presence of the word 'notify' in such a case, it is said, shows that the person named is not intended as the consignee. And although it has been the custom for the carrier to permit the person to be notified to stop the goods at a point short of their destination, and there receive them, without producing the bill of lading, such custom, as against a bona fide transferee of the bill of lading, will furnish the carrier with no excuse for making delivery at an intermediate point to the person to be notified, without requiring him to produce the bill of lading." See also authorities cited in footnotes 15, 16, and 17.

In 1 Mechem on Sales, § 774, at page 648, it is said: "Where the seller takes a bill of lading which expressly stipulates that the goods are to be delivered, at the point of destination, to himself or agent, or to his order or assigns, there is the clearest possible evidence upon the face of the transaction that, notwithstanding such an appropriation of the goods as might have been sufficient to transfer the title to the buyer, the seller has determined to prevent this result by keeping the goods within his own control."

In Dows v. National Exch. Bank, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. ed. 214, it was held: "The transmission of the invoices of goods does not pass the property in goods without the acceptance and payment of the drafts drawn against them. An invoice is not a bill of sale, nor is it evidence of a sale. A bill of lading, taken deliverable to the shipper's own order, is inconsistent with an intention to pass the ownership of the cargo to the person on whose account it may have been purchased. . . . Where there is any evidence to rebut the effect of the bill, it becomes a question for the jury, whether the property has passed. But where there is no such evidence, there is no necessity of submitting to the jury the question as to whether there was a change of ownership."

In Seeligson v. Philbrick (C. C.) 30 Fed. 600, it is said: "The principle of law is well established that, where property is destroyed by accident, the loss falls upon the holder of the legal title (Grant v. United States, 7 Wall. 331, 19 L. ed. 194), and the question here is, in whom was the title to the property destroyed, at the time of its destruction? Had there been a full and perfected sale, which passed the property from the plaintiffs to the defendant, so that he became bound to pay the price? Mr. Benjamin, in his treatise on Sales of Personal Property, has so clearly laid down what may safely be accepted as the law upon the subject, that it is but necessary to examine the facts of the case in question in the light of his rules. The rules that would apply in this case are, first, where the goods, in pursuance of an order, are delivered to a carrier to be delivered to the buyer, the carrier is presumed to act as agent of the buyer, and delivery to the carrier is delivery to the buyer; but where goods are delivered on board of a vessel to be carried, and a bill of lading is taken, the delivery by the vendor is not a delivery to the buyer, but to the captain, as bailee for delivery to the person indicated by the bill of lading. The fact of making the bill of lading deliverable to the order of the vendor is, when not rebutted by evidence to the contrary, almost decisive to show his intention to reserve the jus disponendi, and to prevent the property from passing to the vendee. Where a bill of exchange for the price of goods is inclosed to the buyer for acceptance, together with a bill of lading, if he refuse acceptance, he acquires no right to the bill of lading, or the goods of which it is the symbol. When the vendor deals with a bill of lading only to secure the contract price, the property vests in the buyer upon payment thereof. See Benjamin, Sales, 4th ed. § 399, and numerous cases there cited. These propositions of law are accepted as established by numerous decisions, and the Supreme Court has settled beyond any question what should control in this case."

In the case of Willman Mercantile Co. v. Fussy, 15 Mont. 511, 48 Am. St. Rep. 698, 39 Pac. 738, it is said: "By the established rules of commercial law, where goods are shipped at the risk of the purchaser and by his order, or if, by other evidence, the intention of the shipper is made apparent to part with his title, the carrier is held to be the agent of the consignee, and not the agent of the consignor. But if the seller does not intend to part with his title to and control over the property when he makes the consignment, the authorities regard the carrier as the consignor's agent, and not the consignee's. To get at the intention of the parties to such commercial transactions, the bills of lading are resorted to. If the vendor, when shipping, takes the bill of lading in his own name, this fact, when not rebutted by evidence to the contrary, is very strong proof of the intention of the vendor to reserve title in himself, and is almost decisive to prove the vendor's intention to retain the jus disponendi of the property, and to prevent the delivery of same to the vendee. Dows v. National Exch. Bank, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. ed. 214; Emery v. Irving Nat. Bank, 25

McAndrews, 5 Mont. 325, 51 Am. Rep. 51, 5 Pac. 879. The plaintiff, the vendor in this case, dealt with the bill of lading with the manifest purpose of securing the payment for the apples; and the defendant, by his refusal to pay the draft, acquired no right to the bill of lading, or to the goods which it represented. Benjamin, Sales, 567; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Logan, 74 N. Y. 568. When the bill of lading was taken in the shipper's name, the presumption arose that he intended to retain the title in himself. This presumption must stand as conclusive until it is rebutted by affirmative proof on the plaintiff's part." See also Berger v. State, 50 Ark. 20, 6 S. W. 15; Libby v. Ingalls, 124 Mass. 503; Furman v. Union P. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 579, 13 N. E. 587; Security Bank v. Luttgen, 29 Minn. 363, 13 N. W. 151; Second Nat. Bank v. Cummings, 89 Tenn. 609, 24 Am. St. Rep. 618, 18 S. W. 115; First Nat. Bank v. Northern R. Co. 58 N. H. 203; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Stern, 119 Pa. 24, 4 Am. St. Rep. 626, 12 Atl. 756; Bergeman v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 104 Mo. 77, 15 S. W. 992; Joslyn v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 51 Vt. 92; Ward v. Taylor, 56 Ill. 494.

There is no proof in the record to overcome or rebut this presumption; nor is there any evidence to show any loss after the car arrived at Peckham after the draft was paid. Had this car of coal, between the points of Henryetta and Peckham, been destroyed on account of some act of God, by which the carrier would not have been liable for such loss, upon whom would the loss have then fallen, under the facts as shown by this record—the consignor, the Wise-Moist Coal Company, or the defendant in error? Clearly upon the coal company, for the title was in them, and did not vest in the defendant in error until the payment of the draft with bill of lading attached. Had the title vested in the defendant in error when the coal was delivered to the railway company at Henryetta, and the bill of lading been held by the coal company as collateral security, in that event, had the car of coal been lost by an act of Providence or such circumstances as the railway company would not have been liable, then the loss would have fallen on the defendant in error, and the coal company would have sued him for the value of the car. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

There is no attempt in this record to prove that it was the understanding of the parties that the title to the car of coal was to vest in the defendant in error prior to the payment of the draft with the bill of lading attached. The defendant in error has not attempted to bring this action as an assignee of the Wise-Moist Coal Company, but on the theory that he was the owner of the coal alleged to have been lost on account of the negligence of the plaintiff in error at the time of such loss.

Under this record, it was the duty of the Wise-Moist Coal Company to deliver that coal to the defendant in error. The railway company was its agent in making the delivery, and the defendant in error could have maintained an action against the coal company for this loss, or the coal company could have assigned this claim to the defendant in error, and he could have prosecuted the action, as assignee, against the carrier for such damages.

The amount here involved is not large, and it is with regret that we have to reverse cases involving such a small amount; but the proposition of law involved in this case is plain. If the coal was lost as alleged by the defendant in error, the Wise-Moist Coal Company was at the time the owner of the same, and the action for such loss must be brought in the name of said coal company, or by its assignee.

It follows that the judgment of the lower court must be reversed, with instructions to grant a new trial and proceed in accordance with this opinion.

(April 1, 1912.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover for the loss of a violin, which resulted in a verdict for defendant. Judgment on the verdict.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Louis S. Thierry and James E. Kelley, for plaintiff:

The plaintiff's violin, carried on a street car, comes within the designation of personal baggage.

Hawkins v. Hoffman, 6 Hill, 586, 41 Am. Dec. 767; Jordan v. Fall River R. Co. 5 Cush. 69, 51 Am. Dec. 44; Collins v. Boston & M. R. Co. 10 Cush. 506.

Although a railroad corporation is not responsible as a common carrier for an article of personal baggage kept by a passenger exclusively within his own control, it is liable for the loss of such an article by the negligence of the corporation, or its agents or servants, and without the fault of the passenger.

Kinsley v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 125 Mass. 54, 28 Am. Rep. 200; Clark v. Burns, 118 Mass. 275, 19 Am. Rep. 456; Whitney v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 143 Mass. 243, 9 N. E. 619; American S. S. Co. v. Bryan, 83 Pa. 446.

The duty of a carrier to avoid injury to or loss of baggage by the stopping of its conveyance is not as imperative as is its duty to avoid, by such means, an injury to a passenger, but the fundamental principle governing the two cases is the same, the degree of imperativeness varying with the kind of conveyance, and the consequent danger and inconvenience incident to stopping on the particular occasion, as well as with the seriousness of the injury likely to be caused by not stopping.

Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Cooper, 120 Ind. 469, 6 L.R.A. 241, 16 Am. St. Rep. 334, 22 N. E. 340; Chicago West Div. R. Co. v. Hughes, 69 Ill. 170; Jordan v. Fall River R. Co. 5 Cush. 69, 51 Am. Dec. 44; Whitney v. Pullman's Place Car Co. 143 Mass. 243, 9 N. E. 619; First Nat. Bank v. Marietta & C. R. Co. 20 Ohio St. 259, 5 Am. Rep. 655.

The jury would have been warranted in finding that the getting off the car would not have been negligent, and therefore it is not open to the defendant to plead, as excuse of its refusal to allow the plaintiff to alight, that it was preventing him from doing, on the impulse of the moment, a reckless act.

McDonough v. Metropolitan R. Co. 137 Mass. 210; Briggs v. Union Street R. Co. 148 Mass. 72, 12 Am. St. Rep. 518, 19 N. E. 19; Flynn v. Connecticut Valley Street R. Co. 196 Mass. 587, 82 N. E. 1085.

Apart from the foregoing grounds of liability, the jury could have found that the defendant, by not allowing the plaintiff to alight, was guilty of a false imprisonment, for which it could be held liable in this action.

The act was within the scope of the authority of the conductor.

Rown v. Christopher & 10th Street R. Co. 34 Hun, 471; Corbett v. 23d Street R. Co. 42 Hun, 587.

Mr. Cyrus Brewer, for defendant:

The conductor was under no legal duty to cause the car to stop under the circumstances, and therefore there can have been no breach of such duty from which negligence can be inferred.

which, in reaching the conclusion that the carrier was not bound in the circumstances to stop its train, said: "She did not intrust her bag to the exclusive custody and care of the defendant's servants, but kept it in her own immediate possession, without informing the defendant of the value of its contents, until after it had dropped from her hand through the open window. Even if no negligence is to be imputed to her in attempting to shut the window with the bag in her hand, yet her dropping the bag was not the act of the defendant or its servants, nor anything that they were bound to forebear or to guard against; and after it had happened, she had no legal right, for the purpose of relieving her from the consequences of an accident for which they were not responsible, to require them to stop the train."

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff does not contend that the jerk of the car and the resulting fall of his violin were due to any negligence of the defendant. His claim is that the conductor ought to have stopped the car and allowed the plaintiff to alight and at least attempt to recover his property. But this contention cannot be maintained.

The occurrence was in the Boston subway, where it is generally known, and we must take judicial notice, that the cars stop only at fixed stations, and all cars are run with the expectation that there will be no other stops. In this very case, another car was coming only about 20 feet behind the car in question. A sudden stop of the forward car would have involved imminent danger of a collision, and would have exposed both the plaintiff and the other passengers in each car to the risk of serious injuries. The established rule that a railroad company is not bound to stop a train between stations for the purpose of allowing a passenger to search for lost property, even of great value, governs the case. Henderson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 123 U. S. 61, 31 L. ed. 92, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 60. Here, as in that case, the property lost was in the personal custody of the passenger, and the defendant's tracks in the subway are used in the same way as the tracks of a steam railroad upon the surface of the earth. As in that case, the plaintiff had no right to require the defendant, for the purpose of relieving him from the consequences of an accident for which it was not responsible, to stop its car "short of a usual station, to 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the delay and inconvenience of other passengers and the possible risk of collision." And see Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pierce, 47 Mich. 277, 11 N. W. 157; Wells v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 67 Miss. 24, 6 So. 737; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Carmichael, 90 Ala. 19, 24, 9 L.R.A. 388, 8 So. 87.

The case of Chicago West Div. R. Co. v. Hughes, 69 Ill. 170, has no resemblance in its facts to the case at bar.

There is no merit in the contention that the defendant by not allowing the plaintiff to alight was guilty of a false imprisonment, for which it now can be held. The declaration states no such cause of action, and what the conductor did was not wrongful.

Judgment on the verdict.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

JENNIE FLEMING, Appt.,

v.

JOHN J. GEMEIN.

(168 Mich. 541, 134 N. W. 969.)

Appeal — new trial — refusal — error.

1. It is error to deny a new trial where nominal damages only have been granted, to a woman against one who, after notice to refrain from doing so, sold intoxicating liquors to her husband, which resulted in his assaulting her, destroying her property, and materially damaging her means of support, and humiliating and disgracing her. Wife — competency — civil damage action.

2. A woman is a competent witness in an action under the civil damage act against one who sold intoxicating liquor to her husband after notice not to do so, to show his acts and conduct towards her during times of intoxication through liquor sold him by defendant.

Note. — Competency of one spouse to testify as to misconduct of other spouse in action against a third person.

The general rule appears to be that in actions against third persons a husband or wife is competent to testify to any relevant matter bearing upon the conduct of the other spouse, in so far as such knowledge is gained from general observation, and not because of the existence of the marital relation.

Accordingly, it has been held that a statute prohibiting husband and wife from testifying for or against the other without his or her consent, and prohibiting either from testifying during the marriage or afterwards, to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage, must

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wayne County granting insufficient relief and denying a motion for new trial in an action brought to recover damages for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors to plaintiff's husband. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William L. January, with Mr. Harry H. Wait, for appellant:

The statute gives an absolute right of action against those who have caused or contributed to the intoxication of plaintiff's husband, which results in injury; and does not predicate her right of recovery upon knowledge upon their part that he was a person in the habit of becoming intoxicated.

McMahon v. Dumas, 96 Mich. 467, 56

be construed to be limited to communications, and not to cover information imparted by act or acquired by observation, and does not disqualify a divorced wife from testifying as to the husband's condition when he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor during the time she was his wife. Re Van Alstine, 26 Utah, 193, 72 Pac. 942.

In an action by a wife upon a bond conditioned for the husband's faithful support of his wife and child, in which it was shown that he was in the habit of becoming intoxicated, the wife was permitted over objection to testify as to his intoxicated condition. The court said: "The husband's condition as to being intoxicated, unless it should appear to have been specially confided to the wife in the absence of others, cannot be regarded as in the nature of a confidential communication. Especially must this be so when the subject under investigation implies that the condition and conduct of the husband were an imposition upon the wife." Stanley v. Stanley, 112 Ind. 143, 13 N. E. 261.

And in accord with FLEMING v. GEMIN is Maloney v. Dailey, 67 Ill. App. 427, which was an action for selling intoxicating liquors to the husband, the wife being permitted to show the husband's conduct while under the influence of liquor, though no objection appears to have been made.

In an action by the wife for selling intoxicating liquors to her husband, in which defendants, for the purpose of mitigating the damages, showed that plaintiff accompanied her husband on numerous occasions to places where intoxicating liquors were sold, and there drank with him, she was permitted to show that her husband compelled her to go. Hackett v. Smelsley, 77 Ill. 109.

Action for criminal conversation.

The majority of the cases hold that one spouse is incompetent to show misconduct on the part of the other in an action for criminal conversation. Cornelius v. Ham-39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

N. W. 13; Radley v. Seider, 99 Mich. 433, 58 N. W. 366; Re Miller, 160 Mich. 309, 125 N. W. 2; Rouse v. Melsheimer, 82 Mich. 175, 46 N. W. 372.

It is the inherent power of the court to grant a new trial if the verdict is against the weight or contrary to the evidence.

Hintz v. Michigan C. R. Co. 132 Mich. 307, 93 N. W. 634; Whipple v. Michigan C. R. Co. 130 Mich. 460, 90 N. W. 287; Radley v. Seider, 99 Mich. 431, 58 N. W. 366; Lucker v. Liske, 111 Mich. 685, 70 N. W. 421.

Mr. James H. Pound for appellee.

McAlvay, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sued defendant, who was engaged, in the city of Detroit, in the busibay, 150 Pa. 359, 24 Atl. 515; Sahms v. Brown, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 488, holding husband incompetent to prove the wife's adultery with defendant; Carter v. Hill, 81 Mich. 275, 45 N. W. 988, holding husband incompetent to prove facts tending to show adultery; Knickerbocker v. Worthing, 138 Mich. 224, 101 N. W. 540, holding both husband and wife incompetent to prove or disprove adultery.

And it has been held that the husband is incompetent to testify to any fact whatever in support of his action, by reason of the statute prohibiting the parties "to any action or proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery" to testify. Graves v. Harris, 117 Ga. 817, 45 S. E. 239.

Accordingly, it was held that the husband was incompetent to disprove the contention of the defendant that he had consented to and connived at the adultery of his wife with the defendant. Ibid.

And even after a divorce between the plaintiff and his wife, the husband is not a competent witness to testify to the charge of adultery in a suit brought against the alleged paramour of the wife, as being within the statutory provision that "in any action or proceeding instituted by the husband or wife in consequence of adultery," the husband and wife shall not be competent to testify. Hanselman v. Dovel, 102 Mich. 505, 47 Am. St. Rep. 557, 60 N. W. 978.

Note the New York cases in this subdivision, which hold that the statute has no application to an action for criminal conversation, because the wife is not a party.

But on the other hand, in Roesner v. Darrah, 65 Kan. 599, 70 Pac. 597, it was held that the husband was a competent witness in support of the action, except as to transactions or communications had with the wife.

And in Woods v. Gledhill, 56 Hun, 220, 9 N. Y. Supp. 266, it was held that the husband was competent to prove any fact tending to establish the misconduct alleged as the ground of the action, though it might ness of conducting a saloon as a retail liquor dealer, under the statute, claiming damages for unlawfully selling malt, brewed, spirituous, and intoxicating liquors to her husband, who became and was an habitual drunkard to the knowledge of defendant, and after the defendant had been notified by her verbally and in writing not to sell to her husband, for the reason that he was an habitual drinker and an habitual drunkard. There is no question raised as to the sufficiency of the declaration in the case. The case was tried in the Wayne circuit court, and resulted in a verdict for 6 cents damages for plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was made on the ground, among others, that the verdict was contrary to the weight of the evidence and clearly inadequate. This motion was denied.

Plaintiff asks a reversal on account of error assigned upon the rulings and remarks of the court in excluding testimony offered by plaintiff, upon certain portions of the charge to the jury, and upon the denial of the motion for a new trial. It will not be necessary to consider all of the errors assigned. Attention will be given to those of material importance.

The material facts appear from this record to be that plaintiff was married at Detroit in 1895 to William Fleming, a skillful and competent machinist, at that time and still in the employ of the Railway Steel Spring Company. That he was then earning $2.50 a day, which in a year or two was raised to $2.75 a day, and in Decem-have the effect of implicating the wife. The court said: "But as the action was not against her, but against another person, the evidence proposed to be elicited would be against him and him alone," and that the case accordingly was not within the prohibition of the statute which declared that "a husband or a wife is not competent to testify against the other upon the trial of an action or the hearing upon the merits of a special proceeding founded upon an allegation of adultery."

And for the same reason it was held in Smith v. O'Brien, 24 N. Y. S. R. 708, 6 N. Y. Supp. 174, affirmed without opinion in 127 N. Y. 484, 28 N. E. 256, that the husband is competent to testify to the act of adultery.

In Perry v. Lovejoy, 49 Mich. 529, 14 N. W. 485, it was held that a letter written by the wife to her parents, stating that she was "sick" of her "home" because of her husband's cruel treatment, was competent evidence for the defendant in an action for enticing away the plaintiff's wife, in so far as it revealed and illustrated her state of mind and feeling toward her husband, as it was a part of the res gestæ and original evidence. To the same effect is McKenzie v. Lautenschlager, 113 Mich. 171, 71 N. W. 489.

Action for alienating affections.

In actions for alienating the affections of the other spouse, the plaintiff is competent to testify to the conduct of such spouse before and after the estrangement, indicating affection for plaintiff and the subsequent loss of it. Leucht v. Leucht, 129 Ky. 700, 130 Am. St. Rep. 486, 112 S. W. 845; Sexton v. Sexton, 129 Iowa, 487, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 708, 105 N. W. 314.

In Sexton v. Sexton, supra, it held that this was so notwithstanding the statutory provision that neither husband or wife can be examined as to any communication made by one to the other while married.

On the general question as to whether communications between husband and wife tending to show affection or want of it are privileged, see note appended to this case in 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 708.

So it is competent for the wife to testify as to her husband's unkind violent conduct toward her where the defense is that the separation was caused by plaintiff's maltreatment of the wife, and not on account of the influence and persuasion of the defendant. Yowell v. Vaughn, 85 Mo. App. 206.

Likewise, in Millsbaugh v. Potter, 62 App. Div. 521, 71 N. Y. Supp. 134, it was held that the wife was competent to show the husband's abusive language, unfounded charges of adultery, and unreasonable reprimand, for the purpose of showing that her affections were alienated by the plaintiff's own abuse and maltreatment, since such charges were not confidential communications, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting husband and wife from disclosing confidential communications.

The contrary view, however, was taken in Huot v. Wise, 27 Minn. 68, 6 N. W. 425, which was controlled entirely by a construction of the statute, the court pointing out that the statute did not merely lay down the rule disabling the husband and wife from testifying for or against each other, but also prescribed the application of and defined the exception to the rule of disability, which excluded a resort to the common law to determine the extent and exceptions to the rule.

And in Rose v. Mitchell, 21 R. I. 270, 43 Atl. 67, it was held that the wife was incompetent to show that her husband put her out of his house, on the theory that such testimony would tend to criminate the husband.

The husband is competent to testify in support of his action for alienating the wife's affections, as to her refusal to accompany him on various occasions upon being invited to do so, and afterwards going with the defendant. Rudd v. Rounds, 64 Vt. 432, 25 Atl. 438.

And in Childs v. Muckler, 105 Iowa, 279, 75 N. W. 100, the husband was permitted to ber, 1903, he was appointed master mechanic at $85 a month. About six months after the marriage he began to drink moderately, which continued for a year or two, when he began to drink to excess, during which period he would come home intoxicated, and spent practically all his earnings in defendant's saloon. This continued until 1901, when he was laid off from his work by the master mechanic. Defendant was notified at that time by the master mechanic not to sell Fleming any more intoxicating liquors. After that Fleming did not drink for about a year. He began again in 1902-

1903, and gradually grew worse until May, 1908. During this time he spent all his evenings, sometimes until midnight, at defendant's saloon, which was located next to the plant where he worked. He came home frequently intoxicated, using vile language towards his wife, and sometimes assaulting her violently and smashing her furniture. Prior to acquiring the habit of becoming intoxicated, and during the period when he quit drinking, Mr. Fleming always treated his wife with kindness and great consideration. During that time he turned over to her a large portion of his earnings, testify that his wife accompanied the defendant on one occasion to a particular place when he was ready and willing to take her. The objection, however, seems to have been directed to the materiality of the evidence, rather than the competency of the husband to testify.

On indictment of paramour.

The earlier cases held that, in prosecutions against one for adultery, the husband or wife of the one with whom the offense was alleged to have been committed was not a competent witness to testify to the commission of the act. State v. Gardner, 1 Root, 485; Howard v. State, 94 Ga. 587, 20 S. E. 426; State v. Welch, 26 Me. 30, 45 Am. Dec. 94; Com. v. Sparks, 7 Allen, 534; State v. Wilson, 31 N. J. L. 77; State v. Jolly, 20 N. C. 108 (3 Dev. & B. L. 110) 32 Am. Dec. 656; Com. v. Gordon, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 569; Com. v. Geary, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 60; Com. v. I. F. 12 W. N. C. 108.

In Howard v. State, 94 Ga. 587, 20 S. E. 426, this rule was applied, although by statute persons accused of adultery must be severally indicted, and the acquittal of one would not operate to acquit the other.

In State v. Wilson, 31 N. J. L. 77, the husband of the woman with whom the defendant was alleged to have committed the offense was held incompetent to prove the criminal act, though the wife had been previously tried and acquitted for the same offense, and was not to be regarded as a party to the record, nor as interested in the least in the result of the trial, as the testimony of the husband could not endanger the wife.

In State v. Jolly, 20 N. C. 108 (3 Dev. & B. L. 110) 32 Am. Dec. 656, the question arose whether at the common law the divorced husband was a competent witness to testify against the paramour of the wife. It was said in the course of the opinion: "It is argued by the attorney general that the criminal conduct testified to in this case was itself an outrageous violation of the marriage vow,—a matter in respect to which confidence was not yielded by the wife, nor could have been asked by the husband. . . . We are not satisfied that the exception contended for is established by the reasoning urged in its support. The 36 L.R.A. (N.S.)

rule we deem a valuable one, and we view with apprehension any exception having a tendency, more or less direct, to promote cunning or to generate distrust where the best interests of society require that perfect frankness and confidence ought to prevail. If one exception be sanctioned because, from the character of the criminal act imputed, the dissent of the witness from its commission must be presumed, others may follow where the like presumption will be entertained, although not perhaps with equal confidence, and there will be danger of our having no rule capable of general and steady application."

In State v. Gardner, 1 Root, 485, the court held the husband incompetent in a prosecution against the paramour of the wife, upon the ground that the husband would be incompetent to testify against the wife in a prosecution against her, and in testifying against her paramour, he would in effect be a witness to the criminality of his wife. It was further urged that he might be interested in laying a foundation, by his testimony, for a divorce.

In Com. v. Sparks, 7 Allen, 534, it was said that such testimony ought not to be received in any proceeding or upon any trial; that as nothing would be more likely to exasperate the parties and be the means of implacable discord and dissension between them; that its admission would be a violation of that principle of public policy upon which the general rule of their exclusion as witnesses against each other is founded; and State v. Welch, 26 Me. 30, 45 Am. Dec. 94, and State v. Gardner, were cited with approval.

So the husband of the woman with whom the crime was alleged to have been committed was incompetent to testify that on a former occasion he had discovered defendant concealed behind the door of his wife's sleeping room. People v. Fowler, 104 Mich. 449, 62 N. W. 572.

On the other hand, it has been held that the husband or wife of the one with whom accused is alleged to have committed the offense is competent to prove the act of adultery. Campbell v. State, 133 Ala. 158, 32 So. 635; Pruett v. State, 141 Ala. 69, 37 So. 343; State v. Bennett, 31 Iowa, 24; State v. Volland, 57 Minn. 225, 58 N. W. 878; State v. Marvin, 35 N. H. 22; State v. Wiseman, 130 N. C. 726, 41 S. E.

with which she paid all the bills and home expenses. In 1903, when he was again drinking hard, he spent practically all his money in defendant's saloon, not furnishing his wife enough for support and to pay rent, and she was obliged to open a millinery store, from the proceeds of which she supported the family. This continued until 1908. Some time in October, 1906, he once came to the store intoxicated, threw her through the store door, and broke up some of the furniture. On account of this violence, she became sick and was unable to do her work. For three weeks she was afraid to stay in the store, and rented a room or stopped with her neighbors. She notified defendant verbally not to sell her husband liquor, at which time he said it was none of her business how her husband spent his money. She also, October 6, 1906, served a written notice on him forbidding him selling to her husband intoxicating liquors, for the reason that he was in the habit of getting intoxicated and was an habitual drinker. Defendant continued to sell and furnish him liquors to drink until as late as March, 1908. From an account furnished by defendant in a garnishee suit

And in State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 202, 24 Am. Rep. 124, it was held in a prosecution for adultery that the husband of the woman with whom the offense was alleged to have been committed was competent to testify to circumstances which did not directly criminate the wife.

In State v. Dudley, 7 Wis. 664, it was held that the husband was competent to prove his marriage with the woman with whom accused was alleged to have committed the offense.

In State v. Vollander, 57 Minn. 225, 58 N. W. 878, it was pointed out that the statute provided that the prosecution for adultery could only be commenced on the complaint of the husband or wife, and the court reasoned that if it be consistent with public policy that the injured party alone may institute the prosecution, it cannot be inconsistent with it that he or she may support it against the paramour by testifying to the fact within his or her knowledge; that it would be strange if the party may make complaint, but may not give evidence in support of it. To the same effect is Morrill v. State, 5 Tex. App. 447.

And in Heacock v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 606, 112 Pac. 949, it was held that adultery is a personal offense against the injured husband or wife, under the statute which provided that prosecutions for adultery can be commenced and carried on against either of the parties to the crime only by his or her own husband or wife, or by the husband or wife of the other party to the crime, and that the husband of one of the parties was competent to prove the offense even though the guilty parties were jointly indicted for the offense, where another statute expressly provides that a husband or wife is a competent witness against the other in a criminal prosecution for a crime committed by one against the other.

fact of his wife's adultery, in a controversy over the distribution of the deceased wife's estate, between the husband electing to take against the will and others claiming under the will, where his testimony does not involve the disclosure of confidential communications made by her to him. Hayes's Estate, 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 573.

So the husband's testimony as to the wife's conduct with an adulterer was received in Bigelow v. Sickles, 75 Wis. 427, 44 N. W. 761, in an action by the wife for malicious prosecution.

A wife is competent to testify as to threats and violence of her husband which induced her to sign a deed conveying her real estate, in an action by her to recover the land, where the husband was not a party to the suit. Vicknair v. Trosclair, 45 La. Ann. 373, 12 So. 486.

The wife is competent to testify concerning her husband's condition and appearance after an accident, in an action by her upon an insurance policy, as those facts did not come to her knowledge by reason of the marital relation. Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Bethel, 140 Ky. 609, 131 S. W. 523.

And in French v. Ware, 65 Vt. 338, 26 Atl. 1096, it was held that a divorced wife was competent to testify to facts observed by her during the marriage relation as to the former husband's ability to labor, which tended to contradict his testimony in regard to the same facts, and tended to discredit him as a witness in his action for damages for assault and battery. After pointing out that the subject was not regulated by statute in that jurisdiction, and after reviewing a number of cases, the court said: "When the marriage is dissolved by death or divorce, no reason exists why the survivor should not be competent to testify as fully as in a suit between third parties, although the testimony might bear against the other party to the dissolved marriage. From these decisions it is fairly deducible that a widow or divorced wife is competent to testify to any facts or acts occurring during the married life which did not come to her knowledge in confidence growing out of the marital relation, although they may tend to show the husband had committed a fraud, or to discredit him as a witness, or indirectly to show that he has been guilty of a crime." A. L. R.

Miscellaneous.

A husband is a competent witness to the

brought against Mr. Fleming for a claimed balance on saloon account of $138.20, it appears that he had sold and charged plaintiff's husband for liquors about $800. This did not include any drinks for which cash had been paid. It appears that Mr. Fleming quit drinking in 1908, and at the time of the trial in December, 1909, continued to abstain from all intoxicants. There is practically no dispute in the record as to the foregoing facts. The only witness for the defense was defendant, whose direct examination was brief. He admitted selling to Mr. Fleming both before and after notice. He claimed that Mr. Fleming never became "intoxicated, and never lost any time for his work." He admitted that plaintiff and her young son used to come to his place quite frequently after Mr. Fleming to get him to go home.

Of the errors assigned we will first consider the denial of a new trial. From this record it is apparent that the verdict of 6 cents damages was contrary to the great weight of the evidence, and grossly inadequate. The undisputed evidence tended to show that defendant sold plaintiff's husband intoxicating liquors after being notified that he was an habitual drinker, and in the habit of becoming intoxicated, and did become intoxicated upon liquors so sold to him by defendant; that this plaintiff suffered materially in the matter of her support; that she suffered personal violence and was made sick by her husband's assaults; that her property was destroyed; and that she suffered damages to her feelings in shame, humiliation, and disgrace, all by reason of the conduct of her husband, caused by the unlawful sale of liquors made to him by defendant; and there was abundant evidence tending to show that she was entitled to substantial damages for such injuries. The court was in error in denying such motion.

Upon the offer of evidence by the plaintiff relative to the acts and conduct of the plaintiff's husband when he was intoxicated at the times referred to in the statement of facts, the court refused to allow plaintiff to testify. Several errors are assigned upon such rulings and the interjection of prejudicial remarks by the court, as follows: "Q. Will you describe what took place on this occasion, how Mr. Fleming acted, and what he did?" The court excluded the answer upon the ground that it was a privileged communication, counsel for defendant having made no objection for that reason. In a long statement by the court he refused to change his ruling, because "such testimony would tend to disrupt the family relation and create interminable litigation." The examination of the witness proceeded: "Q. What did he do on these occasions?" Counsel for defendant made the same objection. "Q. Leave out what he said to you, what did he do? A. He struck me. The Court: You are getting that in. It is inimical to the family harmony." The court sustained an objection, and ruled the testimony out. The wife was clearly a competent witness to testify as to the conduct of her husband when intoxicated from the effects of liquor unlawfully sold to him by defendant. The court was in error in excluding such testimony.

We have examined the other material errors assigned, and, although we think that they are meritorious, we do not consider it necessary to discuss them, for the reason that it would be of no benefit to the profession, and there is no probability that they will recur upon a new trial.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF UTAH, Resp't.,

v.

JOSEPH GURR, Appt.

(— Utah, —, 120 Pac. 209.)

Larceny — possession of recently stolen property — bill of sale — effect.

The production by one found in possession of property recently stolen, of a signed and witnessed bill of sale of the property from a stranger, supported by unimpeached testimony of himself and the witnesses that he purchased and paid for it, is not sufficient to overcome the statutory presumption of larceny arising from such possession, so as to authorize the setting aside of a conviction for lack of evidence to support it.

(December 27, 1911.)

Note. — Production of bill of sale as repelling inference or presumption of guilt from possession of recently stolen property.

It will be seen that in STATE V. GURR it was unsuccessfully claimed by the defendant that a "reasonable," corroborated, and uncontradicted explanation of his possession of the stolen property destroyed any probative force of such possession, and that such explanation included a bill of sale from a stranger, supported by the testimony of the prosecuting witnesses.

This question as to an unimpeached bill of sale does not seem to have been hitherto decided.

In State v. Webb, 18 Utah, 441, 56 Pac.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Uintah County convicting him of grand larceny. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John T. Pope and J. W. N. Whitecotton, for appellant:

The inference of defendant's guilt growing out of his possession of the animals, which are shown to have been stolen from one Teague, is completely overcome by the testimony of himself and the two witnesses who saw the bill of sale given, and witnessed it.

Messrs. A. R. Barnes, Attorney General, and George C. Buckle, for the State:

If defendant's explanation is unreasonable or improbable on the face of it, it is not incumbent upon the prosecution, in order to secure conviction, to assume the burden of showing the falsity of the explanation. The question as to the sufficiency and credibility of the explanation is for the jury.

25 Cyc. 138; State v. King, 122 Iowa, 1, 96 N. W. 712; State v. Marshall, 105 Iowa, 38, 74 N. W. 763; State v. Mandich, 24 Nev. 336, 54 Pac. 516; Thomason v. State, —

159, where the court declined to disturb a conviction for larceny of cattle, there were two bills of sale dated on two successive days, apparently by different makers, which together covered all of the cattle in question and some others; the first bill was offered by the state with the consent of the defendant, and the other he offered himself. The defendant testified that the matter of his purchase of the cattle was opened by a letter received by him from a man at Leamington who he said signed the first bill of sale, and who introduced him to the signer of the second bill; that the brother of the defendant, who was apparently a witness to the first bill, was not present at the time, but he afterwards asked him to sign it as witness, and he did so in pencil and the defendant afterwards traced the signature in ink; that he wrote the body of both bills of sale himself; that the difference in dates was a mistake, for, while the cattle were bought on the two succeeding days, both bills were executed on the second day. The state gave testimony to the effect that the signatures to both bills were in the same handwriting, and that there was no man in the vicinity of Leamington of the name signed to the first bill of sale. This case is criticized in State v. Potello, — Utah, —, 119 Pac. 1023, as possibly holding that, in larceny the recent possession of stolen property is itself sufficient to warrant a conviction; but the court there said: "While we think there is some doubt as to the holding in that case on this point, yet we think, from the statement of facts as disclosed by the opinion, that was there some direct evidence of the taking. There certainly was a showing in that case on the part of the state, of an untruthful explanation with respect to the defendant's possession."

In Pitsnogle v. Com. 91 Va. 808, 50 Am. St. Rep. 867, 22 S. E. 351, where the facts are not reported, the court said, in holding that under the Virginia statute proof of embezzlement would be sufficient to convict upon a common-law indictment for larceny: "It is contended that the proof of embezzlement is insufficient. It appears that the defendant lent Edmond Bolden $6 for thirty 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

days, and that, as security for the loan, he received in pawn Bolden's watch. The testimony of the defendant contradicts that of the commonwealth in certain particulars, but the great weight of evidence sustains the contention of the commonwealth, and, from that, it appears that Bolden pawned his watch with the defendant, who at the time gave a receipt which correctly stated the transaction; that he appropriated the watch to his own use, and by falsely and fraudulently substituting another and different paper for the one originally executed, he attempted to convert a transaction which was originally a loan into a sale, and thereby vest the property of the watch in himself. We cannot conceive of evidence more conclusive of his guilt, if the witnesses who testify are worthy of belief. Their credibility was submitted to a jury, and the jury having found a verdict in accordance with their testimony, it is beyond the power of the court to disturb it."

In Holley v. State, 21 Tex. App. 156, 17 S. W. 159, the court, in setting aside a conviction for the larceny of four head of cattle, simply stated that it did not think that the conviction should stand on the testimony set out in the case. In that case the owner testified that the defendant showed to him what he claimed was a bill of sale for the cattle, the signatures to which were unknown to the witness, and told him that he had bought the "chance" in the cattle from a stranger that he met on the train, who pointed out generally the range or part of the country where they might be. He said that if they belonged to the witness, he would get them from the person to whom he in turn had sold them, if the witness would put him to no trouble in the way of getting witnesses, etc., as to his transaction with the stranger; and he caused them to be so given up to the owner. When sold by the defendant they were freshly branded with the brand of the defendant. There was some evidence of good character, but this seems to have been the only evidence on the part of the defense, and it does not appear that the bill of sale was offered in evidence.

In Sparks v. Oklahoma, 76 C. C. A. 594,

Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 41 S. W. 638; State v. Brown, 25 Iowa, 561; Van Straaten v. People, 26 Colo. 184, 56 Pac. 905; 1 McClain, Crim. Law, § 618, p. 628; State v. Overson, 30 Utah, 22, 83 Pac. 557, 8 Ann. Cas. 794; State v. Webb, 18 Utah, 441, 56 Pac. 159.

Frick, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was charged with the crime of grand larceny committed by stealing fourteen head of cattle, the property of one S. W. Teague. Appellant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment in the Utah State Prison, and appeals.

The only errors assigned are that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment, and that the court erred in not granting a new trial.

There is no dispute with regard to the ownership of the cattle, nor that they were stolen. There is no direct evidence that appellant stole the cattle in question, but there is uncontradicted evidence to the effect that a short time after the alleged bill of sale hereinafter referred to is dated, he was seen at Horseshoe Bend, on Green river, Utah, where Teague, the owner of the cattle in question, kept or ranged his cattle, and at that time appellant had in his possession some of Teague's cattle. Appellant explains this by the statement that, after he purchased the cattle in question, he drove them to Green river, which is some distance from Vernal, where he claimed to purchase the cattle from Pierce, for the purpose of grazing them. There is also undisputed evidence that quite a number of the stolen cattle, if at all, were branded with Teague's brand, with which appellant was acquainted. Appellant was thus found in possession of some of Teague's cattle a short time after they had been stolen or taken from the range. At the time it was discovered that appellant had possession of the stolen cattle, he had already disposed of some of them to a butcher, and the brand on the hides was identified as Teague's brand. Appellant explained his possession, stating that he had purchased the cattle in question from one W. F. Pierce, who was a stranger, whom neither appellant nor anyone else knew, and who apparently disappeared immediately after he had sold the cattle to appellant. As evidence of such sale, appellant produced and introduced in evidence the following bill of sale:

Vernal, Utah, August 18, 1909.

For value received this certifies that I this day have sold to J. E. Gurr, fourteen head of cattle branded "A. N." on left side, three calves branded "W." on left side, for the consideration of two hundred and twenty-five dollars ($225). F. W. Pierce.

Witness:

J. H. Cook

his

M. X Mott.

mark

Both Cook and Mott, witnesses to the bill of sale, testified on behalf of appellant. They said that they were present when appellant purchased the cattle from Pierce; that he was a stranger to them, and that they had not seen him before nor saw him after the alleged sale of the cattle to appellant; that they saw appellant pay Pierce some money at the time the bill of sale

146 Fed. 371, where a conviction for larceny of steers was reversed on the ground that incompetent and irrelevant testimony was admitted on behalf of the state, the fact that the defendant offered a bill of sale of the steers is not alluded to in the opinion.

A fabricated bill of sale has been offered by the state as in State v. Webb, supra. So in Williams v. State, 27 Tex. App. 466, 11 S. W. 481, where the defendant and his accomplice, when arrested, were searched, and on one or the other of them was found what purported to be a bill of sale, the state offered this bill in evidence, and proved that it was in the handwriting of the defendant, and that the signature of one of the witnesses to it was a forgery, and that the other signatures were in the handwriting of the defendant. In affirming the conviction for theft, the court said: "It was not error to admit in evidence, against the defendant, the bill of sale found in his possession, or in the possession of the party with him. This bill of sale described the stolen horses, and was manufactured, as the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) evidence shows, by the defendant. That it was taken from the possession of the defendant while he was under arrest, and without authority of law, did not render it inadmissible evidence against him."

In Territory v. Doyle, 7 Mont. 245, 14 Pac. 671, the court said, in affirming a conviction for larceny of mules: "It is alleged as an error that the court admitted in evidence a certain bill of sale found on the defendant when he was arrested. There was no error in admitting this bill of sale in evidence. The defendant had it in his possession, and it described the stolen mules which he was driving. The fact that the brands did not exactly correspond, and that the vendee in the bill of sale was one Murphy, and not defendant, was properly left to the jury, with the other evidence tending to prove it to be a forgery; and whether it was or was not in the handwriting of the defendant and whether or not he claimed any right to the mules thereunder, were circumstances for the consideration of the jury."

was executed and the cattle delivered, but could not say how much. They also corroborated appellant in some other statements made by him. Appellant testified that he paid Pierce at the time of the delivery of the cattle the sum of $50, and thereafter on the same day, paid him the additional $175, which he obtained from his home at Vernal. The cattle were alleged to have been purchased about 4 miles south of Vernal. There are other facts and circumstances, but, in view that we cannot weigh or determine the probative force of the evidence, we shall refrain from setting forth more of it than is necessary to a full understanding of the points decided.

Counsel for appellant contend that, in view that in this case there was no direct evidence that appellant stole the cattle; that the only evidence relied on by the state is that the cattle were stolen, and that appellant had possession and had exercised dominion over them shortly after they were stolen; that appellant had made a reasonable explanation of his possession of the cattle, which was corroborated by witnesses whose testimony was not denied or disputed, and the witnesses not impeached by the state; that, therefore, there was no legal evidence of the guilt of appellant, and hence the verdict must be declared without support in the evidence as matter of law.

It must be conceded that the cases of State v. Marquardsen, 7 Idaho, 352, 62 Pac. 1034, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 493, and State v. Seymour, 7 Idaho, 257, 61 Pac. 1033, support counsel's contentions. It is there held that, where the only evidence of guilt is that property recently stolen is found in the possession of a person, and such person makes a reasonable explanation of his possession, which is corroborated and is not disputed by the state, the jury may not ignore the explanation, and a verdict of guilty will not be permitted to stand. It is somewhat singular, in view that the Seymour Case decided by the same court that decided the Marquardsen Case, and only about six months before the latter case was decided, that no mention of the former case is made in the latter. Nor is there any case cited in either of the Idaho cases in support of the doctrine there laid down. In addition to those two cases, appellant's counsel also cite the case of McMahon v. People, 120 Ill. 581, 11 N. E. 883; State v. McKinney, 76 Kan. 419, 91 Pac. 1068, and People v. Mock Yick Gar, 14 Cal. App. 334, 111 Pac. 1039. The first two cases involved the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to convict upon a charge of larceny where the accused was found in possession of recently stolen property. The facts in those cases, however, are distinguishable from those of the case at bar. The last case cited above is from the California court of appeal, but is not in point here.

The conviction in this case is based upon Comp. Laws 1907, § 4355, which reads as follows: "Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another. Possession of property recently stolen, when the party in possession fails to make a satisfactory explanation, shall be deemed prima facie evidence of guilt." Pursuant to such section the court charged the jury as follows: "In a criminal case the burden is upon the state to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, the guilt of the defendant; and that where property alleged to have been stolen is found in the possession of the defendant, and the defendant makes a reasonable explanation of such possession, which is not challenged by the state, then the defendant is entitled to an acquittal, if the jury believes the explanation to be true." No exception was taken to this charge, and no complaint is made with regard thereto, except that the jury must have ignored or disregarded it, or they would have acquitted the appellant. While the charge is perhaps open to criticism in some respects, and for that reason we do not approve it, yet in view that no exception was taken, we need not now pause to consider it further. As already indicated, if the cases from Idaho are to be strictly followed, then, perhaps, the explanation of appellant's possession, whether true or false, in view that it was not denied by the state, and neither he nor his witnesses impeached, should be held sufficient to entitle him to an acquittal. But we think that the weight of authority and the better reason are opposed to the doctrine laid down in the Idaho cases, and hence are adverse to counsel's contentions. In State v. Brown, 25 Iowa, 566, Mr. Chief Justice Dillon, in discussing the probative force of an explanation made by an accused in whose possession recently stolen property was found, says: "But, where the claim is that he bought the property of a stranger, this is not necessarily such an explanation as obliges the state specifically to disprove it." In State v. Marshall, 105 Iowa, 38, 74 N. W. 763, the rule in the headnote, which reflects the decision, is stated thus: "The truthfulness of an explanation of the possession of stolen goods, although not contradicted, must be determined by the jury." To the same effect are State v. King, 122 Iowa, 1, 96 N. W. 712, and State v. Mandich, 24 Nev. 336, 54 Pac. 516. In 25 Cyc. 138, the rule generally prevailing is stated in the following language: "Whether the explanation is reasonable is for the jury. And a reasonable explanation will not necessarily lead to acquittal. Even if a reasonable account is given, the question of guilt is still entirely for the jury, and defendant is not entitled to an instruction that the prosecution must show the account to be false." The authorities in support of the foregoing text are referred to in the footnotes.

If counsel's contentions are correct, then the whole matter hinges on whether the explanation which the accused makes concerning his possession is in the judgment of this court reasonable or not. If the jury should find it unreasonable, but we should deem it reasonable, we would be compelled to reverse the findings of the jury. This would require us to pass upon the weight to be given to the testimony of the accused and his witnesses respecting the explanation, although the jury had seen and heard them testify, which we had not. Such a rule would, in effect, require the jury to believe or accept every reasonable explanation made by the witnesses, although in the judgment of the jury there were good reasons for disbelieving the statements made by them respecting the possession of the property. Counsel, however, contend that, if a reasonable explanation is made and we refuse to interfere, the jury can arbitrarily disregard every explanation, and thus convict innocent men. While it may be possible that a jury may err with regard to both the reasonableness and truthfulness of an explanation, yet such an error is possible with regard to any inculpatory fact which the jury must find from the evidence in order to convict the accused. The question, so far as this court is concerned, is not whether the jury ought to have found the accused guilty under the evidence, but the question is, Is there any substantial evidence to support the findings of the jury?

Since writing the foregoing we have had occasion to pass upon the meaning and effect that should be given § 4355, supra, in two well-considered opinions written by Mr. Justice Straup, namely, in State v. Potello, — Utah, —, 119 Pac. 1023, and in State v. Converse, — Utah, —, 119 Pac. 1030. We there held that the question of whether the explanation respecting the possession of property recently stolen is reasonable or satisfactory is ordinarily a question for the jury, the same as is any other question of fact. If the evidence is such that all reasonable minds should arrive at the conclusion that the explanation is reasonable and satisfactory, then, and then only, does it become a question of law to be determined by the court. If, however, after a full, fair, and impartial consideration of all of the evidence relating to the explanation, reasonable minds may differ, and may thus arrive at different conclusions with regard to whether it is reasonable and satisfactory or not, the finding of the jury must control. In this case there are abundant circumstances relating to the possession of the cattle and appellant's explanation of his possession, from which different minds may draw different inferences or conclusions. Moreover, the veracity of appellant and his witnesses was a question for the jury. True, as is said by Mr. Justice Straup in the cases before referred to, a jury may not without cause ignore or disregard competent and material evidence. The jury may, however, disregard evidence given or statements made by the accused or his witnesses if there is a good reason for doing so, and, in the event the jury have for good cause refused to believe a witness or witnesses, we cannot control their judgment.

Without going into further detail, it must suffice to say that, after a careful consideration of all the facts and circumstances in evidence in this case, we are of the opinion that, under the rule laid down in both of the cases to which we have referred, the finding of the jury that the possession of the cattle in question by appellant was felonious, and that his explanation of such possession was not satisfactory, is supported by the evidence. If we should hold otherwise in this case, cattle stealing from our vast ranges would become a comparatively safe, rather than a hazardous undertaking, unless someone actually knew of or saw the accused drive them from the range.

The judgment is affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

SARAH M. DAVIDSON, Resp't.,

v.

FRANK W. HURTY, Appt.

(116 Minn. 280, 133 N. W. 862.)

Specific performance — contract agent — parol evidence.

1. A real estate company entered into a Headnotes by LEWIS, J.

Note. — Character of contract as affecting right of undisclosed principal to sue thereon.

This note is supplementary to a note in 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 472.

As shown in the above note, the general contract with defendant whereby it agreed to sell him certain real estate upon stipulated terms. The company was not the owner of the property, and the contract contained a provision that it should be approved by the owner. Plaintiff was the owner, and her husband was her business manager, and he indorsed upon the contract the words: "Approved. W. P. Davidson." Plaintiff then carried out all of the provisions of the contract, and tendered a deed with the usual covenants, executed by herself and husband. Held:

1. Plaintiff's remedy was by specific performance, as the undisclosed principal; and parol evidence was admissible to prove that she was the owner, that her husband acted with her authority, and that she had complied with the terms of the contract.

Contract — sale of real estate — real owner.

2. It was immaterial that the real owner was not disclosed on the face of the contract.

rule permitting an undisclosed principal to sue on a contract made by his agent, even though the contract was made by the agent in his own name without anything therein indicating the agency, is subject to many exceptions. One of the important exceptions is where the application of the rule would violate the right to choose with whom one will have business dealings. This doctrine has especial application to executory contracts where entered into by the parties in the belief that they were contracting with each other as principals. In such cases, by the great weight of authority, the general rule does not apply, and either party may refuse to proceed with the contract upon ascertaining that the other party was acting merely as agent for an undisclosed principal.

The cases holding contrary to this doctrine, as to executory contracts entered into by the parties under the belief that they were contracting with each other as principals, do not distinguish between executed and executory contracts, and cite as authority cases wherein the general statement is made sustaining the right of an undisclosed principal to sue on a contract made by his agent, but which are based for the most part, if not entirely, upon executed contracts. These cases involve a different principle. As shown in DAVIDSON v. HURTY, citing to the point the note in 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 472, where the agent, acting in behalf of his undisclosed principal, has fully performed the contract, and performance has been accepted by the other party, although without knowledge of the undisclosed principal, the latter may maintain an action in his own name to recover the consideration for performance. This rule, however, is not in conflict with the exception above referred to.

A case wherein the distinction referred to apparently is not drawn is Hawkins v. Windhorst, — Kan. —, 123 Pac. 761, holding that an undisclosed principal may sue 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Evidence — parol — sale of real estate — varying.

3. Such evidence did not necessarily vary or contradict the terms of the contract as to the ownership of the property, since his approval of the contract was consistent with plaintiff's ownership, and defendant was not misled thereby.

Same — statutory provision — true owner — agency.

4. Section 3609, R. I. 1905, which prohibits contracts for the sale of real estate between husband and wife, did not prevent the introduction of parol evidence to prove that the wife was the owner, and that her husband acted with her authority.

(December 22, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought to enforce specific perform-for breach of a contract entered into by his agent as principal, for the sale of a drove of cattle, although the agent represented the cattle to be his, and they were purchased by the purchaser with that understanding and belief on his part. In reaching its conclusion the court applies the general doctrine that an undisclosed principal may sue on a contract by his agent. Considering the question as to the right of every person to choose for himself with whom he will have business dealings, the court, while conceding the proposition, says that the consent need not be expressed, but may be implied from circumstances, and adds: "The making of an ordinary business contract, without in some way indicating that the personality of the other party is regarded as material, implies consent that it may be enforced by a third person, if it was made in his behalf. Otherwise, the enforcement of a contract by an undisclosed principal could always be defeated by the assertion of the other party that he had made no contract with him, and the rule referred to would be nullified. . . . In order that one party to a contract may refuse to recognize an undisclosed principal merely because he does not wish to have business relations with him, he must not only have had the purpose to deal solely with the person with whom his negotiations were had, but he must also have made his purpose in that regard manifest."

Another case sustaining the right of an undisclosed principal to sue on a written contract made by an agent in his own name is Schmucker v. Higgins-Roberts Grain Co. 28 Okla. 721, 116 Pac. 184, involving an action for damages by the undisclosed principal, based upon the refusal of the purchaser to receive property purchased of the plaintiff's agent, after the fact of the agency appeared. In this case, however, there was correspondence between the parties subsequently to the disclosure of the agency, indicating a recognition by the purchaser of ance of a contract for the purchase of real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John D. O'Brien and Dillon J. O'Brien, for appellant:

There was a complete written contract between Watson P. Davidson and Frank W. Hurty, by the terms of which Davidson represented himself to be the owner of the property, and agreed to convey it to Hurty by warranty deed.

Clampet v. Bells, 39 Minn. 272, 39 N. W. 495; Morton v. Stone, 39 Minn. 275, 39 N. W. 496.

If, under this contract, upon its face with Watson P. Davidson, in which he undertakes to give his personal warranty of title, anyone for whom Davidson was acting could intervene and enforce the payment of the purchase price without any warranty of title, they could do more than Davidson himself, for he could not enforce the contract without giving his warranty of title.

Steiner v. Zwickey, 41 Minn. 448, 43 N. W. 378; George v. Conhaim, 38 Minn. 338, 37 N. W. 791; Birmingham Matinee Club v. McCarty, 152 Ala. 571, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 156, 44 So. 642, 15 Ann. Cas. 238; Kelly v. Thuey, 102 Mo. 522, 15 S. W. 62.

Where the proposed oral evidence to establish the relation of undisclosed principal involves a contradiction of the statements or recitals of the written contract, it will not be received.

If the contract was with Davidson as owner, the defendant was entitled to a warranty deed from Davidson, warranting the title to the land. This is a covenant which, if effective at all, runs with the land and adds to its value.

the undisclosed principal as a party to the transaction. The decision itself, however, is apparently based upon the application of the general doctrine that an undisclosed principal may sue on a contract made by his agent in the name of the latter.

In this connection, and as illustrating the distinction between an executory contract entered into by the parties under the belief that they were contracting with each other as principals, and a contract entered into by the parties with the knowledge that one of them was acting for an undisclosed principal, as regards the application of the rule under consideration, attention is called to the case under annotation, DAVIDSON v. HURTY, wherein the court specifically enforced an executory contract for the sale of real estate, but the contract contained a provision that it was made subject to the owner's approval without specifying the owner. It therefore bore upon its face conclusive evidence that the purchaser entered into it with the intention of relying upon 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the responsibility of and contracting with some unknown person. The fact that it was thereafter approved by a written indorsement thereon by another agent of the undisclosed principal, without the indorsement disclosing the agency, could not affect the ultimate right of the undisclosed principal. The contract having been signed by competent parties, there is a conflict among the cases as to whether its validity was affected by the statute of frauds, since in fact it was executed by one party as agent. As bearing on this question, see note in 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 733, considering the rule as to whether the statute of frauds relating to sales of real property may be satisfied by a memorandum which discloses that one of the parties acted for an undisclosed principal. And see also note in 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 315, on the question of the admissibility of parol evidence that one of the persons who signed an instrument relating to real property was the agent for an undisclosed principal. A. G. S.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff was the owner of lot 2, fronting on Sibley street, in the city of St. Paul, and on the 22d day of August, 1910, she entered into a contract with a manufacturing company to build thereon a three-story and basement brick building, 125 feet deep, with 50 feet frontage, and entered into a lease of the building to the company for the sum of $5,000 per year for five years. Her husband, W. P. Davidson, was her business representative, and attended to the business of negotiating the lease and construction of the building. After a considerable amount of work had been done in excavating and preparing for the foundation, defendant instituted negotiations with the Sperry Realty Company for the purpose of inducing Mr. Davidson to abandon the construction of the building on lot 2, for the reason that, if erected, it would interfere with the light, then accessible, to certain store buildings fronting on Seventh street, which belonged to members of defendant's family. In furtherance of these negotiations, the Sperry Realty Company entered into a contract with defendant on the 29th day of September, 1910, whereby it agreed to convey lot 2 to the defendant in consideration of $27,500, $2,500 of which was paid at the execution of the contract, $10,000 to be paid upon delivery of the deed, and the balance on or before five years. The contract contained the statement that it was made subject to the owner's approval, but it did not specify who the real owner was. Having been informed of the execution of the contract, Mr. Davidson notified defendant that he was negotiating a contract with the manufacturing company to change the location of the building from lot 2 to the adjoining lot 3, and, in case such an arrangement was made, that he would sell to the defendant lot 2, according to the terms of the contract signed by the Sperry Realty Company. About the same time Mr. Davidson indorsed upon that contract these words: "Approved. Watson P. Davidson." Mr. Davidson then purchased lot 3 from the owner, a third party, and entered into a contract with the manufacturing company to erect for it a building upon that lot, secured their cancellation of the lease on lot 2, caused the excavation on lot 2 to be partially filled, and proceeded with the erection of the building on lot 3. In accordance with the terms of the Sperry Realty Company contract, plaintiff furnished an abstract of title, which was examined by defendant's attorney, and was perfected in accordance with such attorney's request. Defendant refused to complete the contract, and this action was brought by Mrs. Davidson as the undisclosed principal to recover the $10,000 and for specific performance. The trial court found for the plaintiff.

Witness Sperry and Mr. Davidson both testified, against objection, that defendant was informed that Mrs. Davidson was the owner of lot 2, but was absent from the city; and that defendant agreed to accept the contract with Mr. Davidson's approval indorsed thereon. Defendant denied this, and the court did not determine the issue thus made. It conclusively appears from the evidence, however, and the court so found, that Mr. Davidson was acting as the agent of his wife, and that she approved of his conduct in all that he did. The burden of proving that Mr. Davidson was in fact the plaintiff's agent, and had authority to conduct the negotiations, was upon the plaintiff, and whether parol evidence was admissible for that purpose is the principal question in the case.

The general rule that an undisclosed principal may sue on a contract made by his agent in his behalf is subject to several exceptions. Formerly it was held that the rule applied only to simple contracts, but in J. B. Streeter, Jr. Co. v. Janu, 90 Minn. 393, 96 N. W. 1128, it was held that the distinctions between simple contracts and contracts under seal were obliterated by Laws 1899, chap. 86, p. 88, even as applied to a contract sought to be enforced against an undisclosed principal. The rule does not apply to contracts which are personal in their nature, such as guaranty or indemnity. This exception is based on the ground that it is the right of every party to choose with whom he will have business dealings; and ordinarily the courts will not enforce an executory contract in behalf of an undisclosed principal, where the other party thereto objects to performance on the ground that he executed the contract under the belief that the agent was the real party to it, and that he would not have entered into it with the undisclosed principal of such agent, or where it appears clearly that exclusive credit was given to the agent. Birmingham Matinee Club v. McCarty, 152 Ala. 571, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 156, 44 So. 642, 15 Ann. Cas. 237; Edwards v. Ezell, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 208; Brown v. Morris, 83 N. C. 254; Sullivan v. Shailor, 70 Conn. 733, 40 Atl. 1054; Cowan v. Curran, 216 Ill. 598, 75 N. E. 322.

But it has generally been held that where the agent, acting in behalf of his undisclosed principal, has fully performed the contract, and performance has been accepted by the other party, although without knowledge of the undisclosed principal, the latter may maintain an action in his own name to recover the consideration for performance. Note to Shields v. Coyne, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 472. In Kelly v. Thuey, 143 Mo. 422, 45 S. W. 300, it was held without qualification that a principal may maintain an action in his own name to enforce a contract for the purchase of real estate; it being immaterial whether the principal was known or unknown, or whether the party supposed he was dealing with the agent personally on his own behalf.

The rule excluding parol evidence to contradict or vary a written contract does not exclude parol evidence to show that a person named in a written contract, or signing the same, was the agent of an undisclosed principal. Wm. Lindeke Land Co. v. Levy, 76 Minn. 364, 79 N. W. 314. It is immaterial that the contract is required by the statute of frauds to be in writing. Such proof does not vary or contradict the writing, but merely establishes a collateral fact; that is, the authority under which the agent acts. Kingsley v. Siebrecht, 92 Me. 23, 69 Am. St. Rep. 480, 42 Atl. 249; Hunter v. Giddings, 97 Mass. 41, 93 Am. Dec. 54; Clark & S. Agency, § 529. It has been held that an undisclosed principal cannot sue on a contract, when parol evidence of the agency would contradict its express terms. Clark & Skyles make this statement in § 534, and cite Humble v. Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310, 17 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 350, where the party to the contract declared himself to be "the owner of the ship."

In the present case the contract for the sale of lot 2 to the defendant was executed by the Sperry Realty Company, and in the body of it no mention is made of the ownership; but it contained an indorsement after the signatures that it was made subject to the owner's approval. Mr. Davidson did not sign it, but approved it by writing his name thereon. Conceding that parol evidence will not be received to vary the terms of a written contract, whereby in express terms a party assumes a position peculiarly personal, this contract does not fall under that class. Mr. Davidson's approval did not necessarily amount to a representation that he was the owner. On the other hand, his approval was consistent with his conduct as his wife's agent and with her ownership. It does not appear 39 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that defendant was induced to enter into the contract by any representation that Mr. Davidson was the owner, and the record fails to disclose evidence from which it might be inferred that defendant would have refused to make the contract of purchase direct with Mrs. Davidson.

Section 3609, Rev. Laws 1905, which prohibits contracts for the sale of real estate between husband and wife, did not prevent the fact of ownership and authority in the husband from being shown. While part performance alone may not be sufficient, yet the doctrine of estoppel is applicable where the owner and the agent have proceeded in good faith in reliance on the contract and the other party has not been prejudiced. This statute does not enable a purchaser to recover back purchase money from a wife, paid pursuant to the terms of a contract for the sale of her real estate executed by the husband by signing her name; she being willing to comply therewith. Keystone Iron Co. v. Logan, 55 Minn. 537, 57 N. W. 156. And it does not stand in the way of the enforcement by the wife of a contract for the sale of her real estate executed by her husband as her agent. Stromme v. Rieck, 107 Minn. 177, 131 Am. St. Rep. 452, 119 N. W. 948. Such contracts are not void for all purposes, and it is immaterial whether the wife's ownership is disclosed by the terms of the instrument. The plaintiff acted in good faith, canceled the lease on lot 2, purchased another lot, and erected the building thereon, all in reliance on defendant's agreement to complete the purchase of lot 2. She caused the title to be perfected in accordance with defendant's demands, and even tendered a deed executed by herself and husband, with the usual covenants, in which Mr. Davidson joined.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (In Banc.)

JOHN SALMON, Appt.,
v.
KANSAS CITY.

(— Mo. —, 145 S. W. 16.)

Master and servant — public contract — independent contractor — supervision of work.

1. A contract for the construction of a

Note. — There seems to be no other reported case involving the question of the effect of an independent contractor's finan-sewer for a lump sum is not prevented from being independent, so as to relieve the municipality from liability for injuries to the contractor's employees, by the fact that the city engineer is given general supervision over the work, with power to require the discharge of incompetent employees, since such provisions are inserted in the contract merely for the protection of the city.

Same — blasting — streets — rights of employees.

2. The rule that a municipal corporation cannot avoid liability for injuries caused by blasting which it permits in its streets; by letting the work to an independent contractor, does not apply in favor of the latter's employees; at least not in case the injury is to one drilling the holes, from negligence of the foreman in failing to discover an unexploded charge.

Same — incompetent contractor — injury to employee — liability of owner.

3. The employee of one who has undertaken to construct a sewer for a municipality cannot hold it liable for injuries inflicted upon him because of the incompetence of the contractor, even though the incompetence consists of inability to respond in damages for injuries negligently inflicted upon him.

Municipal corporation — blasting in street — neglect to require license — liability.

4. A municipal corporation is not liable for injury to the employee of an independent contractor for sewer construction which requires blasting in a public street, because it did not require the contractor to secure a license which its ordinances make a requisite to the doing of that kind of work.

cial irresponsibility upon the employer's nonliability for the former's negligence. The precise ground of the decision in SALMON v. KANSAS CITY is, of course, that the employer owes no duty to the contractor's servant, in respect of the contractor's financial responsibility. Whether he is charged with any duty toward the servant in respect of intrinsically dangerous operations is another question. The decision seems to proceed upon the assumption that the employer's duty toward third persons, of employing a financially responsible contractor, is at least no greater than his duty to employ one who is competent. Generally as to the effect of employing an incompetent contractor, see subdivision II. of the note to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tow, 66 L.R.A. 941.

Ferriss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from a judgment of the circuit court of Jackson county sustaining a demurrer to the petition filed by plaintiff, charging negligence resulting in personal injuries. The petition was filed on the 15th day of July, 1905, and covers nearly thirty printed pages. The suit was filed against Kansas City and Robert J. Boyd Paving & Construction Company, but subsequently dismissed as to the construction company.

It appears from the petition that on the 13th day of May, 1901, Kansas City entered into a contract with the construction company for constructing a district sewer in said city by said company. In the course of the ensuing work plaintiff was employed by the construction company as a common laborer, and was engaged in drilling holes for blasting rock which was encountered in the work of excavation. The petition charges that the method of preparing the blasts was as follows: The drillers, of whom plaintiff was one, would drill a series of holes about 2 feet apart, after which such holes would be loaded with giant powder or dynamite by one Kelleher, foreman, and one Moriarity, designated as the powder man, employees of the construction company, who would then shoot said holes by means of fuses; that it was usual and customary to count the number of holes in a given series before exploding same, then count the explosions to see whether they corresponded with the number of holes, and afterwards to inspect and examine the holes so exploded for missed shots; that the plaintiff and his gang had nothing to do with the loading or exploding of the holes, nor with the subsequent inspection, but that after the holes had been exploded and inspected plaintiff and his gang would be ordered to drill another series of holes; that on the afternoon of Saturday, July 13, 1901, a series of holes which had been drilled by plaintiff were attempted to be exploded by the said foreman and powder man; that on the following Monday plaintiff and his gang were ordered by foreman Kelleher to go back to the place where such series of holes had been exploded to drill a new series; that one hole of the former series remained unexploded; and that while at work drilling the new series a driller who was working near plaintiff caused said unexploded shot to be exploded with such force and violence as to seriously injure the plaintiff.

The plaintiff makes the proper averments to negative any contributory negligence on his part. There seems to have been no controversy as to the liability of the construction company for the negligence of its superintendent. The real controversy in the case is whether Kansas City is liable. The petition proceeds upon the theory that, because of the power of control reserved in the contract to the city's engineer, the construction company was not an independent contractor, and hence the city is liable. In stating below the substance of the petition, we adopt the italics as they appear in the abstract filed by plaintiff. We do not apprehend that these italics appear in the original contract, but use them because they indicate the parts of the contract on which the plaintiff particularly relies.

Plaintiff alleges that the city ordered the construction of the sewer; sets out certain ordinances of the city which provide for the appointment of a city engineer whose duty it should be "to supervise the construction of public and district sewers," also to prepare plans, specifications, and estimates of the cost of all public and district sewers ordered by the council, to report to the board of public works all violations of any contract, to sign all contracts on behalf of the city for public improvements, and to superintend their execution. The petition sets out § 883 of the Revised Ordinances of Kansas City for 1898, as follows: "Permit for Blasting.—No person shall do or cause to be done any blasting within the city limits without first obtaining from the city engineer a permit therefor, which shall be issued only on condition that the city engineer is satisfied that the applicant is in every particular a safe, careful, and suitable person to use, and an expert in the use of, all explosives used in blasting, but no permit shall, under any circumstances, be issued to anyone until the applicant therefor has entered into a bond to Kansas City in the sum of not less than $100 or more than $10,000, as the city engineer may require, with at least two securities, to be approved by the city comptroller, conditioned that such person will carefully and prudently use such explosive, and will pay any and all damages caused any person by the use thereof. And any person can sue on such bond in his own name for any damage caused him by the use of such explosive."

The petition sets out in hac verba the contract between the city and the construction company. This contract is extremely lengthy, is in the usual form of municipal contracts for public works, giving specifications as to the character of the work to be done, materials to be used, all under the supervision of the city engineer. The contract provides that the party of the first part (the construction company), having made the lowest bid, agrees to complete the work in a substantial and workmanlike manner, "in conformity with the plans of such work on file in the office of the city engineer of Kansas City, in strict obedience to the directions which may from time to time be given by said city engineer or his authorized agents, in accordance with the following specifications." The specifications provide: "The contractor shall not blast any rock or allow the same to be done on this work without taking such precautions, by covering or otherwise, as shall prevent damage or injury to person or property." That streets and alleys shall be restored "to the satisfaction of the engineer," surplus earth to be removed to such distance "as may be designated by the engineer," the foundations of the sewer to be either of broken stone, plank, concrete, or masonry, as shall be "ordered by the city engineer," the location of manholes and catch-basins to be changed, or omitted altogether, "if deemed best by the city engineer," no broken bricks to be allowed, "except for closures, or as shall be otherwise specially directed." Then follows a specification as to the character of cement to be used, providing certain tests to be conformed to, "except in such portions of the work as the city engineer may otherwise direct." The character of the concrete is specified, also the manner of preparing it, "unless otherwise ordered by the city engineer." House connections to be worked into the brickwork "in such manner as the engineer may direct." The masonry work to be suspended during freezing weather. "But the city engineer shall have the right to direct that the work shall be continued under such conditions as he shall prescribe." Also that during a suspension of the work from any cause, the same shall be suitably covered and the trenches filled "if the engineer so directs;" the syphon trap used to be satisfactory "in the opinion of the city engineer." Then follows a specification as to maintenance. The sunken trenches to be immediately filled, and if on a paved street, the pavement to be repaired by the contractor at his expense, "on receipt of notice from the city engineer so to do." That if the contractor fails to comply with said "notices from the city engineer for two days, then the city may cause the work of grading" to be done. Then follow some general specifications: "(2) The first party shall commence work at such points as the engineer may direct, and shall conform to his directions as to the order of time in which the different parts of the work shall be done, as well as to all his other instructions as to the mode of doing the same." The next paragraph provides that if the contractor is not present, orders shall be given to the superintendents in charge, and by them received and obeyed, and that "if any person employed on the work shall refuse or neglect to obey the directions of the engineer, or his duly authorized agents, in anything relating to the work, or shall appear to the engineer to be incompetent, disorderly, or unfaithful, he shall, upon the requisition of the engineer, be at once discharged, and not again employed on any part of the work." It is further provided that "the engineer shall be the judge" of any work that may be included in the contract by implication; also that the contractor shall do such extra work as "the engineer may specially direct," and that if the price for same is not stated in the contract, the price shall be fixed by the engineer." Next, that the contractor shall, "upon being so directed by the engineer," remove, rebuild, or make good, at his own cost, any work which the "latter shall decide to be defective." The work is to be begun within ten days unless "the engineer shall specially direct otherwise in writing." Provision No. 8 is that, if "in the opinion of the engineer" the work is not being prosecuted with sufficient force, the engineer may notify the contractor to employ such additional force "as he deems sufficient," and upon failure to comply with such notice, "the engineer may put on such additional force at the cost of the first party; or he may, at his option, declare this contract annulled; and the power is reserved to the city engineer by Kansas City to suspend or annul this contract, or to suspend the doing of any work thereunder," for any failure on the part of the contractor to fulfill same, and the decision of the engineer is to be conclusive. The contractor is required to observe all city ordinances in relation to obstructing the streets, maintaining signals, keeping open passageway, and protecting same, "and generally to obey all laws and ordinances controlling or limiting those engaged on the work." Then follows a clause by which the contractor agrees to indemnify the city and save it harmless on account of any injuries or damages received or sustained by any party or parties by the acts of the contractor. Next is a provision that "the city engineer shall, in all cases, determine the amount and quality of the several kinds of work" to be paid for, and that "he shall decide all questions which may arise relative to the execution of the contract," and that "his estimates and decisions shall be final and conclusive." It is further provided that the contractor "is subject to the city charter and ordinances in general." Then follows the agreement as to prices to be paid for the work, among others, "for each cubic yard of solid rock excavated." Then a provision that no payment is to be made until the work has been completed "to the satisfaction of the city engineer," and that there will be used brick only which has been approved "by the city engineer."

This contract was entered into by the construction company, as party of the first part, the National Surety Company, party of the second part, and Kansas City, party of the third part; the National Surety Company being surety for the contracting company for the faithful performance of the contract. The said party of the second part agreed "that the said party of the first part will well and faithfully perform each and all of the terms and stipulations in the foregoing contract," and further agreed that the work was to be begun within ten days, "unless the city engineer shall specially direct otherwise." The contract is signed by the city engineer on behalf of the city, and was duly approved and confirmed by the city council.

The petition, after reciting the contract, proceeds to aver that the work of constructing said sewer was commenced and prosecuted by defendants, and that the defendants and each of them had in their employment, and under their superintendence and control, a gang of men to which plaintiff belonged, and that the foreman, Kelleher, was a vice principal of defendants.

The various specifications of negligence charged against the city are scattered through this lengthy petition in a somewhat confused and inconsequent manner. We have, however, carefully analyzed the same, and find the specifications of negligence may be stated as follows:

(1) That the defendants knew, or might have known by the exercise of due care, that there was an unexploded shot in one of the drill holes, but that they negligently and carelessly failed to remove said danger or to warn plaintiff thereof, and negligently ordered plaintiff and his gang to go to said place and drill a new series of holes in close proximity to said unexploded charge.

(2) That the injury to plaintiff resulted from the immediate carelessness and negligence of the foreman, Kelleher, and the powder man, Moriarity, who were working under the direction and control of the defendants; that they were not safe, careful, or suitable persons for the performance of their duties, were not experienced, and were not competent; that the defendants knew of such incompetency, and were negligent in intrusting them with the work; and that defendants knew that Moriarity was utterly incompetent.

(3) That the defendants negligently and carelessly failed and refused to obey the terms of § 883 of the ordinances, set out above, and that they carelessly and negligently violated said ordinance, in that they failed to compel a compliance with said ordinance, which required them to employ expert licensed blasters; that the blaster employed by them was incompetent and nonexpert, and had no license; that it was within the power, and it was the duty, of the city, in the exercise of its reserve power and control over the work, to see that no person should be permitted to do said work of blasting except one qualified under said ordinance; and that the blaster who was employed had not qualified under said ordinance.

(4) That the city reserved and had the power to direct and control the manner of performing said work of blasting, and to direct and control all the workmen, and was careless and negligent in failing to exercise such care and control, and negligently caused the same to be done without reasonable care and prudence; that the defendants were negligent in failing to superintend and control the manner of performing said work of blasting in all its details; that the engineer had the power and authority to control and direct all the workmen as to the manner of doing the work, and especially the manner of doing said work of blasting, but negligently failed to exercise such control.

(5) That said series of holes to which said unexploded shot belonged was excessively, unusually, and unreasonably large in number, and that the foreman and powder man were negligent in attempting to explode same at one time.

(6) That the defendants were careless in failing to provide and use on said job reasonably safe explosives or safe and suitable fuses.

(7) That defendants were negligent in failing to provide said foreman and powder man with proper, usual, and reasonable tools and instruments with which to search and examine for unexploded powder.

(8) That defendants negligently failed to provide said foreman and powder man with proper, usual, and reasonable tools and instruments for cleaning out old drill holes and removing powder from unexploded charges or missed shots, and failed to provide any tools or instruments whatever for said purpose.

(9) That the construction company was at the time of entering into said contract a corporation organized under the laws of Missouri; that it was an insolvent and irresponsible corporation, and was not a fit, proper, or suitable corporation for the city to enter into said contract with; and that said defendant city was negligent and careless in entering into said contract with said construction company, in that said company was an insolvent, irresponsible company, and not a fit, proper, or suitable corporation for said work; and that the defendant city, at the time of entering into said contract, and throughout the performance of said work, had knowledge of the foregoing facts, or by the exercise of ordinary care would have had knowledge thereof.

(10) That said engineer had authority and power to cause the discharge of all incompetent, disorderly, and unfaithful servants engaged on said work, and was negligent in failing to cause the discharge of said foreman and powder man, and, further, in failing to cause the selection and employment of a qualified blaster,—one qualified under the terms of § 883 of said ordinance.

(11) That the defendants and each of them failed to use reasonable care to provide plaintiff with a reasonably safe place in which to work, and negligently failed to use reasonable care to keep said place of work reasonably safe.

It is further averred in said petition that explosives could be used for blasting in said sewer only by an expert; that such work required special ability, skill, and training; that said unexploded charge was not a risk necessarily incident to said employment; that it was a danger which "could have been obviated by the adoption of reasonable measures of precaution by the defendant; that the defendants negligently failed to take usual and reasonable measures of precaution to guard plaintiff against said danger;" that the risk was not necessarily liable to happen on account of the nature of the business, and was not naturally incident to said employment, where reasonable care was used by the superintending powers to avoid the danger of such unexploded charges; that unexploded shots of that character "are not usual or ordinary risks in sewer construction business in Kansas City or elsewhere, where reasonable care was used by the superintending powers to avoid such danger." It is further averred that said risk was created and continued by the negligence and carelessness of the defendants, and could have been obviated, removed, and avoided by the use of reasonable care on the part of defendants, which 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) care defendants negligently failed to use; that "it was through the immediate negligence and carelessness of said foreman, Kelleher, and said powder man, Moriarity, that said unexploded shot was left existing unexploded, unsearched for, and unremoved from said place."

It is apparent from reading the contract incorporated in the petition, and above abstracted, that the actual work of constructing the sewer was performed by the employees of the contracting company, which, under the contract, furnished the labor and material; so that wherever in the petition the plaintiff speaks of the defendants, including the city, it is not intended to be asserted that the city was in actual, physical charge of the details of the work, but that by operation of law the employees of the contracting company were the servants of the city; so that, in so far as the pleader charges negligence upon the city, it is a legal conclusion.

The above specifications of negligence charged against the city, with the exceptions of Nos. 3 and 9, may be grouped together for the purposes of this discussion. The liability of the city predicated upon them is made by the plaintiff to rest upon two propositions: (a) That the control and direction of the work reserved to the city by the terms of the contract negative the theory that the construction company was an independent contractor so far as concerns the acts of negligence alleged to have caused the injury to plaintiff, and made the city directly responsible, as master, for such negligence; (b) that owing to the dangerous nature of blasting, the defendant city was under obligation, as a matter of law, independent of the terms of the contract, to see to it that proper precautions were taken to protect plaintiff. This latter proposition is not clearly developed in the petition, but it has been fully argued by both sides; and as the petition could be amended, if necessary, it is in the case and should be disposed of.

I. The petition proceeds upon the theory that, under the contract between the city and the construction company, the city reserved the direction and control of the immediate acts which, because of their negligent performance, resulted in injury to plaintiff, and the city is therefore responsible for such acts.

As the material parts of the contract are set out in hæc verba in the petition, the court will look to the contract itself and construe it according to its terms, regardless of the construction placed upon it by the pleader. Following settled rules of construction, we consider the circumstances of its creation, the object sought to be accomplished, and the terms of the entire instrument. So considered, does a fair construction of this contract sustain the contention of plaintiff? Counsel for plaintiff asserts in his brief as his basic propositions the following: "The contractor was not independent as to blasting. As to blasting, the contractor was subservient, and was completely under the power of control of the defendant. As to blasting, the relationship of principal and agent subsisted between the city and the alleged contractor. The contractor was insolvent and incompetent, and had not qualified to do blasting, and had no person in his employ competent to do blasting. The defendant reserved and assumed absolute control over the blasting. Responsibility follows from the defendant's power of control over the blasting. Responsibility follows control."

Leaving the question of the alleged incompetency of the contractor for later discussion, we will consider the contract. It is in the usual form of contracts for municipal public works, specifying at length and in detail the work to be done and materials to be used; all material and labor to be furnished and paid for by the contractor, who is to be paid for a completed sewer a lump sum to be ascertained by the dimensions thereof. In order to secure a satisfactory job, the owner (Kansas City) reserves to its engineer large powers of supervision and control as to quality of material and the method or mode of construction. Obviously, however, these powers are reserved to protect the interests of the city, and not in the interest of the contractor or his servants, nor for their protection. Neither the contractor nor his servants would have ground for complaint should the city fail to exercise such power of supervision. The engineer assumed no duty to plaintiff by the terms of the contract. The plaintiff did not look to the city inspector to protect him from unexploded charges. His reliance was on the foreman employed by the contractor. The contract must be construed as a whole, not upon detached phrases which in themselves in a proper relation might be apt enough to sustain plaintiff's claim. Taken as a whole, it is plain enough that the powers given to the city engineer are solely for the purpose of securing compliance with the specifications provided in the contract. By no fair construction can the provision authorizing him to direct the mode of doing the work be held to mean that it is his duty to step in between the contractor and his servant, and direct the latter in the details of his operations. The provisions emphasized by the pleader, taken as a whole, and considered in connection with the entire instrument, cannot modify the view above expressed. Fairly construed, such provisions do not prevent the full application of the doctrine of independent contractor to the construction company. The right to require the discharge of incompetent workmen is a privilege retained by the city for its protection. This provision is inserted to enable the city to secure good work at the hands of competent workmen, not to protect employees against incompetent foremen. The city has no power to discharge directly an employee of the contractor. A contract of this character was construed in Blumb v. Kansas City, 84 Mo. 112, 54 Am. Rep. 87. In that case we said of a similar provision: "It did not give the engineer or the city the right to discharge them, and this permission had no reference to the manner of doing the work, but only to the workmanship, the character of the work, and the quality of the materials used." The nature of such supervision reserved by the owner is aptly defined by the supreme court of Michigan in Samuelson v. Cleveland Iron Min. Co. 49 Mich. 164, 43 Am. Rep. 456, 13 N. W. 499. In that case a mineowner let the operation of his mine to a contractor, who was to mine and deliver the ore to the owner at a specified price per ton. It would seem to have been conceded that the written contract created the relation of independent contractor. A miner employed by the contractor was injured by a falling roof, improperly supported. The employee sued the owner, and relied upon this clause in the contract: "The making of it [the mine] safe hereby devolving on said first parties [contractors] under the supervision, advice, and direction of said superintendent" (for the owner). The court said: "The owner assumes towards no one the duty to supervise; he does not stipulate to supervise; he only contracts for a privilege. If the mineowner in this case had dismissed the superintendent and sent no one to inspect the working, no miner could explain that a duty owing to him was being neglected." Further, it was said that the inspection by the owner was for the purpose of protecting his own property. In the same case it was said that, if the mine had been in an unsafe condition at the time it was handed over by the owner, he might have been liable on the theory that he invited others into unsafe premises without warning of the danger.

In the case at bar the contract does not authorize the city to give direct orders to the workmen. The city does not hire them nor pay them. The liability of the master for the negligence of his servant arises from the fact that he selects the servant with a view to his skill, and is therefore responsible for such selection. There is no such basis here for imputing responsibility to the city.

In the case of Carman v. Steubenville & I. R. Co. 4 Ohio St. 399 (cited by plaintiff), discussing whether the owner or contractor is liable, the court suggests this distinction: "In the one case the principal [owner] selects the servant or agent with a view to his skill and care, and not only retains the control over all his operations, but also has the power to dismiss him at any time for misconduct. In the other, the contractor assumes this position, leaving the employer no control over the work or the persons by whom it is executed, but simply the right to require the thing produced, or the result attained to be such as the contract has provided for."

A contract similar in general character to the one before us, but in some respects giving greater power to the engineer, was construed in Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk, 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32. The petition sought to hold the borough liable for injuries resulting from negligent blasting in the construction of a sewer at the hands of a contractor. It was contended there, as it is here, that in regard to the blasting the contractor was not independent, and that by the reservation of control in the contract the borough assumed the responsibility for the acts complained of, namely, the manner of blasting. The contract provided that certain rock should be excavated "with as little blasting as possible, and under the immediate supervision and direction of the engineer [for the borough] or his assistant" (italics ours); that "if any person employed by the contractor on the work shall appear to the engineer to be incompetent or disorderly, he shall be discharged immediately on the requisition of the engineer." Commenting on this contract, the court says: "But on the whole we are inclined to think that the weight of authority upon this question justifies us in holding that the reservations of control, being but partial, and existing in certain respects only, did not prevent the existence of the relation of contractee and independent contractor; but the general control over the work, as to the manner and method of its execution, the oversight and direction of the performance of the actual manual labor, especially in the particulars in the execution of which the plaintiff claimed that the injury to its property was caused, notwithstanding the prescribed limitations, remained in the contractor; that the persons doing the work were his servants, not those of the defendant; and that these considerations relating to general control constitute the true test by which to determine whether the relation be that of employer and contractor, or that of master and servant."

There is no claim in the petition in the case before us that the city, through its inspectors, in fact directed the acts which it is alleged caused the injury to plaintiff.

In Foster v. Chicago, 197 Ill. 264, 64 N. E. 322, it was insisted that the city was liable for an injury received by a servant of the contractor engaged in excavating for a sewer, and due to improperly protecting the walls, on the ground that under the contract the city "remained in a position of control." The contract is not set out in terms in the report of the case, but enough appears to show the relation of what was said by the court to the question under discussion. The language of the court is so apt in this regard that we quote it at some length: "It is true that the contractor agreed to perform all the work 'under the immediate direction and superintendence of the commissioner of public works, and to his entire satisfaction, approval, and acceptance;' but the work he agrees so to perform is that prescribed in the contract, and it is evident, we think, that this direction and superintendence relate to results,—to the character of the workmanship,—and not to methods, unless by the use of improper methods the character of the workmanship was rendered unsatisfactory. . . . The contract does not include the direction, management, and control by the city of every detail of the work. The contractor was not required to take his orders, day by day, from the city. He was to be guided by the contract and the specifications constituting a part thereof. He was not a mere servant and employee. He was an independent contractor; the city retaining such supervisory power as it might, from time to time, find it necessary to exercise to insure compliance with the contract and to obtain the result called for thereby. The contractor employed and paid his own laborers. The deceased was his employee. The difference between an independent contractor and a mere servant is not determined solely by the retention of a certain kind or degree of supervision by the employer. It is to be determined by the contract as a whole,—by its spirit and essence,—and not by the phraseology of a single sentence or paragraph. Being a contractor, and not a mere servant of the city, the latter cannot be held liable for his negligence in the performance of his work. . . . This is not a case where a party, when passing along or using a public street, has been injured because of the negligence of the city in permitting or causing a sewer to be constructed or other work to be carried on in such street, creating a danger to passersby, for which proper safeguards have been negligently omitted. In Springfield v. La Claire, 49 Ill. 476, cited by the appellant's counsel, the question was whether there was a duty resting upon the city growing out of the franchise conferred upon it to keep its public streets in a safe condition for the passage of travelers and others having occasion to use them, and the question was properly answered in the affirmative. But the deceased in the case before us was not a passenger or a traveler over the street when injured, and there is no analogy between the case so cited, or others of like character referred to by appellant's attorneys, and the circumstances of the case at bar."

We rule against the plaintiff on the proposition that the contract reserved to the city the control of the acts complained of.

II. It is urged that, even if the city is not liable by contract, it is still liable because of its failure to perform a duty to plaintiff imposed upon it by law; that blasting is so intrinsically dangerous that it becomes the duty of the city, when it authorizes its use in public work, to guard third persons, including the servants of an independent contractor engaged in the work, from the incidental danger. The industry of counsel for plaintiff in error has brought to our attention numerous cases, as well as conclusions of text-writers, recognizing that the law imposes upon municipalities and owners of property certain obligations toward others which cannot be escaped by interposing an independent contractor as the active doer of the things complained of. Owners have been held liable to servants of a contractor for hidden intrinsic dangers lurking in premises upon which others are invited, without warning, to work. Clark v. St. Louis & S. R. Co. 234 Mo. 396, 137 S. W. 583; Young v. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. 185 Mo. 634, 84 S. W. 929; Ryan v. St. Louis Transit Co. 190 Mo. 621, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 777, 89 S. W. 865; Calvert v. Springfield Electric Light & P. Co. 231 Ill. 290, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 782, 83 N. E. 184, 12 Ann. Cas. 423. Also private owners, and municipalities as well, have been held liable for the consequences of acts which they have authorized and which are intrinsically dangerous to others, no matter how carefully performed, where the danger arises from the act itself, and not from the manner in which it is done. We have to do with the proposition last stated, and particularly as applied to the liability of a municipality authorizing blasting in a public street by an independent contractor. The liability of the municipality and that of a private owner rest upon the same fundamental proposition, namely, that one must not authorize acts upon his property which in themselves constitute a nuisance or a menace to the lives or property of others; and it is no defense to show that the performance of the inhibited act is delegated to an independent contractor. The city is also under obligation to keep its streets safe for travel.

It is said that blasting is intrinsically dangerous, and that therefore the city is liable for injury resulting therefrom. The doctrine as laid down in this regard by the authorities is that the city cannot escape whatever duty arises from the use of this dangerous agency by delegating the act to an independent contractor. As to the extent of the duty imposed upon the city, the authorities are not uniform. It has been held that this duty is to use due care only to prevent injury. Booth v. Rome, W. & O. Terminal R. Co. 140 N. Y. 267, 24 L.R.A. 105, 37 Am. St. Rep. 552, 35 N. E. 592. It has also been held that in some instances, where blasting is done in the street, the city is liable in any event, and cannot defeat a recovery by showing due care. We are not called upon to lay down an exact rule on this point, because whatever duty the city owes it owes to the public, and not to the servants of the contractor. This is not a case of imperfect appliances furnished by the city, nor one of inviting persons into premises unsafe at the time of the invitation. It is a case where liability is claimed because of the intrinsic danger attending the use of explosives. No text-writer and no case cited extends the protection of this doctrine to an employee of the independent contractor. We have examined the numerous cases cited by plaintiff to support the proposition that blasting is so intrinsically dangerous that, when the city authorizes its use by an independent contractor, it becomes liable for resulting injury. We may concede that these cases properly declare the law without approaching the question involved in the case before us. All of the cases relied upon deal with injuries inflicted upon persons disconnected from the work, as, for instance, passers-by on the street or adjacent property owners, and where the injury results from the violent explosion of rock or earth incident to a blast. No man can tell where a rock hurled into the air without direction will fall, and therefore danger to persons and property in the vicinity to be anticipated, and so far as possible to be guarded against.

The doctrine of the cases referred to has no reference to a servant of the contractor engaged in blasting; certainly not when, as here, the injury to the servant results from the sheer negligence of the contractor or his foreman in failing to protect the laborer in work which in itself is not inherently dangerous. The drilling of a hole for a charge of dynamite is certainly not an inherently dangerous task. The negligence of the foreman, which it is charged was the immediate cause of the injury, was not the natural and obvious result of blasting; so that, even if the doctrine of cases involving the rights of outsiders be extended to the servant of the contractor, the servant in this case would not come within the rule. It cannot be said that because the city is liable to adjacent persons and property, when it authorizes the use of an inherently dangerous agency (which is the doctrine of the cases relied on), therefore any employee engaged in the quarry may hold the city for any negligence of the contractor or his foreman. Counsel confuses the case of the servant of the contractor, who is injured by reason of the negligent manner in which the blasting is done, with the case of a third person on the street who is injured by the blast itself, without reference to the manner in which the blast is set free. In the latter case the injury results from violent expulsion upon the street and adjacent property of rock and earth authorized by the city. This expulsion of rock and earth occurs in the proper execution of the work. The plaintiff was not injured in the proper execution of the work, but solely by reason of the negligent manner in which it was performed, i. e., the negligent failure to detect the unexploded charge. It does not appear that the plaintiff was in any danger from the proper explosion of a blast. Indeed, such danger is expressly negatived in the petition, which avers that the danger was not a necessary one, nor incident to the work in which plaintiff was engaged.

In Missouri Valley Bridge & Iron Co. v. Ballard, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 110, 116 S. W. 93 (a case in point upon the facts), the servant of the independent contractor sued the owner. The court, after stating the general doctrine of liability of the owner to the public, says: "The exception within which the verdict of the jury has brought this case finds its best illustration in those cases where public streets have been made dangerous by excavations or otherwise, and where in the nature of things the safety of the traveling public has been endangered, unless needed precautions have been taken to prevent it. In such a case, as has been often said, the injuries are the direct result of the very thing which the employer authorized to be done; and he cannot, therefore, escape liability by farming out the work to an independent contractor. It is in the nature of a nondelegable duty, owing to those whose life or limb is thus jeopardized. But where, as here, the injury is the result of an act or fault purely collateral to the work to be done, and is the result entirely of the wrongful act of the independent contractor or his workmen, the employer should not be held liable."

If the owner directs the contractor to perform an act which is dangerous to others, even if carefully performed, he is liable to others for the consequences. In such case the injury results not from the mode in which the act is done, but from the doing of the act by the most careful mode. The danger is incident to the act itself. Hence the owner is responsible for the consequences of the act. On this principle rest the numerous decisions in cases where blasting throws rocks which cause damage. As was said by the supreme court of Arkansas in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Yonley, 53 Ark. loc. cit. 508, 9 L.R.A. 604, 13 S. W. 333, 14 S. W. 801: "If one employs another to perform a work which from its nature is necessarily dangerous to the property of a third person, the employer cannot escape liability for the injury thereby done. In such cases the injury flows from the doing of the act as its natural consequence, and not from the manner in which the act is done." But aside from the differential facts above referred to, the doctrine of liability of the city to outsiders, supported by plaintiff's cases, is not extended by either reason or authority to include the servant of the contractor. If the foreman himself had been injured by his own negligence averred in the petition, it would hardly be claimed that the city would be liable; yet the doctrine for which plaintiff contends would protect the foreman, or even the contractor himself, from the consequences of his own negligence. It would be a strange anomaly in jurisprudence were we to hold that an employer is liable to the servant of an independent contractor because of the negligence of the contractor or his foreman in the performance of some casual act in the course of the work. The owner owes no legal duty to such servant to protect him from the negligence of his foreman. There is no parallel between the relation of the city to plaintiff and its relation to the public and adjoining owners. In the case of Loth v. Columbia Theatre Co. 197 Mo. 354, 94 S. W. 854, we refused to apply the doctrine of independent contractor where a passer-by was injured by the lowering of a large sign; but we said: "The injury in the case at bar resulted directly from the acts called for and made necessary by the contract, that is, the changing and replacing of the sign, and not from acts which were merely collateral to the contract; and if by the negligence and carelessness of the men handling the sign it fell upon and injured plaintiff, the company is liable as if it had directly performed such acts." But supposing the sign, through careless handling, had injured one of the workmen engaged in the work, would it be claimed that the owner was liable?

The true rule of liability is thus stated by Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, (§ 1723, vol. 4): "Where the work contracted for necessarily constitutes an obstruction or defect in the street, of such a nature as to render it unsafe or dangerous for the purposes of public travel, unless properly guarded or protected, the employer (equally with the contractor), where the injury results directly from the acts which the contractor engaged to perform, is liable therefor to the injured party. But the employer is not liable where the obstruction or defect in the street causing the injury is wholly collateral to the contract work, and entirely the result of the negligence or wrongful acts of the contractor, subcontractor, or his servants. In such a case the immediate author of the injury is alone liable."

The authorities cited by plaintiff are in line with the statement of the law. In Schip v. Pabst Brewing Co. 64 Minn. 22, 66 N. W. 3, a servant of the contractor sued the owner for injuries. He offered to prove that the contractor was incompetent and known to be so by the owner, and also that the building being removed was in a dangerous condition. These offers were rejected by the trial court. On appeal, the supreme court says: "For the purposes of the case we will assume that plaintiff could have proved these offers, and was entitled to do so, if it would result in proving a cause of action against defendant. Counsel for appellant have cited no case which has held the owner liable to the servant of the contractor under such circumstances. There are many cases which hold that the owner of premises cannot, by employing a contractor, relieve himself from the continuing duty which he owes to the public and to the adjoining owners not to maintain a nuisance on his premises, or license anyone else to do so. But we can find no case which holds that the owner owes any such continuing duty to the servant of the independent contractor engaged in the very work of abating the nuisance." See also latter paragraph of citation from Foster v. Chicago, 197 Ill. 264, 64 N. E. 322, where it was held that the servant of the contractor could not recover from the owner. In Peoria, B. & C. Traction Co. v. O'Connor, 149 Ill. App. 598, a laborer employed by the contractor for a street railway company sued the railroad company for injuries received on account of a defective derrick rope used in hoisting an iron pole on the street. The court, after stating the rule that protects persons using the streets, said: "If appellee had been injured while using such public street or ground as a passer-by thereon, appellant could not have relieved itself of liability for its negligence in creating such condition, merely because the construction company had failed to do its duty. Appellee when injured was not in the exercise of his right as a citizen to use the public street. There was no causal connection between the negligence and the accident, and the particular place where the same occurred. We are therefore of opinion that the rule in question is inapplicable in the present case." To the same effect, see Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 134 Ky. loc. cit. 60, 119 S. W. 244, where, under similar circumstances, the court said: "Of course, a very different question would be presented if by reason of the prosecution of this work a train had been derailed, and a passenger injured; for in such case the duty of the company to furnish the passenger with safe passage is such that it could not excuse itself for any negligent act on the part of an independent contractor or that in any wise impaired the safety of its track; but no such question as that is presented here. No such relation existed between deceased and the railroad company. The railroad company was under no duty to deceased, since the relation of master and servant did not exist between them. The duty which it owed to the traveling public to maintain its track in a safe condition for the passage of its trains did not in the least obligate it to look out for the safety of deceased who was an employee of an independent contractor engaged in a separate and distinct undertaking." Like rulings are found in Reilly v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 122 Iowa, 525, 98 N. W. 464; Engler v. Seattle, 40 Wash. 72, 82 Pac. 136; Hanna v. Chattanooga & N. R. Co. 88 Tenn. 310, 6 L.R.A. 727, 12 S. W. 718. The cases of Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Steinbrock, 61 Ohio St. 215, 76 Am. St. Rep. 375, 55 N. E. 618, and Wetherbee v. Partridge, 175 Mass. 185, 78 Am. St. Rep. 486, 55 N. E. 894, on which plaintiff strongly relies, are not in point, as they involve injuries to outsiders or adjacent property. These and other cases hold to the doctrine of Dillon v. Hunt, 105 Mo. 161, 24 Am. St. Rep. 374, 16 S. W. 516. Scott v. Springfield, 81 Mo. App. 312, held the city liable for injuries to the servant of a contractor, but on the ground that the city retained the actual control, and that hence the contractor was not independent. And so it is with other cases holding the employer liable. These cases are not in point, in view of the construction which we have given above to the contract under consideration.

From the foregoing reasoning and authorities, it is clear that, even conceding that blasting is intrinsically dangerous, there would be no liability in this case, as a matter of law, on the part of the city to plaintiff for injuries caused by the negligence of the contractor's foreman.

III. It is claimed that the petition avers that the contractor was incompetent, and known to the city to be so. The charge in the petition falls short of this. Here it is: "That said Robert J. Boyd Paving & Construction Company was at the time of entering into said contract and still is a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of Missouri; that it was an insolvent and irresponsible corporation, and was not a fit, proper, or suitable corporation for the city to enter into said contract with, and that defendant city was negligent and careless in entering into said contract with said Robert J. Boyd Paving & Construction Company, in that said company was an insolvent, irresponsible company, and not a fit, proper, or suitable corporation for said work; and that the defendant city at the time of entering into said contract, and throughout the performance of said work, had knowledge of the foregoing facts, or by the exercise of ordinary care would have had knowledge thereof."

The unfitness alleged must be referred to the alleged insolvency. Furthermore, for reasons given above, a charge of incompetency would not help plaintiff. The city owes no duty to the servant of the contractor to provide him a competent and skillful employer. In Schip v. Pabst Brewing Co. supra, the court (64 Minn. loc. cit. 25, 66 N. W. 4) said: "Neither has our attention been called to any case where the owner was held liable on the sole ground of failing to exercise with due care a temporary duty of employing a competent contractor (after which his responsibility would cease), but in every case there was a continuing duty not to maintain a nuisance on his premises himself, or license others to do so. It is often laid down as one of the conditions required to relieve the owner from liability, that he shall employ a competent contractor. But this language (where it is not mere dictum) is always used in cases where the owner owes such continuing duty, and the work to be performed by the contractor will necessarily result in a nuisance to the public or the adjoining owner, unless great or extraordinary care is taken to prevent it from doing so."

The following cases are cited by plaintiff on this point: Brannock v. Elmore, 114 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mo. 55, 21 S. W. 451; Dillon v. Hunt, 82 Mo. 155; Mullich v. Bocker, 119 Mo. App. 332, 97 S. W. 549. But these cases refer to the obligation which the owner owes to outsiders. No case has been cited, or found by us after extensive research, which extends this obligation to a servant of the independent contractor.

IV. The pleader attempts to predicate liability against the city because of the alleged violation of § 883 of the ordinance, requiring a license to qualify one to do blasting. On this point it is sufficient to say that the law is settled in this state that a city is not liable for failure to enforce its ordinances. Ryan v. Kansas City, 232 Mo. 471, 134 S. W. 566, 985; Loth v. Columbia Theatre Co. 197 Mo. 328, 94 S. W. 847.

Tested by the foregoing reasons and authorities, the petition fails to state a case against the defendant city.

The demurrer having properly been sustained, the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Bond, C.:

Plaintiff sues Kansas City (a municipal corporation) and the Robert J. Boyd Paving & Construction Company (a business corporation) to recover for personal damages sustained by the belated explosion of a stick of dynamite, employed in blasting rock to make a course for a sewer in process of construction under a contract between the defendants.

The gist of the allegations of plaintiff's petition is, to wit: That the defendant city exists and is governed under a special charter, whereby it is empowered to enact ordinances for causing and regulating sewer construction, in pursuance of which it has employed a large number of sewer inspectors. That it is required by its ordinance to employ, and has employed, a city engineer, skilled in the science of engineering, and assistants. That its engineering department supervises the construction of public and district sewers. That its city engineer is required to prepare plans, specifications, and estimates of the costs of all public work, and report all violations of any contract for the doing of such work, and to superintend the execution thereof. That no person is allowed to do any blasting within said city without first obtaining from the city engineer a permit therefor, issuable only on the condition that he is satisfied that the applicant is "in every particular a safe, careful, and suitable person to use, and an expert in the use of, all explosives used in blasting," and has entered into a bond conditioned that such person will carefully and prudently use such explosive. That said city passed an ordinance for the construction of a "district sewer in sewer district No. 144, approved March 29, 1901," and entered into a contract with its codefendant for constructing a sewer in said district. That said contract, among other things, provided that the work done thereunder should be "in conformity with the plans of such work on file in the office of the city engineer in Kansas City, and in strict obedience to the directions which may, from time to time, be given by said city engineer or his authorized agents, and also in accordance with the following specifications: "The contractor shall not blast any rock or allow the same to be done on this work without taking such precautions, by covering or otherwise, as shall prevent damage or injury to person or property." That in pursuance of the aforesaid contract, the defendants and each of them employed a gang of men, of which plaintiff was a member, who were under the immediate superintendence, direction, and control of a foreman, "who was a vice principal of defendants, with power to direct them in the performance of their duties." That plaintiff was a member of a gang of drillers under said foreman, and that it was the duty of the plaintiff and the members of his gang by the use of steel drills, about 6 feet and 4 inches long and having bits $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches in diameter, to drill holes in the rock through which said sewer was to be constructed, and "that the drilling of said holes under the direction of said foreman was the sole duty of the plaintiff and the members of the drilling gang." That the work performed by them consisted of drilling "a series of holes about 2½ feet deep and about 2 feet apart," after which the said foreman and powder man (under his immediate direction and control) "would load said holes with giant powder or dynamite, putting about 2½ sticks of said explosive in each hole, then putting on the cap and fuse for each hole, then tamp each hole full with sand and dirt, and leaving the fuses extending out of each hole, and then said foreman would light said fuses and shoot said series of holes." That it was usual and customary to count the number of said holes before exploding them, and then to keep count of the number of explosions as they took place so that it could be known whether any had failed to occur. That the count of the noises of the respective explosions was then verified by an examination of the respective holes which had been loaded with dynamite. That the plaintiff and the members of his gang had nothing to do with the loading and exploding of said holes, nor of the subsequent examinations of the place, nor with the cleaning out of unexploded powder. That these duties were performed by said foreman and said powder man, who were required, after finding from examination that it was safe so to do, to employ a different gang of men to clean up the broken rock caused by said series of explosions. After that was done, "the plaintiff and his gang of drillers would be ordered to drill another series, and this process would be repeated until the excavation was made as deep as desired."

The petition then alleges, to wit: That on the afternoon of July 13, 1901, a series of holes which had been drilled by the plaintiff and his gang of drillers was attempted to be exploded by said foreman (Kelleher) and said powder man (Moriarity). That said July 13th was Saturday, and no work was done in said sewer on the Sunday following. That Saturday and Monday the broken rock caused by the explosion of Saturday was cleaned up by the other set of men under said foreman (Kelleher), with which other set of men plaintiff had nothing to do. That by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the defendants, through said foreman (Kelleher) and said powder man (Moriarity), one of the loaded holes in said series of holes, which said foreman and said powder man had not caused to explode on Saturday, was left filled with dynamite. That the existence of said loaded and unexploded hole was unknown to plaintiff and the gang of drillers with whom plaintiff was working. That the existence of said unexploded hole and the danger thereof to the plaintiff was known to defendants, or would have been known to them and each of them by the exercise of ordinary care on their part, prior to the time of the injury to the plaintiff herein alleged. That on Monday, the 15th day of July, 1901, the defendant contractor and the defendant city, through their foreman (Kelleher), negligently ordered plaintiff and his gang of drillers to go back to the place where said series of holes had been attempted to be exploded on the Saturday previous, for the purpose of drilling another series of holes at said place. That in pursuance of said negligent order said plaintiff and the other drillers in his said gang of drillers went back to said place for the purpose of drilling a new series of holes. And that while one of said gang of drillers was at work drilling a hole near the place where plaintiff was also drilling, his work caused the dynamite which had been negligently left in one of the holes since the Saturday previous to be exploded with great force and violence and to the injury of plaintiff in the following manner: "The total and permanent loss of the sight of both of his eyes, great injury to body, his private parts, his chest, face, forehead, a broken jaw, causing long illness and suffering and mental anguish, and the permanent inability thereafter to do any work, so that he has become an object of charity and an inmate of the poor farm." The petition then adds: "That at the time said other driller was at work near the plaintiff, neither he nor the plaintiff had any knowledge or warning whatsoever of the existence of said unexploded shot or charge at said place; that said unexploded shot or charge constituted a latent danger in plaintiff's said place of work; that said latent danger was known or would have been known by reasonable care, to the defendants and each of them, as well as to their said powder man and their said foreman, and to the inspectors of the defendant city, who were present on said work throughout the construction of said sewer, superintending said work and giving orders to the foreman and men at work thereon, in time to have enabled said defendants and their said foreman, powder man, and inspectors to have removed said unexploded dynamite, and to have warned the plaintiff of the existence thereof; that the defendants and their foreman, powder man, and inspectors negligently and carelessly failed to remove said danger, and negligently and carelessly failed to warn the plaintiff of the existence thereof, but through their foreman negligently and carelessly ordered said plaintiff and his gang of drillers to go to said place and drill a new series of holes at said place where said unexploded charge of dynamite, a highly explosive powder, had been left."

The petition charges: That said foreman (Michael Kelleher) and said powder man (Maurice Moriarity) "were not safe, careful, or suitable persons to use said explosive, and were neither of them experts in the use of said explosive." That neither of them "were competent persons for said work of blasting; that the defendants and each of them were negligent in intrusting said work to said foreman and said powder man," whose incompetency and lack of expertness in the use of said explosive were known to each of the defendants; that the defendants and each of them negligently failed to select and employ on said sewer construction a blaster who was qualified for the work under the provisions of ordinance No. 883, requiring all such persons to make proof of competency and procure a license before doing any blasting within said city, which ordinance, and every other ordinance pertaining to the work of constructing the sewer, the contract expressly stipulated should be complied with in the doing and progress of the work; that this covenant of the contract was negligently violated by both the defendants; that the work in respect to which said carelessness occurred and which caused plaintiff's injury was the work of blasting with giant powder or dynamite; that both defendants knew the necessity of said blasting and the necessity to use that dangerous explosive in removing the 2,450 cubic yards of rock excavation provided for in their contract; that both defendants knew the incompetency and unfitness of their said foreman and powder man, by reason of which the unexploded stick of dynamite was left in the rock at the place where plaintiff was negligently ordered by them to drill a new series of holes, without any warning or knowledge whatsoever of the proximity of his work to the unexploded stick of dynamite. The petition then specifically charges that the defendants knew that said powder man, "by reason of his age and infirmities and general deficiencies, was utterly incompetent to be the powder man on said job;" that through the negligence of this incompetent powder man and incompetent foreman the missed shot of dynamite was not discovered and removed, and plaintiff was ordered to work at a place dangerously near thereto, without any knowledge or information whatever of the existence of his peril. The petition also charges that the codefendant of the city was an insolvent corporation; "and was not a fit, proper, or suitable corporation for the city to enter into said contract with," and that the city was negligent in making said contract, for it knew, or by reasonable care could have known, these facts; that neither the construction company nor its foreman nor blaster had any license or permit, as required by the city ordinance, to do blasting on said work; and that the defendant city and its codefendant negligently and carelessly violated their contract, requiring that such license should be procured before the work was done.

The contract set out in the petition empowered the engineer to direct the "mode" of doing the work, and provided that if any person "refused or neglected" to obey his instructions, or appeared to him to be incompetent, that such person should "be at once discharged;" that the engineer should have power to annul the contract for good cause, and his decision should be conclusive of the existence of such cause on all litigation between the parties, and should preclude any damages therefor. The petition also pleaded that the legal effect of the contract vested the defendant city with full control and direction as to the manner of doing the work, the materials to be used, and the result to be accomplished in its entire performance. To this petition the defendant city interposed a general demurrer, which was sustained. Plaintiff voluntarily dismissed as to the defendant construction company, and appealed from the order sustaining the demurrer and dismissing his petition.

I. In considering this appeal it must be constantly borne in mind: That Kansas City is a municipal corporation, and, as such, possesses a double capacity,—the one public or governmental, the other private or contracting. That in the exercise of its first function it can incur no civil liability to any person. That in the exercise of its second faculty it is suable by any aggrieved person, and is subject to the same control which the courts exert over all persons. That in the work of constructing sewers, whether directly or by letting to contract, Kansas City acts only within its business powers, and for its contracts and torts in the prosecution of that work is open to suit in the same manner and to the same extent as a private person doing or causing to be done the same work. Donahoe v. Kansas City, 136 Mo. 665, 38 S. W. 571; Dolan v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 145 Mo. 550, 46 S. W. 1133; Ely v. St. Louis, 181 Mo. 723, 81 S. W. 168; State ex rel. Abel v. Gates, 190 Mo. loc. cit. 550, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 152, 89 S. W. 881; Barree v. Cape Girardeau, 197 Mo. loc. cit. 389, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1090, 114 Am. St. Rep. 763, 95 S. W. 330; Broadwell v. Kansas, 75 Mo. 213, 42 Am. Rep. 406; Werth v. Springfield, 78 Mo. 107; Wegmann v. Jefferson, 61 Mo. 55; Thurston v. St. Joseph, 51 Mo. 510, 11 Am. Rep. 463. That the defendant city, like every municipal corporation, is under a primal duty, which it cannot delegate, to keep its streets and sidewalks in a condition of reasonable safety for the use of persons acting with ordinary care. Ryan v. Kansas City, 232 Mo. 471, 134 S. W. 566, 985; Russell v. Columbia, 74 Mo. 480, 41 Am. Rep. 325; Welch v. St. Louis, 73 Mo. 71.

II. Plaintiff's petition must be reviewed under the rule prescribed for that purpose by statute, to wit: "In the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties." Rev. Stat. 1909, § 1831. Now, the petition in this case is met by a general demurrer only. This form of attack does not reach any indefiniteness or imperfection of statement less than at total omission of all allegations from which any cause of action may be fairly implied or inferred. Rodgers v. Western Home Town Mut. F. Ins. Co. 186 Mo. loc. cit. 255, 256, 85 S. W. 369; Eads v. Gains, 58 Mo. App. loc. cit. 594; State ex rel. Williams v. Carroll, 63 Mo. 156; Marie v. Garrison, 83 N. Y. 14-23.

The only defense urged by the defendant in this case is that the allegations of the petition demonstrate that the contract between it and the contracting company created the relation of owner or proprietor and independent contractor, and hence that it is not responsible in damages, either to the public at large or the servants of the contractor, for any injury caused by the wrongful or negligent conduct of the contractor or its representatives in the performance of the work. In order to maintain this defense, the defendant city must show, from the allegations of the petition, that relation was legally created. There are cases in which it is held that the owner or proprietor may be sued by his own servants for the tortious acts and negligences of the independent contractor or his representatives. Herdler v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. 136 Mo. loc. cit. 16, 37 S. W. 115; Burnes v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 129 Mo. loc. cit. 56, 31 S. W. 347; Leslie v. Rich Hill Coal Min. Co. 110 Mo. 31, 19 S. W. 308; Sackewitz v. American Biscuit Mfg. Co. 78 Mo. App. loc. cit. 153; Bartley v. Trorlicht, 49 Mo. App. 231-233; Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590; The Magdaline (D. C.) 91 Fed. 798; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Eaton, 194 Ill. 441, 88 Am. St. Rep. 161, 62 N. E. 784. As the plaintiff in this case was not ostensibly the servant of the city, his right to recover, like that of any innocent passerby, who might have been injured in the same way, must depend upon the legal relationship of the city and the contracting company, as it is disclosed by the facts stated in the petition.

This reduces the matter to a single issue of law, based upon the fair legal intendment of the facts pleaded: Does the transaction between the parties show as a necessary legal conclusion that the construction company became an "independent contractor" as that status is defined by law?

If one person is set to work upon the property of another, he must act in one of two capacities: First, as the servant or agent of the owner, who is therefore responsible for his acts in the course of his employment; or, second, as an independent contractor, by virtue of a contract sufficient in law to create that relation, in which case his torts and negligences cannot be imputed to the owner by its servants or the public. There is no middle position which can be occupied by one person who is in possession and at work on the property of another by the owner's consent or permission. He must be there either on behalf of the owner, or on his own behalf under a valid contract to that effect; for he could only be on the premises otherwise by a trespass, and that is neither claimed nor could it be claimed under the case made in this petition. Now, the law has distinctly and positively adjudged the elements necessary to the formation of a contract whereby one becomes an independent workman on the property of another. It follows that any agreement with the owner which lacks any element necessary to make the workman an independent contractor leaves him occupying the only other condition which has been shown to remain, that of representative, agent, or servant of the owner. The legal formula of a contract adequate to create the relation of independent contractor between a workman and the owner of the property has been crystalized into certain and positive requirements which have been again and again quoted in exact language and adopted by the appellate courts of this state in an unvarying current of authority. It is thus expressed: "The general rule is that one who has contracted with a competent and fit person, exercising an independent employment, to do a piece of work, not in itself unlawfully or attended with danger to others, according to the contractor's own methods and without being subject to control, except as to the results of his work, will not be answerable for the wrongs of such contractor, his subcontractors, or his servants, committed in the prosecution of such work. An independent contractor . . . is one who renders service in the course of an occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished." 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 899, § 22; Gayle v. Missouri Car Foundry Co. 177 Mo. loc. cit. 446, 76 S. W. 987; Fink v. Missouri Furnace Co. 82 Mo. 276, 52 Am. Rep. 376; Hilsdorf v. St. Louis, 45 Mo. 98, 100 Am. Dec. 352; Long v. Moon, 107 Mo. 334, 17 S. W. 810; Crenshaw v. Ullman, 113 Mo. loc. cit. 639, 20 S. W. 1077; Lancaster v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 92 Mo. 460, 1 Am. St. Rep. 739, 5 S. W. 23; Dillon v. Hunt, 82 Mo. 150; Loth v. Columbia Theatre Co. 197 Mo. loc. cit. 354, 94 S. W. 847; Mullich v. Bocker, 119 Mo. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

App. loc. cit. 337, 97 S. W. 549; Wharton, Neg. § 181; Brannock v. Elmore, 114 Mo. loc. cit. 62, 21 S. W. 451; McGrath v. St. Louis & H. Constr. Co. 215 Mo. loc. cit. 209, 114 S. W. 611.

To obtain the shield of an independent contractor, the owner or proprietor must: First, select "a competent and fit person," engaged in an independent calling; second, the work committed to him must be neither "attended with danger to others" nor unlawful; third, the contractor must be allowed to do the work according to his own methods and only subject to control by the owner "as to the results of his work." Without the concurrence of each and all of these conditions, the condition of independent contractor cannot legally exist. The decisions in this state have not only affirmed this doctrine by the adoption of the foregoing definition, but they have held, on the various occasions when it became necessary to consider the effect of the absence of any one of these legal requirements, that the relationship of owner and independent contractor was thereby prevented, and that the owner was left responsible just as if he did the work on his own behalf. As far as necessary we will cite these instances seriatim.

First. As to the necessity of contracting with "a competent and fit person." The case was thus: The defendant was excavating his lot for the purpose of erecting a house thereon. The excavators were independent contractors. Plaintiff was injured by a fragment of a rock thrown into the air by the blasting made by the excavators contrary to the safeguards of a city ordinance. The court held that the ordinance in question was a wise and valid regulation, and made for the protection of persons and property from injury, and had it been observed the injury to plaintiff "would not probably have occurred;" that the evidence showed that the owner was acquainted with the careless methods of blasting adopted by the contractors; and that this would entitle the plaintiff to recover. Adding: "An employer cannot relieve himself from liability by giving the contract to one who is known to be incompetent or negligent,"—citing cases. Brannock v. Elmore, 114 Mo. loc. cit. 62, 21 S. W. 453. Again, plaintiff's two-year-old child fell into a vault left uncovered by an independent contractor in construction work on the owner's premises. The court held under these facts that there could be no recovery solely for the following reasons: "It is not alleged, and there is no evidence tending to prove, that the contractor was not a competent person to do the work. The work was not in itself of a dangerous character, did not necessarily create a nuisance nor involve a trespass upon the property of others, and the defendant did not interfere in the direction of its performance. In such case the defendant [the owner] cannot be held liable for the negligence of the contractor, and the action of the court might well be sustained on this ground." Wiese v. Remme, 140 Mo. loc. cit. 298, 299, 41 S. W. 799. In a recent case, speaking of the effect of failure on the part of the owner to select a fit and competent person, this court, after showing that the work complained of was not dangerous, but was caused by the mere "negligence" of an independent contractor or his servants in the execution of it, added: "In the latter case the contractor alone is liable unless the owner is in default in employing an unskilful or improper person as contractor." McGrath v. St. Louis, 215 Mo. loc. cit. 209, 114 S. W. 617. The court, accordingly, held in that case that, there being nothing dangerous in the character of the work to render the owner liable, and the injury having been caused by the mere negligence of a competent and fit contractor, the defendant city was not liable to the plaintiff for damages so received. This question was also ruled in the St. Louis court of appeals. There the injury complained of resulted from damage to plaintiff's property from being run into by a horse which had been delivered by the defendant for the purpose of having it broken to harness. The question arose whether the party undertaking to do this was an independent contractor. After defining what was necessary to constitute him as such, and advertising to the evidence tending to show that he lacked competency for that employment, the court said: "But a proprietor will not be exonerated from liability for negligence in the doing of work which he lets out to an independent contractor, unless he used care to select a competent person as contractor,—one who not only had an occupation, but reasonable skill in performing the tasks pertaining to it. If a person intrusts the performance of work, of a kind likely to result in harm to third persons unless cautiously and skilfully done, to a manifestly unfit person, as an independent contractor, the employer will be responsible for the consequence of such contractor's incompetency. Breaking horses to harness is not necessarily dangerous to others, if properly done; and in selecting a contractor to do work of that character, a proprietor need only use ordinary care to choose a competent person. But if he is careless in selecting, he remains liable. [Citing cases.] It follows that if Bocker carelessly selected an incompetent person to break the horse, he was liable for an injury resulting from his contractor's negligence." Mullich v. Bocker, 119 Mo. App. loc. cit. 339, 97 S. W. 551.

The basic idea of this principle is that a person exercising a special calling must possess reasonable skill and qualification for that work, without which he is not in reality a contractor, builder, architect, or manufacturer, as the case may be; and that the owner, having knowledge of such deficiency, cannot supply it by mere agreement, and thereby make him in law what he is not in fact. The effect of these decisions is in strict accord with the foregoing definition which they apply as the test of the status of an independent contractor. Hence, where the contract of the owner fails on account of the known incompetency of the ostensible independent contractor to create that relation with him, the contractor is thenceforward only to be regarded in law as acting on behalf of the owner; and the owner's responsibility is then measured by the settled rules of master and servant. This has been distinctly ruled in each of the four cases last cited, so far as the general public can be affected. Why does not the same principle apply when an action is brought against the owner by an employee of such ostensible contractor, and when it is shown that the injury occurred solely by reason of his inefficiency and incompetency, and that these were known to the owner at the time he attempted to employ the contractor?

There can be no distinction in the right to recovery of such servant and a member of the general public, if, as has been shown, such a contract between the owner and contractor was legally insufficient to serve its purpose, and therefore left the parties in the only other possible relation, to wit, that of owner or proprietor who has put another, whose incompetency he knows, to the doing of constructive or other work on his property. The reason given for an attempted distinction is that the owner has no contractual relations with the employees of the workman. The answer is that the owner has no contractual relations with the general public, and yet his liability to one of them for an injury resulting from the employment of an incompetent contractor is unquestioned under the decisions in this state. It must follow that no distinction can exist in the two cases founded on the want of contractual relations, and that it cannot be scientifically held that redress may be had by one which is not obtainable by the other, unless some other distinction can be found in the cases. The truth is that, if the existence of contractual relations is at all necessary, then in law and in fact the servant of a contractor who has been employed with actual knowledge of his incompetency is in contractual relations with the owner, because the effect in law of an employment so made is to make the contractor the mere representative of the owner. This is a greater reason why such servant should not be shut off from a recovery which is open to a member of the general public having no contractual relations with the owner either in fact or in law. If a higher right exists in either case, it attaches to the position of servant of the pseudo contractor, for the owner or proprietor knew when he employed him of his unskilfulness and incompetency, and knew that he must bring to his work ordinary laborers, like the plaintiff, who would probably suffer injury by reason of his want of skill and capacity, and that such would be the direct result of the contract made by the owner. With such knowledge and so contracting, the owner can, in reason, possess no greater defense when sued by the servant of the alleged contractor than if sued by a member of the general public, injured in the same way. Suppose, when this injury occurred, a lounge on the streets of the city had been struck by the same explosion which injured the plaintiff. As to such passer-by the liability of the defendant city is settled under the foregoing decisions in this state, under the averments of the petition, that such injury was caused by the incompetency of the man in charge of the work, which was known to the city at the time he was employed. Can the plaintiff be in a worse position than that of the street lounge? Plaintiff was employed to do manual labor, and pursuing that calling, and with no knowledge, thought, or warning of the danger which impended from the interposition between him and the city of an incompetent contractor, was his situation less protectable by the law than that of the vagrant injured at the same time, place, and manner?

It is submitted this statement of the concrete facts, to which the position assumed on behalf of the city leads, necessarily proves that it cannot be maintained with any regard to logic and principle or to justice and harmony in the administration of the law. The rule that an owner is disabled by law from making an incompetent person his independent contractor by merely agreeing so to do, with knowledge of his incompetency, is clearly and explicitly held in all the courts of Missouri. But it is said there is a different ruling in a case cited from Minnesota. Schip v. Pabst Brewing Co. 64 Minn. 22, 66 N. W. 3. As to this case, the learned annotator of the Lawyers' Reports, after citing it, adds: "But the weight of authority is opposed to the restricted doctrine thus enounced." He states further that it is contradicted by numerous decisions elsewhere which exempt an employer from liability only who has used reasonable diligence to select a "competent contractor,"—citing cases. And adds conclusively, to wit: "The doctrine that the employment of an incompetent contractor is culpable negligence which raises a cause of action in favor of anyone who is injured by conditions or occurrences which would not have existed or happened if the contractor had been competent, is also sustained by categorical statements and explicit decisions,"—citing the Missouri cases and numerous decisions of other states. 66 L.R.A. 942, notes by the annotator. It can hardly be that the courts of Missouri should be asked to overturn the settled rule announced in its own decisions in favor of the irrational doctrine and unsupported view of the Minnesota court. We therefore rule that the petition in this case did state a prima facie cause of action for injuries suffered by the plaintiff in consequence of the negligence of the incompetent corporation, acting in the role of independent contractor, and in consequence of the negligence, unfitness, and want of qualification of its foreman (Kelleher) and its blaster (Moriarty); all of which was known to the defendant city when it made the contract for letting the work and during prosecution thereof, as is shown by the statements in plaintiff's petition, which are to be taken as true in reviewing the ruling sustaining the general demurrer.

III. The next essential comprised in the above-quoted definition is, to wit, that the owner cannot delegate his responsibility for ordinary care on the part of the contractor employed to perform work which is "attended with danger to others." The violation of this requirement of the law has been repeatedly presented and adjudged in the decisions in this state, and it has been settled that such responsibility on the part of the owner is nondelegable; and no case has been presented in this state wherein he was permitted to divest himself of that duty by letting the work to another person. In one of the earliest cases an employee of the contractor engaged in altering a building was injured by the falling of a wall. He sued the owner of the property, who made two defenses: First, a denial of negligence; and, second, a plea that the entire work was done by contractors in accordance with plans of an architect, and that the injury sued for arose thereafter "from the carelessness of contractors," etc. Under this plea defendant's evidence tended to show that a carpenter working for the contractor negligently removed a prop, causing the wall to fall upon the plaintiff. As to this defense and the evidence tending to sustain it, the court conceded that the accident happened after the turning over of the premises to the contractor, and said: "But if the defendant's plans of rebuilding, as recommended by his architect, required the use of materials and structures that were unsafe, his responsibility, for any injury accruing by reason of such plans, was not transferred to the contractors." And again the court said: "There can be no question of the liability of defendant, if the damage resulted from inherent defects in the old wall, which the contractors were directed to make use of in the new building." The verdict and recovery by the plaintiff were affirmed. Horne v. Nicholson, 56 Mo. loc. cit. 222. The same principle was held to entitle an adjoining proprietor to recover of the owner of a building for injuries caused by its being negligently pulled down by an independent contractor; the court saying: "It is immaterial in such a case whether the work be done by the proprietor or by an independent contractor." Dillon v. Hunt, 105 Mo. loc. cit. 161, 24 Am. St. Rep. 374, 16 S. W. 518.

Again, the right of an adjoining proprietor for damages to her property caused by the excavating work of an independent contractor engaged in the service of another was held to exist against the owner who employed the contractor, if the petition had stated that the work was in its nature dangerous to the property of others; the court saying: "In cases of this character it seems that the principal is liable for any injury that is occasioned by reason thereof, notwithstanding the relation of respondent superior may not exist, and the party doing the work is an independent contractor." Crenshaw v. Ullman, 113 Mo. loc. cit. 640, 20 S. W. 1079, citing 2 Thomp. Neg. § 24, p. 901.

Again, the job of lowering signs had been let to an independent contractor. A passer-by was injured. The owner, and not the contractor, was sued. The court held that a recovery could be had, adding: "But the injury in the case at bar resulted directly from the acts called for and made necessary by the contract,—that is, the changing and replacing of the sign,—and not from acts which were merely collateral to the contract; and if by the negligence and carelessness of the men handling the sign it fell upon and injured plaintiff, the company is liable as if it had directly performed such acts." Loth v. Columbia Theatre Co. 197 Mo. loc. cit. 354, 94 S. W. 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

854, citing Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Steinbrock, 61 Ohio St. 215, 76 Am. St. Rep. 375, 55 N. E. 618; Deming v. Terminal R. Co. 169 N. Y. 1, 88 Am. St. Rep. 521, 61 N. E. 983; Lowell v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 40 Mass. 24, 34 Am. Dec. 33; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 196.

It is not claimed that these decisions do not settle the principle that an owner cannot shift to another his duty to see that "work attended with danger," if done on his property, shall be performed without negligence. But it is urged: First, that this rule cannot be invoked by an employee or servant of the contractor; and, second, that the blasting contracted for in this case was not work attended with danger to others. This first objection is completely within reasoning whereby it was shown above that the contention that an owner might be liable to the public, but not to the servants of the contractor, for injuries caused by the owner's employment of a person known to be unfit and incompetent to perform the work, is without any support either in reason or authority. All that was then said applies with equal conclusiveness to the renewal of that objection at the present time. No valid reason can be given why such a distinction should be made. The legal principle upon which the liability of the owner depends is that he shall not directly nor indirectly put his property to such use as probably to injure others, without at the same time assuming responsibility for such injuries in so far as they are caused by his own negligence or the negligence of his substitute in the work. This creates a nondelegable duty, as to which it has been said with conclusive logic: "It is a contradiction in terms to speak of an absolute duty as being susceptible of delegation. If it can be delegated in any particular instance, it ceases, ex hypothesi, to be absolute." 2 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 559.

We have been totally unable to find any precedent which announces a logically tenable ground for the doctrine that the owner, resting under a personal duty cast upon him by law as an essential incident to his ownership of property, may commit a breach of that duty without incurring liability to any person thereby injured, whether his own servant or the servant of one who (as contractor with the owner for doing that duty) negligently fails in its performance, or to a stranger. The duty being an imperative one and put upon the owner by law, he must perform it himself with due care, or answer for due care on the part of any other person to whom he may transfer its performance.

For this reason he cannot make the transferee of that duty an independent contractor under settled principles of law. This incapacity of the owner is explicitly noted in the words of the definition of that relation quoted above and uniformly adhered to in this state.

The next objection is as to character of the work. Was this work "attended with danger to others?" In the cases illustrative of dangerous work, above cited, we find that it was held to apply to turning over to an independent contractor the task of remodeling a building. The danger in that case grew out of the falling of an existing wall, caused by the pulling away of a prop by one of the servants of the contractor to the injury of another. In the next case the danger arose to adjoining property from excavating work necessary to the erection of a building, done by an independent contractor. In the third case, the danger ensued from the work of lowering a sign attached to a projecting beam in front of the Columbia Theater. In each of these cases it was expressly adjudicated that the given work was "attended with danger to others." In the case at bar the contract called for blasting by dynamite a mile and a third (2,450 yards) of solid rock. Is it conceivable that this work was less dangerous than the three former instances in which it was so held? Is it not clear that the destructive natural force called into play by igniting sticks of dynamite inserted into bodies of solid rock is infinitely more dangerous than remodeling a standing wall, or excavating a cellar, or lowering a sign? No possible misapprehension existed in the minds of the city authorities, for they passed a law that this particular work (blasting) should not be done within the limits of the city without a thorough ascertainment of the skillfulness and competence of the person doing the same, and without a license thereafter so issued to him, based on that finding. This clearly shows that the city knew the peril likely to ensue from such work, and adopted a valid safeguard to prevent injuries therefrom. It is apparent the city not only had knowledge of the true character of the work in question, but provided a safeguard (which it did not comply with) for minimizing the danger. This knowledge possessed by the city of the dangerous character of the work is one which is also within the judicial knowledge of the courts. In the case of Fitzsimons & C. Co. v. Braun, 199 Ill. loc. cit. 394, 59 L.R.A. 421, 65 N. E. 250, it is said: "The nature and power of dynamite as an explosive have been demonstrated by universal experience, and it is 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) a matter of common knowledge that the use of dynamite as an explosive is intrinsically dangerous, and of this the courts will take judicial notice." This was affirmed in the case of Chicago v. Murdock, 212 Ill. loc. cit. 12, 13, 103 Am. St. Rep. 221, 72 N. E. 47, where it was also held that the city could not divest itself of the character of principal by letting contract of that sort for the making of a public improvement within its limits, and that it was liable for damages caused by the negligence of the contractor on the doctrine of respondet superior. Again, the supreme court of Connecticut, after an exhaustive examination of the authorities and in conformity with the text of Cooley on Torts, said: "We think, also, that the operation of blasting with dynamite is 'intrinsically dangerous;' that the court should have taken judicial notice that it is so. . . . It is as sound a rule of law as of morals, that when, in the natural course of things, injurious consequences will arise to another from an act which I cause to be done, unless means are adopted by which such consequences may be prevented, I am bound, so far as it lies within my power, to see to the doing of that which is necessary to prevent the mischief. Failure to do so would be culpable negligence on my part. [Citing an English case.] Certain of the provisions in the specifications, to which reference has been made, were apparently inserted in recognition of this principle. [This case was sewer construction.] But in such cases it is not sufficient that the employer contracts with another to use the care to prevent harm, which the hazardous nature of the stipulated work requires. He is bound, at his own peril, to see to it that such care is used. And he is responsible, as for his own negligence, if it is not." Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk, 63 Conn. loc. cit. 527, 528, 28 Atl. 39.

We think in reason, experience, authority, and from the very terms of the contract made by the city, it is evident that the work of blasting as stipulated for was "attended with danger to others;" that this fact was known to the city at the time of the letting of the contract; and that the petition under review also states a prima facie cause of action against said city for the injury to plaintiff, caused by the negligence of the contractor or its representatives in the prosecution of the work. This reasoning does not involve, as has been suggested, the liability of the owner to the independent contractor himself. The latter plies his particular trade for livelihood. This implies a representation on his part that he is possessed of the requisite skill and competency. When he solicits employment in his own calling, he cannot ask the employer, who knows nothing of his special craft, to indemnify him against his own lack of qualification for his own trade, or against his own negligence. Such a notion is contrary to the axioms of the law. Volenti non fit injuria. Broom, Legal Maxims 5th ed. p. 270, note. On the other hand, the mere laborers employed by the person assuming to be a fit contractor have no skill in his particular mystery, nor are they expected to do other than manual work. This fact is well known to all employers and the public in general. Hence the relationship of owner to them is essentially and radically distinct from that which he bears to the master of the handicraft. The principle we affirm is that, in turning over work "attended with danger" to a contractor, the owner assumes no liability whatever with respect to him, but does assume that the dangerous work shall be performed with ordinary care, and that this responsibility extends to the common laborers, whom the owner knows must be employed by the contractor to assist in doing the work, as well to strangers.

The case of Blumb v. Kansas City, 84 Mo. 112, 54 Am. Rep. 87, is in irreconcilable conflict as to its ruling with the established law in this state. In the Blumb Case a lady was using a street whereon a contractor with the city was engaged in blasting to construct a sewer. The evidence showed that the city engineer who superintended the work had knowledge "that the men engaged in the work were guilty of carelessness in making the blast;" that neither the city nor its engineer took any steps "to stop this careless blasting." Plaintiff recovered $2,000. It was nevertheless held that this should be reversed, and that it was not necessary under those facts for the city "to suspend or cancel the contract let." If that doctrine could be sound, then the established rule in this state, enounced in every other case in which it has come up for review, that the city is under an absolute duty to keep its streets reasonably safe, must be repudiated. This undeleagable duty on the part of the city is, however, maintained in the following cases: Ryan v. Kansas City, 232 Mo. 471, 134 S. W. 566, 985; Benton v. St. Louis, 217 Mo. loc. cit. 700, 118 S. W. 418, 129 Am. St. Rep. 561 (the latter citing all the cases); Lindsay v. Kansas City, 195 Mo. loc. cit. 178, 93 S. W. 273. The duty in question is nowhere stated with more pith and clearness than by Lamm, J., in the case of Benton v. St. Louis, supra, where it is said: "It [the city] cannot shirk that duty, or shift it over to, or have it with, others. So much is the clear law in Missouri." In the light of this settled rule in this state, the Blumb Case is illy considered, and on this point it should be overruled.

IV. Wholly independent of the liability of the defendant city arising from its abortive attempt by contract to make a competent contractor out of a corporation and its managers and representatives whom it knew at the time of the contract were not such, and wholly aside from its effort to delegate to such corporation and persons its absolute duty to be responsible for the careful performance of work attended with danger, there is another distinct ground for the creation of a cause of action against the defendant city, which is positively alleged and stated in the petition in this case. It is this: The petition alleges that the city, contracting through its engineer with the construction company, stipulated and covenanted that each and all of its ordinances applicable to the doing of the work in question should be complied with (including the ordinance regulating blasting and requiring competent and licensed persons for that duty). This obligation assumed by the city enured to the benefit of all persons who could be injured by its breach. The defendant city, according to the allegations of the petition, committed an intentional and known breach of this contract and duty assumed by it, and became liable for this neglect to any person thereby injured. This was not a case of liability arising from the failure on the part of the city to enforce a police ordinance; but the case made by the petition and the contract entered into by the city is one for negligent breach of duty to require and prescribe safeguards to be employed in the doing of the work. That an action may be brought against the city which has let out work on its streets, for negligence, and that the ordinances of the city regulating such work are evidentiary, in support of such action, has been distinctly and positively enounced by this court in a recent opinion, with great clearness and force. According to the positive allegations of the petition under review, a cause of action is stated against the city for the negligent breach of its duty to require the work of sewer construction to be performed in strict accordance with its own ordinance safeguarding it. That ordinance, and the contract requiring its precautions to be observed, are set out in the petition in this case, and the charge is that the city negligently and knowingly failed to do its duty assumed by its positive agreement. Now, in speaking of the force and admissibility of such a precautionary ordinance, this court said: "The ordinances themselves do not make a prima facie case, but may be considered with other facts in determining the question of negligence or no negligence upon the part of the city." Ryan v. Kansas City, 232 Mo. loc. cit. 485, 134 S. W. 570, 985. This differentiation between a cause of action originating from mere nonenforcement of a police ordinance and a cause of action based on negligence, in support of which such an ordinance is admissible, is clear and conclusive. Under the duty assumed by its contract in this case, the city was bound to require the observance of the safeguards prescribed by it, and which it covenanted to do in the very terms of the contract itself. Its negligence in failing to do this is the origin of one of the causes of action in the petition. Hence the ordinance in question is admissible in evidence as tending to prove that negligence, and for the added reason that the city contracted that it should be obeyed in this particular instance. For this reason we hold that the petition under review stated a cause of action entirely apart from any relationship, if such could have existed, which is denied, of employer and independent contractor on the part of the city and its codefendant.

Our conclusion is that the allegations in the petition in this case, fairly interpreted, state three causes of action: First, for negligence arising out of the employment of a contractor known to be incompetent and unskilful; second, for the negligent performance of work "attended with danger to others" by the contractor and its foreman and its blaster; third, for negligence and breach of duty on the part of the city in failing to require the observance of the safeguards against injury, which it contracted should be used. These conclusions put no obstacles whatever in the way of improvement and progress; for the defendant city has ample power, and is charged with the duty, under its own laws, to take bonds indemnifying it against any liability arising in the manner stated in this petition.

The general demurrer in this case should be overruled, and the city required to answer or make other defense to the causes of action stated in the petition.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

GUS SALINGER, Appt.,
v.

NORTH AMERICAN WOOLEN MILLS
et al.

(— W. Va. —, 73 S. E. 312.)

Evidence — written lease.

1. As a general rule a written lease of land becomes the repository of the contract, all preceding negotiations becoming consummated in it, and in the absence of fraud or mistake, it is the controlling evidence of the terms and conditions upon which the property was demised.

Landlord and tenant — outside walls — license.

2. The knowledge of a landlord, or of one of his tenants, and his or their acquiescence in the use by another tenant, without consideration, of the outside walls of a portion of the building not inclosing the part occupied by or leased to him, but leased to and occupied by another tenant, amounts simply to a revocable license, revocable at pleasure by the licensor, whether such licensor be the landlord or a tenant.

Same — right to outside walls.

3. The lessee of a storeroom, unless restrained by the terms of his lease, has the exclusive right to the use of the outside walls of that portion of the building covered by his lease, for advertising signs, to the exclusion of a lessee of another part of the same building, but he has no right to occupy with such signs, or for any purpose, the outside wall not inclosing his part of the leased premises.

License — revocability — lessee.

4. The rule giving right to the owner of a fee to revoke at pleasure a mere license to another to occupy his land, or any portion thereof, is equally applicable to his lessee, where such lessee is the licensor, unless the latter be restrained by the terms of his lease from granting such license.

Same — termination — method.

5. As a general rule a mere license is terminated by any act of the licensor which evinces an intention to revoke it, such as a conveyance or contract inconsistent with the continued enjoyment of the license.

The lease of the tenant entitled him to so much of the premises as the landlord placed in his possession under the lease at the date of the lease in force, and Salinger's right and his possession under this lease must be determined by the practical construction of the lease, as interpreted by the acts of both the landlord and tenant in relation to the premises leased.

building included the outside of the wall as a part of the premises demised. The court distinguished the term "floor" from "room," and it is said that the word "room" excludes the outside of lateral walls. The language of the court was as follows: "The words 'first floor' in the building are equivalent to 'first story' of the building, and naturally include the walls. The apparent intention is to separate a section of the building as a distinct tenement. The words 'first floor' define the lower and upper boundaries of this, but there is nothing to fix the lateral boundaries except the boundaries of the building. In this respect the words differ somewhat from the word 'room.' 'Floor' means a section of the building between horizontal planes; the words 'in building' show that the section is of the whole building, and not of a part of it. The word 'room' includes a description of the perpendicular as well as of the horizontal planes which bound the parcel of the house described by it, and excludes the outside of lateral walls, at least when they constitute the walls of another room, as clearly as the words 'first floor' exclude the flooring of the story above it."

In Scott v. Fox Optical Co. supra, it was said, obiter, that a lease of a part of a building for the purpose of a dwelling does not carry with it the right to use the outside walls for advertising purposes.

In Bennett v. Seligman, 32 Mich. 500, it was held that the right of owners of a common stairway between two adjoining buildings, to use the walls along the stairway for the placing of signs and advertisements,

A lessee of a room in a building is not entitled to remove a "For Rent" sign placed on the outside of the window after he has given notice of intention to quit, but before the expiration of the term for which he has paid rent, at least where he violated his contract by failing to give the notice the specified time before the date fixed for leaving. Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, on bill filed, obtained an injunction restraining defendants and all other persons, from "destroying, removing, painting over, interfering with, or in any wise molesting, defacing, or changing, the painted advertisement and signs" placed by him on the front outer walls of the upper stories of the store building occupied by him on Court square in the city of Parkersburg.

On bill, answers of defendants, and affidavits filed on behalf of plaintiff, the court in vacation, on motion of defendants, dissolved the injunction, and plaintiff has appealed.

Plaintiff is lessee under Strong, the owner of the building, of the storeroom occupied by him, while defendants, Kinney & Carroll, are lessees of the two upper stories of the same building. Plaintiff first entered in October, 1907, as assignee of Rauch, a prior lessee. Subsequently, on April 1, 1908, the date of the expiration of the Rauch lease, pursuant to agreement Salinger obtained from Strong a new lease for five years, on the terms of the old, with privilege of an additional term of five years. Following this new lease, Strong by agreement with plaintiff, built an addition in the rear, and on October 1, 1908, the prior lease of April 1 was surrendered, and a second lease, covering the new addition, on the terms of the first, except that the rent was increased from $60 to $100 per month, was executed.

that plaintiff's lease, in terms, gave him any right to occupy the front walls of the upper stories of the building with his signs, but that, prior to purchasing the lease from Rauch, and as an inducement thereto, Strong agreed that he might paint signs on said walls; and that Kinney & Carroll, tenants of the upper stories, and who had been such tenants for many years prior to plaintiff's purchase of the Rauch lease, had also consented thereto; and that before occupying said storeroom with his stock of goods, he had actually painted said signs on said upper walls, as they were at the time of filing his bill, and that he was so occupying said walls with his signs to the knowledge and acquiescence of Strong, and the knowledge and acquiescence of Kinney & Carroll, when Strong executed to him the two leases of April 1, and October 1, 1908, and when in August, 1910, the North American Woolen Mills Company, or Boso, its manager, claiming the right by contract with said Kinney & Carroll, and with Strong, the landlord, undertook to enter and paint out said signs, and occupy said walls with signs advertising the business of said Woolen Mills Company, and for which he sought to enjoin them.

The answer of Strong denies the alleged agreement, and denies that the subject of so occupying said upper walls with signs was ever mentioned by plaintiff prior or subsequent to plaintiff's purchase of the Rauch lease. His only admission is that some time after he executed the lease of April 1, 1908, plaintiff said to him that he was going to paint the upper walls, but that no mention was then or at any time made about painting signs thereon. He admits knowledge that plaintiff had painted signs on these walls, but he disclaims the right, as against Kinney & Carroll, his upper tenants, to authorize plaintiff to so occupy said walls, and he denies that he ever undertook to do so. He says he had no objection, if Kinney & Carroll had none, to plaintiff's use of said walls; and the latter, while denying any agreement with plaintiff that he might so occupy said walls, say they were not disposed to annoy or interfere with plaintiff in such use, so long as they had no opportunity to otherwise occupy said walls; but that, having had opportunity in August, 1910, to lease said walls at a profit, they had executed the contract to Boso for his Woolen Mills Company, and they denied any right in plaintiff by contract, license, or otherwise to longer occupy said walls with his signs.

While admitting said signs may be of value to plaintiff, all the answers deny any alleged intention to injure him or his business, in making the contract with Boso, or that depriving him of the use of said walls for his signs will have that effect.

No evidence was offered in support of the bill, except the ex parte affidavit of plaintiff himself, to the effect that on August 20, 1910, M. Carroll, of the firm of Kinney & Carroll, had said to him that his firm had been compelled to sign the contract with Boso, for fear that, if they did not do so, Strong, the landlord, would require them to vacate the building, and that he, Carroll, personally did not then or at any time lay claim to any right to use said front walls for display signs, or the right to lease the same to anybody else, and that he would not have signed the contract with Boso, except for the threat of Strong and Boso to cancel their lease, a lease from month to month.

On this state of the pleadings and proofs, was the injunction properly dissolved? That a moral wrong may possibly be inflicted on plaintiff may be admitted. But the rights of plaintiff to longer occupy said walls with his signs depend solely on the nature of that right.

It is conceded that his lease does not in terms give him such right, and we must say from the record that he had no contract resting in parol, either with Strong, the landlord, or with Kinney & Carroll, the upper tenants, to so occupy said upper walls with his signs, for the allegations of his bill as to any such contract or agreement are denied by the answers, and there is no proof thereof. The rights of the plaintiff therefore rest solely upon the fact that Strong and Kinney & Carroll knew of plaintiff's use of said walls, and for so long a time did not object thereto. We do not see how this knowledge of Strong at the time he executed the leases to plaintiff can in any way affect the rights of the American Woolen Mills Company or Boso, under their contract with Kinney & Carroll, the upper tenants. The written lease from Strong to Salinger became the repository of plaintiff's contract, and all preceding negotiations were consummated in it, and it furnishes the controlling evidence, in the absence of fraud or mistake, of the terms and conditions upon which the property was demised. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 132. This is an elementary principle of contracts.

It is contended by counsel for defendants that the acquiescence of Strong and of Kinney & Carroll, in the use of said walls by plaintiff, amounted to a mere license, revocable at pleasure, and not to an easement. This proposition seems well founded in law. 2 Minor, Inst. 22; Mumford v. Whitney, 15 Wend. 380, 30 Am. Dec. 68; Lowell v. Strahan, 145 Mass. 1, 1 Am. St. Rep. 422, 12 N. E. 401. The proposition is particularly applicable where the license appertains to the occupancy of outside walls for advertising signs. Jones, Land. & T. § 40.

The question then is, Who had the right to give such license? If Kinney & Carroll, the upper tenants, had the right to control the use of the outer walls of that portion of the building occupied by them, they alone had the right to give the privilege or license to plaintiff, and no act of Strong could bind them, unless they had knowledge thereof and approved or acquiesced therein. Their answer is a denial of any knowledge of Strong's action or contract with plaintiff, and asserts their right to the use of said outer walls, and their legal right to contract the use thereof to the Woolen Mills Company. It is well settled also that a lessee has the exclusive right to the use of the outside walls of the portion of the building covered by his lease, to the exclusion of a lessee of another part of the same building, and has no right to use for any purpose any portion of the outside walls not inclosing his part of the premises. 1. Underhill, Land. & T. § 277. And this rule applies to the use of such walls for signs. Jones, Land. & T. § 108; 24 Cyc. 1047; Riddle v. Littlefield, 53 N. H. 503, 16 Am. Rep. 388. Our conclusion, therefore, is that Kinney & Carroll, and not Strong, had the right to control the outer walls of the upper stories of the building occupied by plaintiff. They were tenants thereof when plaintiff obtained his lease; he was charged with notice of their rights. He does not claim to have had any contract with them, and, having undertaken to occupy these walls without agreement with them, he did so at his peril.

Was the license of Kinney & Carroll revocable by them? Mr. Minor, 2 Minor, Inst. 22, says: "A license is sometimes revocable; namely, where if it is countermanded, it leaves the party in statu quo." And Mr. Jones says: "A mere license, unaccompanied with any vested interest in the real estate created by deed or other writing, and independent of any title acquired by grant, prescription, or adverse possession and claim for a period of the statute of limitations, must be deemed to be, in its own nature, countermandable, and essentially revocable at the will of the owner of the fee." Jones, Land. & T. § 37. But when the owner of the fee is not the licensor, we think the rule is equally applicable to a tenant, unless restrained by the terms of his lease from granting such license. This latter proposition, we think fully supported by Riddle v. Littlefield and Lowell v. Strahan, supra. The license of Kinney & Carroll, having been without consideration, they could revoke it at any time. Harris v. Brown, 202 Pa. 16, 90 Am. St. Rep. 612, 51 Atl. 586; Lawrence v. Springer, 49 N. J. Eq. 289, 31 Am. St. Rep. 713, 24 Atl. 933; Pifer v. Brown, 43 W. Va. 412, 49 L.R.A. 497, 27 S. E. 399.

The remaining question is, Did Kinney & Carroll revoke the license? The general rule is that a license is terminated by any act of the licensor which shows an intention to revoke it, such as a conveyance or contract inconsistent with the continued enjoyment of the license. 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1141; note to Pifer v. Brown, 49 L.R.A. 497, supra, and cases cited. The agreement in writing of Kinney & Carroll with the defendant Boso, giving to him the privilege of using said walls, is sufficient evidence, according to these authorities, of their intention to revoke the license to plaintiff.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the injunction was properly dissolved. The material allegations of the bill having been fully, fairly, plainly, distinctly, and positively denied in the sworn answers, and not proven, it was the duty of the court, on motion of the defendants, to dissolve the injunction. Cox v. Douglass, 20 W. Va. 175; Schoonover v. Bright, 24 W. Va. 698; Kester v. Alexander, 47 W. Va. 329, 34 S. E. 819; Crossland v. Crossland, 53 W. Va. 114, 44 S. E. 424. The decree below must therefore be affirmed.

(Smith, J., dissents.)

(May 8, 1912.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harrison County in defendant's favor in an action brought to hold defendant liable for the proceeds of a draft in plaintiff's favor which it had paid on a forged indorsement. Reversed.

The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts which was as follows:

"It is agreed by and between the parties hereto: That on and previous to the 23d day of October, 1909, the plaintiff, who is a white man and a citizen of said Harrison county, and whose business was that of riding about buying cattle, had on deposit in the First National Bank of De Funiak Springs, Florida, a balance of account of $211, and that the plaintiff (who was then, and for some time had been, living, and is now living, at a point between Gulfport and Lyman, in said Harrison county, but nearest to Lyman, the two points, Gulfport and Lyman, being 8 miles apart) wrote a letter to the said bank at De Funiak Springs, requesting said bank to send said sum of $211 to him at Gulfport, by letter, care general delivery, Gulfport, Mississippi, and in accordance with said instructions of plaintiff, said bank at De Funiak Springs, made out its draft No. 12,699, for said sum of $211, on the National City Bank of New York, payable to the order of J. S. Thomas, intending the plaintiff, and immediately mailed same in the United States postoffice at De Funiak Springs, Florida, addressed as follows: 'J. S. Thomas, Gulfport, Miss.' The plaintiff had theretofore been writing some of his letters from Lyman, Mississippi, and some from Gulfport, and had been getting his mail some at Lyman and some at Gulfport. However, the letter written by plaintiff to the said bank at De Funiak Springs was written by plaintiff from said Gulfport. There lived, and had for some years lived, in Gulfport, a certain negro named J. S. Thomas, who can and could read and write, and who had a bank account at the First National Bank of Gulfport, the defendant herein (an itemized statement of whose entire deposits in defendant's bank to the date hereof is attached hereto as 'Exhibit C,') and who received his mail at said Gulfport. The authorized signature of said negro was filed by him with the defendant bank on February 4, 1907, where it still remains. When, by due course of mail, the letter from said Florida bank containing said draft reached the United States postoffice at Gulfport, about October 25, 1909, the said negro, J. S. Thomas, was the first of said two persons of said name to call at the general delivery for the mail of J. S. Thomas, and the postal authorities in charge delivered the said letter to him. The said negro opened said letter, and coming into possession of said draft, took it on, to wit, October 26, 1909, during regular banking hours, to defendant's bank, indorsed same, 'J. S. Thomas,' in his own proper signature and handwriting, falsely representing it to be his own, and that he was the true J. S. Thomas mentioned as payee therein, by so indorsing and presenting said draft, and requested defendant bank to cash the same. The said negro was known to the officer of said defendant bank who was acting as paying teller at the time, but was not the regular teller, as J. S. Thomas, a depositor thereof, and the said officer of said defendant bank, having compared the indorsement 'J. S. Thomas' on the back of said draft with the signature of said negro, J. S. Thomas, on file, as aforesaid, and finding them to correspond, but without further inquiry, thereupon paid the amount called for by said draft, to wit, $211 in cash, to said negro, J. S. Thomas; but said paying officer of defendant took no other means to ascertain the identity of said payee, J. S. Thomas, in the draft, merely paying said money upon its presentation and comparison of signature, as aforesaid. The original of said draft is herewith annexed, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this agreed statement of facts.

"The said defendant bank, at the close of its business on said October 26, 1909, in making up its items of paper to be forwarded to New York for payment, discovered that the said draft, Exhibit A, was erroneously safeguarded, as now appears on its face, in this, to wit, that, while said draft was intended to be for the sum of $211, it was stamped with a machine called a protectograph, which had been caused by said De Funiak Springs bank to be erroneously stamped thereon, 'Not over Five Dollars, $5,' and thereupon, on said date, said defendant bank sent the said draft by mail to said De Funiak Springs bank, calling its attention to said error, and requesting said Florida bank to send another draft in its place and stead properly safeguarded, which letter reached said Florida bank on the next day, October 27, 1909, and said Florida bank on the same day took up and retained the said first draft, Exhibit A, and on the same day, in its place and stead and in lieu thereof, mailed to defendant bank a new draft, No. 12,716, for $211, payable to said defendant bank, which is herewith annexed 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) as 'Exhibit B,' and made a part of this agreed statement of facts, which said last draft was duly received by said defendant bank and by it at once forwarded to New York, where it was paid in full to defendant bank out of the funds of the said First National Bank of De Funiak Springs, Florida, by and in the said National City Bank of New York, as is the banking custom in such cases. The amount was charged by the said Florida bank against the account of plaintiff and balanced same. That the receipt and opening said letter containing said draft, and cashing of the same at the defendant bank, and the indorsement and presentation of the same by said negro, J. S. Thomas, were all and singular without the information, knowledge, or consent of the plaintiff, J. S. Thomas; and that, upon learning from said Florida bank, upon inquiry, that the said sum of money, to wit, $211, the proceeds of said draft, had been paid to the defendant bank, he went on, to wit, November 5, 1909, to said defendant bank and claimed said draft and proceeds thereof, and demanded payment of the same by the defendant to the plaintiff, as the true owner of said draft, and then and there notified said defendant bank that said indorsement was a forgery, and that he had not indorsed the same. The defendant bank refused to pay said sum of $211, or any part thereof, to the plaintiff, and still refuses, though often requested. Upon said demands being made, said defendant bank notified the United States postal authorities and the police authorities of the said city, and endeavored to have said negro, J. S. Thomas, arrested, and requested plaintiff to have him arrested, or ascertain his whereabouts, for such fraudulent conduct and acts; but said negro was not found after search by all said parties, and it is believed by the said parties that he left said community after having received said money on said draft as aforesaid.

"The plaintiff, J. S. Thomas, had also formerly been a depositor at the said defendant bank, but closed his account there September 14, 1908, and has done no business with said bank since said date. On the books of said defendant bank the address of said plaintiff, J. S. Thomas, is Lyman, Mississippi, and said defendant bank, while it was doing business with said plaintiff, sent his statements and other communications to him at Lyman. The said sum of $211, or any part of it, was never placed to the credit of said plaintiff, and he has never received said money or any part thereof, from any source. The said plaintiff knew, when he wrote to the said Florida bank, that one (another) J. S. Thomas had been a depositor and customer of said defendant bank, but did not know him, and had never seen him; but did know that such a person did live, or at least had lived, in Gulfport. That all the indorsements upon said draft, Exhibit A hereto, are now as each originally was after being returned to said Florida bank, but the statement of 'J. S. Thomas' on the back thereof is not the signature of the plaintiff, that is to say, not his handwriting, nor was it written there with the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. The words 'Paid Oct. 27, with our draft No. 12,716 favor of First National Bank, Gulfport, Miss.,' were written on the back of Exhibit A by the De Funiak Springs bank upon issuing Exhibit B hereto. That the negro, J. S. Thomas, who unlawfully took said draft, Exhibit A, as aforesaid, never had any deposit or balance with the said De Funiak Springs bank, and the said draft was not intended for him, but for the plaintiff; but said defendant bank knew nothing of either of said parties named J. S. Thomas having or not having any deposit in said Florida bank, nor which of said parties it was intended to have said draft, and was wholly without knowledge in that regard, but defendant bank did know that the plaintiff had been a depositor in defendant bank, and that his signature was there on file. It is further agreed that said cause may be heard without further pleadings before the judge of the circuit court aforesaid, without a jury, and before the supreme court if an appeal is taken, upon the above statement of facts (and the law applicable thereto), which are all the facts in the case."

Mayes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By agreement a jury was waived, and this case was tried by the judge on an agreed statement of facts. It is therefore unnecessary for us to set out at length any statement of the facts. The suit was instituted by J. S. Thomas against the bank for the purpose of recovering $211. The agreed facts show that on and prior to the 23d day of October, 1909, the appellant in this suit had on deposit in the First National Bank of De Funiak Springs, Florida, a credit balance of $211. Appellant, being in Gulfport, wrote a letter from that point to the Florida bank requesting the bank to send the amount of his deposit to him at Gulfport, care of the general post-office delivery. In accordance with this instruction, the Florida bank sent a draft for the amount on a New York bank, payable to the order of appellant, J. S. Thomas; the Florida bank addressing the letter containing the draft to J. S. Thomas, Gulfport, Mississippi, care general delivery. The appellant was a white man, and there was living in Gulfport at that time a negro by the name of J. S. Thomas, and this negro also received his mail at Gulfport. When the letter containing the draft reached Gulfport, October 25, 1909, it seems that appellant was not then in Gulfport; but the negro J. S. Thomas called for his mail at the general delivery, and the postal authorities delivered the letter intended for appellant and containing the draft to the negro of the same name. The negro opened the letter, and, finding the draft in it, took it to the First National Bank of Gulfport and indorsed same "J. S. Thomas," representing that the check was his and that he was the true J. S. Thomas mentioned as payee. The negro was known to the officers of the Gulfport bank and was a depositor in same. When the draft was indorsed to the bank by the negro, the bank paid the money to the negro J. S. Thomas. Subsequently, the Gulfport bank discovered some little mistake in the protectograph stamping of the draft, which mistake was made by the Florida bank when it issued the draft. The Gulfport bank returned the draft by mail to the Florida bank, calling their attention to the error, and requesting the Florida bank to send another draft in its place. The Florida bank merely retained the original draft, and in place of same sent another one for the same amount, but this time made it payable to the Gulfport bank; the former draft having been already indorsed to the Gulfport bank by the negro J. S. Thomas. The draft was finally paid to the Gulfport bank when it was presented for payment in New York. The Gulfport bank had no knowledge of the fact that the negro did not own this draft. Appellant, J. S. Thomas, the white man, subsequently learned from the Florida bank that the Gulfport bank had collected the $211, and when he received this information he went to the Gulfport bank and claimed the draft and the proceeds thereof, demanding that the Gulfport bank pay the same. J. S. Thomas, the real owner of the draft, notified the Gulfport bank that the indorsement was a forgery. The Gulfport bank refused to reimburse the true owner. The negro J. S. Thomas in the meantime had left for parts unknown. In other words, the facts of this case conclusively show that the appellant was the owner of the draft, and that the negro who presented it had no interest in it, and had forged the indorsement of the true owner and collected the proceeds from same. Some other facts are agreed to, but we do not think they are important in the consideration of this case. The question in this case is simply this: Where there are two people of the same name, and a check, by accident, reaches the hands of the wrong person, and the person wrongfully obtaining the check indorses his name on same and receives the proceeds from an innocent third party, is such an indorsement a forgery, and is the innocent party protected as against the true owner? The trial court held that it was not such a forgery as would fasten any liability on the bank, and from this judgment this appeal is taken.

There seems to be little dissent in the authorities; almost, if not quite, all the authorities holding that under such circumstances the party paying the check to the one forging the indorsement is not protected. Under such circumstances, it is nothing but a forgery. The true owner of the check is not placed beyond the protection of the law because some unscrupulous person of the same name lives in the same town with him. The true owner has never parted with his title, and his property is not to be taken away from him without his consent merely because the check happens to fall into the hands of another of the same name. Banks taking checks must know the true parties claiming to own them,—in fact, who do own them,—and they act at their peril. Where there are two or more persons of the same name, it cannot be anticipated that one of them will commit a crime and forge the name of the other to an instrument which may have accidentally come into his hands. The true owner of the check was guilty of no sort of neglect which would operate as an estoppel on him. He had a right to have his mail sent to him at the general delivery at Gulfport.

In the case of Beattie v. National Bank, 174 Ill. 571, 43 L.R.A. 654, 66 Am. St. Rep. 318, 51 N. E. 602, the court holds that "where a bill is payable to the order of a person, and another person of the same name of the payee gets hold of it and indorses it to a party who takes it in good faith and for value, such party acquires no title to the bill. . . . If the indorsement, so made by a person who is not the real payee, but has the same name as the real payee, is made by such person with full knowledge that he is not the real payee, and with intent to perpetrate a fraud, his indorsement cannot be regarded otherwise than as a forgery." To the same effect are many cases cited in the opinion in the above case.

It is true that Mr. Morse, in his work on Banks and Banking, vol. 2, at page 852, states in his text that under such circumstances he does not think that the rule announced above is correct; but he admits in this same text that, "though the propriety of the ruling may be criticized, it must be admitted that it lays down the only adjudicated law in the premises, except a remark made in an old case in New Hampshire;" and he further says: "The only English authority is to the same effect." Mr. Morse's view is that "the technical rule of law declaring the indorsement [under such circumstances] a forgery is too strong for the principles of justice;" but he is much alone in this view. We prefer to follow what seems to be the settled authority upon this subject, not only because the authorities are that way, but because we differ from Mr. Morse, and believe that the principles of justice announced by the decisions are more in accord with true principles of right than the view stated by Mr. Morse. It is difficult for us to understand by what principle of right a man should have his money or valuables taken from him because he has the misfortune, through no fault of his own, to have the same name as some other person in the same town. It is difficult for us to understand how the true owner of a draft may lose his property rights in same by reason of the fact that it has fallen into the hands of another person of the same name, and that other person has forged an indorsement of his name to the instrument and obtained money for it, when the true owner knew nothing about it.

In the Beattie Case, supra, the court held that the true owner of a draft could recover its value where the person receiving it had the same name, but not the same middle initial. In other words, in the Beattie Case, the draft sued upon was made payable to the order of one George A. Bent, when in truth it was intended for George P. Bent. The draft was mailed to George A. Bent, and George A. Bent received it and indorsed upon it his own name and sold it to a purchaser in good faith; but the court held, notwithstanding this, that the purchaser got no title, saying: "It is true that the real and intended payee of the draft was named George P. Bent; but the fact that the name of the real owner and the name of the fraudulent possessor of the draft differ so far as the middle letter of the name is concerned, does not make the case other than a case where the name of the real payee and the name of the assumed payee are the same. This is so because the law does not regard the middle initial letter as a part of a person's name, but only recognizes one Christian name of a party."

It is readily seen that the above case is a stronger case than this one, because there was a difference in the name; that is, a difference in the initial. But in this case there was not such a difference, but the name was identical.

The case is reversed, and judgment here for appellant.

McLean, J., specially concurring:

Whenever a bank pays a check drawn upon it, or upon any other bank, it does so at its peril; it is the duty of the bank to know that it is paying the money to the right party, and if the party presenting the check for payment is not the party, he is necessarily guilty of forgery in presenting the check with the name of the wrong party having been indorsed thereon by him. The fact that both parties have the same name does not, and cannot, in the very nature of things, alter the question. The fact that one writes his own name across the check, and knowing that the check is payable to another party, makes him as guilty of forgery as if he had personated another person, and had forged the name of the other person,—in truth and in fact, when he does this, he is personating another person. The bank must look alone to the party presenting the check for a good title. Any other doctrine would result in a party losing his property without any fault on his part. The rule is well settled that an indorser guarantees the genuineness of all prior indorsements.

It is an elementary principle that, when one or two equally innocent persons must suffer, he by whose fault or neglect the loss is caused must bear the burden. Suppose the check in this case had been made payable to Bill Smith, and that the negro named Thomas had written the name Bill Smith in blank across the back of the check, and presented the check for payment, at the same time stating to the appellee that Smith had indorsed the check, could not in that case Bill Smith, the true owner of the check, have recovered his money? We see no difference in principle between such a case and the instant one. The difficulty with appellee is in confusion the real owner of the check with a party who bears the name of the real owner,—it fails to distinguish between a name and the person.

I regret that I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by my brethren. My views will be found expressed in 2 Morse, Banks & Bkg. 4th ed. p. 851, better than I can do so myself.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

CHANCELLOR OF NEW JERSEY, Respt.,
v.

JOSEPH TOWELL et al.
and

PHILEMON WOODRUFF et al, Exrs., etc., of Absalom B. Woodruff, Deceased, Appts.

(— N. J. —, 82 Atl. 861.)

Mortgage — vendee — assumption of debt.

1. Where a purchaser of a part of mortgaged premises assumes the payment of all

Headnotes by VREDENBURGH, J.

Note. — Rule as to inverse order of alienation as affected by assumption of mortgage debt.

The decision in CHANCELLOR v. TOWELL, to the effect that the rule of inverse order of the mortgage on the whole of such premises, the land so purchased is liable for the mortgage debt before the portion of the mortgaged premises remaining unconveyed by the mortgagor or his estate can be sold in satisfaction of the mortgage debt.

Same—conveyance—rule in equity.

2. In such cases, the rule in equity that the aliened portions shall be sold in the inverse order of their alienation does not apply.

Equity—circuity of action.

3. One of the cogent reasons for denying the application of this rule in such cases, beyond that of enforcement of the performance of the contract of assumption, is the anxiety of a court of equity to avoid the circuity of action which would necessarily result from the sale on foreclosure of the mortgage, of the mortgagor's remaining of alienation in applying parts of mortgaged property conveyed at different times does not apply where a grantee of a part which would not ordinarily be primarily liable assumes the payment of the mortgage debt, is in accord with a well-recognized exception to the application of the inverse order of alienation rule.

The reason for this exception is that, to hold the so-called rule of inverse order of alienation applicable in such a case would produce a result not in accord with the principles of equity, and since the rule itself is of equitable origin, it will not be applied where the equitable reasons upon which it rests cease to exist, and are entirely wanting.

As between mortgagor and his grantee or privies.

The exception to the general rule just referred to was given effect in the following cases arising between mortgagors and their grantees, with the result that the portion of the land conveyed was held primarily liable;

—where the grantees of part of the mortgaged premises, in the conveyance to them, assumed the payment of the mortgage debt. State v. Ripley, 32 Conn. 150; Burger v. Greif, 55 Md. 518; Jager v. Vollinger, 174 Mass. 521, 55 N. E. 458; Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 463; Mowry v. Mowry, 137 Mich. 277, 100 N. W. 388; Burbank v. Babcock, 3 N. Y. S. R. 458; Russell v. Pistor, 7 N. Y. 171, 57 Am. Dec. 509; Bowne v. Lynde, 91 N. Y. 92;

—where the grantee of part of mortgaged premises assumed the payment of all of the mortgage notes. Mead v. Peabody, 183 Ill. 126, 55 N. E. 719;

—where an amount equal to the mortgage debt was deducted from the purchase price, and title given subject to the mortgage. Wood v. Harper, 9 App. Div. 229, 41 N. Y. Supp. 242.

And one who purchases a part of mortgaged premises from a grantee of such part, who undertook as a part of the purchase price to pay the entire mortgage debt, takes 39 L.R.A. (N.S.)

lands before those of the defaulting purchaser have been applied toward the satisfaction of the mortgage debt.

Mortgage—assumption—estoppel.

4. The fact that the defendant Towell became an alienee of the second and third tracts, conveyed to him expressly subject to the mortgage which he had previously covenanted to pay, must be regarded as decisive against him of the question of his equity, which he has raised upon this appeal.

(March 5, 1912.)

A PPEAL by defendants executors of Ab-salom B. Woodruff, deceased, from the portion of the decree of the Court of Chancery, directing the order in which the sevthem subject to their primary liability for the payment of the mortgage debt, where he had knowledge of his grantor's undertaking. Chapman v. Beardsley, 31 Conn. 115; Engle v. Haines, 5 N. J. Eq. 186, 43 Am. Dec. 624; Ross v. Haines, 5 N. J. Eq. 632.

And where a grantee of part of mortgaged premises assumes the mortgage and executes a mortgage to secure the purchase price to his grantor, this part of the premises is primarily liable, although the last mortgage referred to was assigned to a third person. Clark v. Benthem, 4 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 498.

And where a grantee of part of mortgaged premises assumes the mortgage debt, one who purchases on foreclosure of a mortgage executed by such grantee to his grantor takes the premises subject to their primary liability for the payment of the original mortgage. Russell v. Pistor, 7 N. Y. 171, 57 Am. Dec. 509.

And in Re Wisner, 20 Mich. 442, it was held that, as between the estate of a deceased husband and his widow, the homestead conveyed by him to her subject to the amount unpaid on a mortgage thereon was primarily liable for the payment of the mortgage debt.

See also Thompson v. Bird, set out by the court in CHANCELLOR v. TOWELL.

As between grantees of part of mortgaged premises or their privies.

The exception holding that the rule as to inverse order of alienation does not apply where the mortgage debt is assumed by a grantee of a part of the encumbered premises is recognized as well between the several grantees of the mortgagor and their privies, as between the grantor and his grantees.

Thus, the rule was given effect in the following cases arising between the mortgagor's grantees, holding that the part of the premises first conveyed was primarily liable:

—where the grantee of such part assumed the payment of the mortgage debt.

eral parcels of mortgaged premises should be sold under foreclosure. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William I. Lewis, for appellants:

Inasmuch as Towell is the principal debtor, and A. B. Woodruff and his representatives are but sureties for the payment of the mortgage debt of $13,000, all the property of Towell which is subject to the mortgage must be sold to satisfy it, before such property of his surety as is subject to such mortgage.

The decree is plainly erroneous in not directing that any deficiency arising upon the sales of parcels 1 and 2 should be borne by parcels 3, 4, and 5, in proportion to their relative value.

—where the grantee of a portion of the mortgaged premises, which was of sufficient value to pay the mortgage debt, assumed the whole debt. Welch v. Beers, 8 Allen, 151.

In Skinner v. Harker, 23 Colo. 333, 48 Pac. 648, where the grantees of a portion of mortgaged premises agreed as part of the consideration to pay the entire mortgage indebtedness, and the mesne grantees made the same agreement, with the exception of the last, who undertook only to pay a proportionate part of the indebtedness, it was held, as between such grantees and a subsequent grantee who purchased of the mortgagor with the understanding that the debt was to be paid by the grantees of the part first conveyed, that that part was the primary fund out of which the whole mortgage indebtedness should be paid.

And in Pool v. Marshall, 48 Ill. 440, it was held that a grantee of a part of mortgaged premises, who retained part of the purchase price and paid the mortgage debt, could not enforce contribution against a grantee who purchased another part of the encumbered premises after the first conveyance was made.

And in Wright v. Briggs, 99 Ind. 563, where the purchaser of part of mortgaged premises undertook to pay the mortgage debt, and stated to a purchaser of the remainder that he was bound to pay such debt, it was held that the grantee of the last purchaser, who relied upon the first purchaser's agreement, might recover from the latter the amount paid to discharge the mortgage debt, and might maintain foreclosure proceedings against the portion of the premises first conveyed.

In Bowne v. Lynde, 91 N. Y. 92, where a mortgagor purchased land from one who took as part payment the bond and mortgage of a person to whom the mortgagor had conveyed a part of land owned by him under an agreement by which his grantee assumed the payment of the mortgage debt, it was held, it appearing that the mortgagor's grantor had knowledge of these facts, that the part of the mortgaged premises referred to was primarily liable for the payment of the mortgage debt.

And in Cooley v. Murray, 11 Colo. App. 241, 52 Pac. 1108, a grantee of part of mortgaged premises who assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage debt was held liable to a subsequent grantee of another portion of the encumbered premises, for the amount left due after the first grantee's part of the premises had been sold.

But where the mortgagor releases the grantees of a part of mortgaged premises from their assumption of the mortgage debt, such part of the premises is, as against subsequent grantees of the remainder of the mortgaged property, relieved from its primary liability. Judson v. Dada, 79 N. Y. 373.

Where conveyance is made subject to mortgage.

Where a conveyance of part of mortgaged premises is made subject to the mortgage, it is also held that such portion of the premises is primarily liable. Moore v. Shurtleff, 128 Ill. 370, 21 N. E. 775; Boone v. Clark, 129 Ill. 466, 5 L.R.A. 276, 21 N. E. 850; Monarch Coal & Min. Co. v. Hand, 197 Ill. 288, 64 N. E. 381; Brown v. South Boston Bank, 148 Mass. 300, 19 N. E. 382; Hoy v. Mr. George S. Hilton, for respondent.

Where a part of granted premises has been aliened by the grantor, and a part retained by him, the part retained, as between the grantor and his alienee, is primarily chargeable with the mortgage debt.

Hoy v. Bramhall, 19 N. J. Eq. 563, 97 Am. Dec. 687; Stillman v. Stillman, 21 N. J. Eq. 126; Hill v. McCarter, 27 N. J. Eq. 41; Harrison v. Guerin, 27 N. J. Eq. 219.

Vredenburg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This controversy concerns the order of sale of parcels of mortgaged premises under foreclosure, and involves the correctness of the decree below in directing certain of the parcels which remain unconveyed by the mortgagor and his executors, to be sold before resort be had to certain previously conveyed parcels, called in the decree the "Second and Third Tracts."

In December, 1870, Absalom B. Woodruff, being seised of a tract of land in Paterson, New Jersey, became indebted to the chancellor of New Jersey in the sum of $13,000, charged a mortgage upon land in a different manner, 'as where, by the terms of sale of a part of the premises, the mortgage is made a common charge, or that part conveyed is subjected to a proportionate part of the encumbrance. In such cases, if there be no specific agreement as to the proportion which each part is to bear, contribution must be made according to the relative value of each part.' 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1625. . . . It is clear, therefore, that, notwithstanding lot 5 was conveyed before lot 4, under the agreement between the parties, it was not relieved from the lien of said trust deed, but remained primarily liable, so far as made so by the terms of said agreement."

And in Briscoe v. Power, 47 Ill. 447, it was held that where the first grantee of part of mortgaged premises expressly takes subject to the mortgage, his portion of such premises is liable to a pro rata share of the encumbrance equally with that of a subsequent grantee who also took subject to such mortgage.

And in Hanes v. Denby, — N. J. Eq. —, 28 Atl. 798, where a part of mortgaged premises were conveyed by a deed of warranty expressly excepting the mortgage, and the balance of the property was later conveyed, it was held that the part first conveyed was chargeable with a proportionate part of the mortgage debt.

But it has been held that the mere recital in a conveyance of part of mortgaged premises that it was subject to the mortgage is not sufficient to constitute such land a primary fund out of which the debt and gave his bond for double that sum in the usual form to the chancellor, conditioned to be void if he (Woodruff) should pay that sum, with interest, upon the happening of the deaths of two named persons (then living, but who have since died), and to secure such payment executed, at the same time, a deed of mortgage covering his said land, containing the same conditions as the bond.

Woodruff died October 11, 1886, but before that event conveyed, by deed of warranty, two separate parcels of the land embraced in the mortgage on the dates following: First, on July 5, 1882, a parcel described in the master's report as the "First Tract," containing 4 acres, to the defendant Joseph Towell; second, on March 5, 1885, another parcel in lots numbered on a map as lots 142, 144 (part of lot 146), 171, 173, and part of lot No. 175, described in the master's report as the "Second Tract," to the said Joseph Towell. After Woodruff's death, his executors, by an executors' deed drawn in the usual form and without covenants of warranty, thirdly, conveyed on February 16, 1887, another parcel of said mortgaged land, described in the master's report as the "Third Tract," being comis to be satisfied. Slater v. Breese, 36 Mich. 77; Hall v. Morgan, 79 Mo. 47.

Effect upon mortgagee's rights.

In Palmer v. Snell, 111 Ill. 161, it was held that the mortgagee could not be compelled to resort to his personal remedy against a grantee of part of the mortgaged premises who assumed the mortgage debt, before resorting to another part of the land subsequently conveyed. The court said: "But even had James T. Snell assumed the payment of the mortgage debt, so as to have given a right of resort to him personally, to the mortgagee for the mortgage debt, the rule here invoked, which compels a first resort to a particular one of two funds for a creditor's benefit who can reach but one of them, would not be applied in such a case as this, so as to require, first, the exhaustion of the personal remedy against Snell. This rule will not be enforced whenever it will trench upon the rights or operate to the prejudice, of the party entitled to the double fund. Sweet v. Redhead, 76 Ill. 374. The mortgagee's right to a prompt foreclosure of his mortgage is not to be impeded by compelling a first resort to any personal remedy the mortgagee may have."

And in Waters v. Hubbard, 44 Conn. 340, it was held that where the mortgagee was entitled to all of the mortgaged property in case the debt was not paid, a decree should not be made first requiring the appropriation of a part of the property conveyed to a grantee who had assumed the payment of the mortgage debt, before taking the remainder of the property. J. T. W.

posed of lots Nos. 140 and 169, in block A, as laid down on a map, to the said Joseph Towell. There was then left unconveyed in the estate of Woodruff lots 139, 141, 143, 145, 149, 151, and part of 153, on the west side of Lilly street, as indicated on said map.

The appellants urge that the above-designated second and third tracts should have been decreed to be sold next after the sale of the said first tract, to pay any deficiency (there being no dispute as to its priority of liability) of the proceeds of sale necessary to satisfy the mortgage debt remaining after the sale of the said first tract, and before resort be had to the said unconveyed lots still owned by the appellants. The decree complained of, on the contrary, orders these unconveyed lots to be sold before the said second and third tracts are exposed to sale; and hence the dispute which is the subject of the present appeal.

In the sale from Woodruff to Joseph Towell, dated July 5, 1882, the latter, in consideration of that conveyance to him, entered into an absolute agreement and covenant, therein set forth next to the description of the parcels conveyed by it, as follows, viz.: "And which is hereby sold subject to a mortgage executed by the said Woodruff to the chancellor of New Jersey, to secure the payment of $13,000 to the said chancellor, with interest, as in said mortgage stated, which mortgage was dated December 16th, 1870, or about that time, and the payment of which said sum of $13,000, with interest, as in said mortgage stated, the said Joseph Towell hereby assumes and covenants for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to and with the said Absalom Woodruff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay off and discharge according to the terms and conditions in said mortgage mentioned, including the buildings, plants, trees, and flowers thereon."

On the same date (July 5, 1882), said Towell, with his wife, executed an indemnifying mortgage to said Woodruff covering the same land and premises conveyed to Towell by the last-mentioned deed, stating in said mortgage "that the premises thereby mortgaged were the same conveyed by said Woodruff to said Towell by said deed subject to said $13,000, and the payment of which said sum of $13,000 secured by said mortgage of $13,000, with interest, was by said Towell assumed; provided always, and said mortgage from said Towell to said Woodruff was therein declared to be, upon the express condition, that if the said Towell, his executors or administrators, did and should well and truly pay or cause to be paid to the chancellor the sum of money and interest secured by said $13,000 mortgage to said chancellor, and indemnify and save harmless the said Woodruff from any payment thereon, according to the condition of a certain bond bearing even date with said mortgage to said Woodruff, executed by said Towell to said Woodruff, then said bond and mortgage of said Towell should be void."

The explicit terms of this mortgage from Towell to Woodruff make assurance doubly sure that the intent of the respective parties executing and accepting these sealed instruments was that Towell assumed thereby, as a part consideration for the land conveyed to him, to pay and discharge all of Woodruff's said mortgage debt to the chancellor, and indemnify Woodruff against its payment.

Incontestably, the consequence, in equity, of such an assumption was that Towell became thereafter, as between himself and his vendor, the principal debtor, and the liability of the vendor, Woodruff, in respect to the mortgage debt, was that of surety. This relationship, established by the covenant of Towell in the deed, was reinforced by the terms of his bond and mortgage, just quoted. By the acceptance of this title, the clause of assumption by Towell in the deed to him became his covenant, and he thereby became bound in law to his grantor to pay the mortgage (Finley v. Simpson, 22 N. J. L. 311, 53 Am. Dec. 252), and liable to him for any deficiency which might exist upon a sale of the mortgaged premises.

In Weatherby v. Slack, 16 N. J. Eq. 493, Chancellor Green said: "The real question in such cases must always be, Who in equity is bound to pay the debt? The debt is due from the mortgagor to the encumbrancers, and his [the mortgagor's] portion of the mortgaged premises must primarily bear the burden, unless it be shown that it has, by some means, been shifted upon the portion of the alienees."

As soon as the debt in question became payable, Woodruff, the surety, had the right to file a bill to compel payment by Towell, the principal debtor, in order that he (the surety) might be relieved from responsibility; and the court will interfere "to compel payment by the principal rather than the surety, in order to enforce the performance of the obvious duty of the principal to protect the surety from a needless burden, and to prevent circuity of action." Irick v. Black, 17 N. J. Eq. 189-197. "The court will interfere, though the principal is perfectly able to respond in damages, and there is no danger of eventual loss." 17 N. J. Eq. 197. In Shannon v. Marselis, 1

N. J. Eq. at page 424, Chancellor Vroom said: "It is the policy and duty of this court to settle and adjust all claims between the parties in one suit, if possible, . . . There can be no good reason assigned why there should be this circuity of action, but a very good one why there should not, which is that the money might be lost to Carrick altogether."

The rule in equity that, where mortgaged premises are sold in separate parcels successively to different purchasers, with covenants against encumbrances, the parcels are liable to sale to satisfy the mortgage, in the inverse order of their sale, "will not be applied in any case where its application would work injustice." Hill v. McCarter, 27 N. J. Eq. 41; Hoy v. Bramhall, 19 N. J. Eq. 563, 97 Am. Dec. 687; Hanes v. Denby, — N. J. Eq. —, 28 Atl. 798.

Prof. Pomeroy, in his Equity Jurisprudence, at page 215, ¶ 1224, of volume 3, states the general rule in equity in this form: "Whenever the mortgagor has conveyed separate parcels of the mortgaged premises by warranty deed to successive grantees, and there was no special provisions in any of their deeds, and no other dealings between themselves or with the mortgagor which disturb the equities otherwise existing, a priority results, depending upon the order of conveyance." But in his next paragraph (1225) he proceeds to consider the dealings between the grantee and the mortgagor which "disturb" those equities and defeat the rule, and says: The doctrine stated in the foregoing paragraph is one of purely equitable origin, and is not an absolute rule of law; and if the peculiar equitable reasons upon which it rests are wanting, it ceases to operate. . . . The equities among successive grantees, as determined by the general doctrine of the preceding paragraph, will therefore be disturbed in the following instances: (1) Whenever a grantee of any parcel either expressly assumes the payment of the mortgage, or his deed is of such a form that he takes the parcel conveyed to himself subject to the mortgage, as a part of the consideration; then, as has already been shown, the parcel thus purchased becomes, in the hands of himself and of those holding under him, primarily chargeable with the mortgage debt as against the mortgagor grantor, and consequently as against all subsequent grantees or other parcels from the mortgagor. By such an express or implied assumption, the doctrine of liability, in the inverse order of alienation, and all of its consequences, are defeated with respect to the mortgagor and the subsequent grantees. (2) In like manner, when the deeds to the successive grantees are not warranty or equivalent thereto, but simply purport to convey the mortgagors right, title, and interest in the parcels, the intention is clear that the grantees respectively assume their portions of the burdens. Their several parcels are all liable ratably, and not in the inverse order."

The record brought up on this appeal shows that in the said deed of March 5, 1886, from Woodruff to Towell, conveying the second tract, there is a clause reading "subject, however, to a mortgage of $13,000 to the chancellor by said Woodruff, on or about December 19, 1870, which said Towell has heretofore assumed and agreed to pay, and that the said Woodruff will warrant, secure, and forever defend the said land and premises unto the said Joseph Towell (except the said mortgage) and his heirs and assigns forever;" and that in the said deed of February 16, 1887, from the executors of Woodruff to Towell, conveying the third tract, there is a clause reciting the terms of a lease given by Woodruff to Towell, and reading in the deed as follows: "Free from all encumbrance except a mortgage of $13,000, given by said Woodruff to the chancellor of New Jersey, and which said mortgage said Towell has already assumed and agreed to pay."

But quite irrespective of the form of these admissions of Towell, in these deeds to him, of his assumption of the mortgage, his obligation to pay the $13,000 mortgage debt already existed and could not thereby be enlarged; and when these second and third tracts were conveyed to him subject to the mortgage, the rule as to sale in the inverse order of alienation ceased, as we have seen by the authorities, to be applicable. The fact that Towell himself became an alienee of the second and third tracts, conveyed to him expressly subject to the mortgage which he had covenanted to pay, is decisive against him upon this question. The holders of the subsequent mortgages from Towell ($5,000 to the chancellor, dated August 29, 1896, and $2,000 to Zabriskie, dated January 31, 1900) can stand certainly in no better position than Towell; when they took their mortgages, the public records then showed them that the lands included in their mortgages were subject to the $13,000 mortgage, and they thus had full notice that those lands must bear the same equitable proportion of the mortgage burden upon the whole tract which Towell was bound to bear.

The decision in the case of Thompson v. Bird, 57 N. J. Eq. 175, 40 Atl. 857, is pointed authority in this state in support of the position that the rule as to sale in the inverse order of alienation is inap-plicable to cases like the present. It was there held, as to the mortgagor's lands remaining in him after his conveyance of a part, that, "where a purchaser of a part of mortgaged premises assumes the payment of all or a portion of the mortgage on the whole of such premises, the land so purchased is liable for the mortgage debt, or such portion of it assumed by the purchaser, before the remaining portion of the mortgaged premises held by the mortgagor, or by subsequent purchasers from the mortgagor, can be sold in satisfaction of the mortgage debt."

Justice Reed, sitting as vice chancellor in that case, thus defines (57 N. J. Eq. at page 177) the true rule and its reason in characteristically clear language, as follows: "But if any purchaser of a part of mortgaged premises, instead of bargaining for a clear title, chooses to assume the payment of all or a part of an encumbrance upon the whole of such premises, such purchaser cannot equitably ask that the remaining portion shall be first sold to answer the mortgage debt, for it is apparent that after such person gets the land from a mortgagor at a less price on account of the encumbrances, the payment of which he assumes, he cannot ask that the land of the mortgagor shall be sold to relieve his own land of the debt which he has promised to pay as a part of the consideration for his purchase." The decree there was that the mortgagor's remaining land should be sold last. The cases cited (57 N. J. Eq. on page 178) in the opinion fully sustain its conclusions. Among them are the very early decisions in this state of Engle v. Haines, 5 N. J. Eq. 186, 43 Am. Dec. 624; Wikoff v. Davis, 4 N. J. Eq. 224, and others which have been followed to the present time as leading authorities upon the subject.

Both reason and authority lead us, therefore, to hold that, the defendant Towell having agreed as part consideration for the purchase of the first tract, to relieve Woodruff from liability to pay either the whole or any part of the mortgage debt himself, Woodruff's estate is entitled to compel him to perform that contract. It is plain that if it should in the future be necessary to sell that part of the mortgaged premises still remaining in the Woodruff estate, for the purpose of satisfying any part of the mortgage debt, that estate would be entitled to call upon Towell to make good the loss which would have fallen upon it by reason of his breach of his contract of assumption. Towell has therefore no right to have any part of the Woodruff lands sold to satisfy the $13,000 mortgage; and consequently all the property which he holds by 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) conveyance from Woodruff or from Woodruff's estate, which is subject to the mortgage, should be first exhausted for the purpose of satisfying the mortgage debt. This course would avoid circuity of action, and this the court, for obvious reasons, regards as a duty which it is always anxious to accomplish.

The decree below should be reversed to the extent required to conform to these views.

White, J., concurring:

The equitable doctrine of "inverse order of alienation," as applied to the order of sale of several parcels of a tract of land covered by a foreclosing encumbrance, is, as I view it, depending upon the payment of the considerations for the parcels conveyed, and arises because it would be inequitable for the mortgagor grantor, who had already received the full consideration for the parcel conveyed, to call upon such parcel to contribute towards the payment of his mortgaged debt until his remaining mortgaged land had been first exhausted. Of course, there may be other reasons than nonpayment of consideration for the express assumption by the conveyed parcel of a part or all of the mortgage debt; but, in the absence of such express assumption, the payment or nonpayment of the consideration furnishes, in my judgment, the real, underlying, and substantial bases for the application, or nonapplication of this equity, rather than the presence or absence of a covenant warranting title. Of course, a warranty of title against the mortgage will give rise to the application of the equity; but obviously there would be no warranty of title if a part of the consideration was to be the payment by the conveyed parcels of the mortgage debt; and, on the other hand, the mere absence of an express warranty of title against the mortgage encumbrance, if there had in fact been a payment of the full consideration for the conveyed parcel, would not defeat the real reason for the equity, and consequently, as it seems to me, would not defeat the application of the equitable doctrine under consideration. In other words, if the grantee of the conveyed parcel expressly assumes the payment of the mortgage debt, such assumption obviously enters into the consideration for the conveying, and defeats the application of the rule or equity of inverse order of alienation. So, if it appears in any other way that the consideration, in whole or in part, was not paid because of the parcel being conveyed subject to the lien of the mortgage debt, the rule is also defeated to the extent of such nonpayment of consideration. But, if it appears that the full consideration for the conveyed parcel was actually paid to the mortgagor grantor, the grantee is entitled to call upon the remaining mortgaged land owned by the mortgagor grantor, to pay the mortgage debt before the conveyed parcel shall be attacked, and this quite irrespective of the nonexistence of any express covenant of warranty of title. This is my understanding of the doctrine laid down by Pomeroy (§§ 1224 and 1225) and by Mr. Justice Reed in Thompson v. Bird, 57 N. J. Eq. 175, 40 Atl. 857.

Assuming that the language of these conveyances sufficiently establishes the payment of the full consideration, this view would lead, it seems to me, to an affirmance of the vice chancellor's decision, if there were no express assumption of the mortgage debt in the conveyances of tracts second and third in this case, because I cannot see how the doctrine of "avoidance of circuity of action" could have the effect against the second mortgagee of interposing before his lien the personal obligation of Towell upon the collateral bond which the latter gave when he purchased tract first. As was said by Mr. Justice Garrison in Marsden v. White, 71 N. J. Eq. 224-229, 65 Atl. 181, 183, quoting from Atlantic Coast Brewing Co. v. Clement, 59 N. J. L. 48, 35 Atl. 647: "Avoidance of circuity of action is at best a doctrine of convenience,—a secondary equity, so to speak,—and not to be resorted to in the face of either legal rule or substantial right."

If, therefore, the case were bare of other circumstance than the fact that Towell is the same person who assumed the payment of the mortgage debt as part of the consideration for the first tract conveyed to him, and gave a personal collateral bond conditioned upon his paying such debt, I should think the payment by him to the mortgagor grantor of the full consideration for the second and third tracts would entitle his second mortgagee to require the sale of the mortgagor grantor's remaining land before said tracts were called upon.

There was, however, another important circumstance connected with the conveyances of these two tracts. They were not only conveyed subject to the lien of the mortgage, but it was expressly stated in the conveyances that this was done purposely, because the grantee, Towell, had already assumed the payment of the mortgage debt. This statement, it seems to me, in view of the fact that the mortgage was a lien upon the tracts, constituted an express extension of the previous assumption upon the first tract to the second and third tracts. It was in effect an assertion by the mortgagor grantor, "I will not remove the lien of the mortgage debt from these two tracts, as my acceptance of the full consideration would otherwise oblige me to do, because the burden is upon you to do so as a result of our previous transactions," and it was an agreement by the grantee that the mortgagor grantor should not be called upon to so remove it; but, on the contrary, he (the grantee) should be subject to the burden of either doing so, or holding these two tracts, also, in addition to the first tract, subject to the burden of the whole mortgage debt. This being so, of course, the second mortgagee took with full notice, and can no more invoke an equity expressly bargained away than his mortgagor, who bargained it away, could invoke it.

I concur in the reversal, therefore, but for the reasons above stated.

Garrison, J., concurring:

My vote to reverse is based solely upon the equitable rule stated by Prof. Pomeroy in the concluding paragraph of § 1225 of his work on Equity Jurisprudence, and quoted at length by Judge Vredenburg in his opinion.

The deeds on record at the time the second mortgage was taken gave notice, by their terms, of the equities subsisting between the mortgagor and his grantee, by which the direct, and not the inverse, order of alienation obtained. This was notice that the second mortgagee would have no right to marshal securities as against the land not included in his mortgage. The decree, giving such right to the second mortgagee, who was also the holder of the first mortgage, was therefore erroneous.

session of insured property is effected within the meaning of a provision on the policy avoiding it in case of such change, by the appointment of a receiver in bankruptcy proceedings, who, without dispossessing the owner, places a watchman upon the property, effects insurance thereon, and advertises the personal property for sale.

(January 2, 1912.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas Number 4, for Allegheny County, in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Carnahan, J., in the trial court as follows:

The plaintiff, Marcello, was the owner in 1908 of a lot of ground near Bridgeville, Allegheny county, having thereon a two-story frame, slate-roof building, occupied by him as a storeroom and dwelling, and a three-story frame, slate-roof building, with addition; also occupied as a storeroom and dwelling.

On June, 2, 1908, the defendant company, in consideration of a premium paid, issued to him its policy of fire insurance for $1,500 on the three-story building "while occupied as a private dwelling house and storeroom," and on August 29, 1908, the same company, in consideration of a premium paid, issued to him its policy of fire insurance for $1,000 on the two-story building "while occupied as a grocery and dwelling house." Each of these policies was for a period of one year from its date; and in each other insurance was permitted.

The buildings were destroyed by fire on December 25, 1908. Proofs of loss were duly furnished, payment was refused, and an action of assumpsit was brought to recover on the policies. An affidavit of defense was filed, and a rule was taken for judgment for want of a sufficient defense, which rule was duly heard and discharged. The parties now submit a case stated.

Each of the policies provided, inter alia that it should be null and void, and of no effect, "if, with the knowledge of the insured, foreclosure proceedings be commenced, or notice given of sale of any property covered by this insurance by virtue of any mortgage or trust deed; or if any change, other than by the death of an insured, take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard), whether by legal process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured or otherwise, or if this policy be assigned before a loss, or if illuminating gas or vapor be generated in the described building (or adjacent thereto) for use therein." No waiver or modification of any of the above provisions and conditions was ever made.

On December 9, 1908, an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed by creditors of Marcello against him in the United States court for the western district of Pennsylvania. On December 12, 1908, Marcello, in writing, waived service of a subpoena in bankruptcy. On December 17, 1908, a petition for the appointment of a receiver of the property of Marcello was filed, and, as respects said petition, there was a second written waiver by Marcello of the service of a subpoena or notice upon him. On December 17, 1908, the South Side Trust Company was appointed "receiver of all the assets and property, of every kind and character, belonging to said bankrupt." On December 18, 1908, the receiver gave bond, which was duly approved and filed on the same day, and thereupon, December 18, 1908, the receiver took possession of the property covered by these two policies of insurance, and placed a watchman upon it. On December 19, 1908, the receiver took out policies of fire insurance issued by various companies to the amount of $9,000 upon the same property covered by these two policies. Marcello, before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, had, in addition to the two policies in suit, taken out other policies of several companies on said property; his entire insurance on the same being $9,000. On December 21, 23, and 24, 1908, the receiver advertised the personal property of Marcello for sale on December 31, 1908. On December 25, 1908, the buildings and their contents were destroyed by fire. The receiver's watchman was on the property at the time of the fire, and Marcello was living in one of the dwellings, not having been dispossessed by the receiver. Marcello's policies, including the two in suit, had not been canceled. On December 29, 1908, Marcello was adjudged a bankrupt. No notice of the bankruptcy proceedings, nor of the appointment of a receiver, was given to the defendant company; nor did it ever consent to the "changed conditions," as set forth in the case stated.

The sole question in the case is whether there was such a change in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance as to terminate the policies. It does not appear among the facts submitted and expressly agreed to that the change was "a change of occupants without increase of hazard," or otherwise; nor does it appear that the receiver had no such title as to enable it to take out new policies of insurance; nor that it was not empowered to sell and dispose of the personal property, as it had announced its intention by advertisement to do.

The bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418, authorizes the appointment "of receivers, or the marshals, upon application of parties in interest, in case the courts shall find it absolutely necessary for the preservation of estates to take charge of the property of bankrupts, after the filing of the petition, and until it is dismissed, or the trustee is qualified." The title to the property of the alleged bankrupt remains in him until adjudication, subject to the control of the court, to be exercised either by a receiver, or the marshal, if otherwise the interests of the creditors are not sufficiently protected. Re Laplume Condensed Milk Co. (D. C.) 145 Fed. 1013.

The duty required and the power conferred clearly are that the receiver, or the marshal, should take possession of property that would otherwise go to waste, and hold it and preserve it, so that it might come to the trustee, when selected, without needless injury. Boonville Nat. Bank v. Blakey, 47 C. C. A. 43, 107 Fed. 891.

As a general rule, no order of sale should be made until after adjudication, unless the property is of such a nature that a sale is necessary to preserve its value. Re T. L. Kelly Dry-Goods Co. (D. C.) 102 Fed. 747; Re Garner (D. C.) 153 Fed. 914; Re Harris (D. C.) 155 Fed. 216.

A receiver in bankruptcy is a mere custodian, and has no title to the property of the bankrupt. 2 Foster, Fed. Pr. 4th ed. 1815.

"In general, the receiver in a bankrupt proceeding is a caretaker and custodian of the property of the bankrupt, and is not a trustee for the creditors. . . . In an involuntary proceeding, the duty of the receiver, who conducts the business of the bankrupt, is to maintain, as far as possible, the continuity of his affairs, so that, if no adjudication is made, his property and business may be returned to him with the least possible damage." Alderson, Receivers, 361.

From the above-recited authorities, it appears that, while the receiver might be justified in advertising for sale and selling the personal property, and doubtless would be, if so authorized and directed by order of the court, it would have no authority to sell the real estate; and that, as respects title to the real estate, it was in the bankrupt at the time of the destruction of the buildings by fire, and until adjudication. Whether or not the receiver had such insurable interest in the buildings as to enable it to take out new policies of insurance on them, as it did, is not a question which calls for decision in this case.

Had the fire occurred after the adjudication of Marcello as a bankrupt, and especially after the appointment of a trustee for the benefit of creditors, qualification of the trustee, and that taking of actual possession by the trustee, the question here presented could not have arisen. But, under the circumstances, it cannot be said that it is one which involves mere technicality. It comes naturally from the contracts of insurance and the facts agreed upon; and the insurance company is entitled to have it fully considered and passed upon by the courts.

The receiver did take possession of the premises. It placed a watchman upon them. The watchman was there, in personal charge of the property, both real estate and personalty, at the time of the fire. The receiver did not lease them to a tenant; it did not dispossess the bankrupt, who was living upon them. He was allowed to remain; and he was there at the time of the fire. As a further act of possession, it reinsured the property in its own name for creditors; and, as a further act of possession, it advertised the personal property for sale. Its possession was complete in the sense that it had absolute charge of the property, and actually occupied it, without notice to or knowledge of this defendant.

The safety of the insurer is dependent much upon the character of the assured, not alone upon his integrity and good faith, but upon his habits of carefulness, of prudence, and vigilance. It is obvious that the danger of fire may be much less when the assured is a man watchful and provident than where he is heedless and negligent, as well as dishonest. The provision, therefore, which requires assignment of a policy to be made with the consent of the insurers, and to be approved by them, is not unmeaning. Nor is its purpose to stipulate for a new contract with the assignee. It is designed rather to afford substantial protection to the underwriters, by enabling them to preserve, during the continuance of the risk, the safeguards which existed at its origin, those found in the honesty and watchfulness of the assured. It was for this reason that it was early laid down that a fire policy could not be assigned, pending the risk, so as to give the assignee any interest in it whatsoever, either legal or equitable. Lord Chancellor

King, Lynch v. Dalzell, 4 Bro. P. C. 431. Such a policy has indeed, in some of the later cases, been held assignable in equity, with the subject itself, when it contained no provision to the contrary; and it is on that account that the prohibition to assign has been generally introduced. State Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Roberts, 31 Pa. 438.

It was not contemplated by the parties to the contracts that mere change of occupancy should vitiate them, because change "in the interest, title, or possession" is expected in case of "death of an insured," and likewise "change of occupants without increase of hazard." The word "possession," as used in the policies, seems to have a broader significance than any that could be gathered from the words "occupant," "occupancy," or "occupation." Such is the view taken by the superior court in a case involving the consideration of a policy of insurance which contained this provision: "This entire policy . . . shall be void . . . if any change, other than by the death of the insured, takes place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard), whether by legal process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured or otherwise." The court says, inter alia: "We are not aware that the precise question here involved has been decided in this state. But there is a decision in Rumsey v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (C. C.) 17 Blatchf. 527, 1 Fed. 396, by the United States circuit court of appeals for the northern district of New York, opinion by Judge Wallace, which seems to decide this question. In that case, the policy provided that it should be void 'if the property be sold or transferred, or any change take place in the title or possession, whether by legal process, judicial decree, voluntary transfer, or conveyance.' The court said in that case: 'The fact that Zimmer moved out of the dwelling house and let it to tenants is not a defense, within the conditions that avoid the policy "if any change takes place in title or possession." The change of possession contemplated is something more than a change of occupation; it is a change effected "by legal process, judicial decree, voluntary transfer, or conveyance;" one which refers to his possessory right, and not to the occupancy of the insured. The possession of Zimmer's tenants was his possession, within the meaning of the policy.' In our opinion, the proper legal, as well as reasonable, construction of the word reasonable, construction of the word 'possession,' as used in the policy in the present case, limits it to legal possession, or possessory right. . . .

'Where the terms of a policy are susceptible, without violence, of two interpretations, that construction which is most favorable to the insured, in order to indemnify him against loss sustained, should be adopted.' Humphreys v. National Ben. Asso. 139 Pa. 264, 11 L.R.A. 564, 20 Atl. 1047. In the present policy, the word 'occupation' seems to be used to indicate actual possession or occupancy, and the word 'possession,' as used with the words 'interest' and 'title' in the clause in question, seems to mean legal possession, or possessory right, and, in accordance with the doctrine above quoted, these words should be so construed as to indemnify the insured against the loss sustained. . . . We do not find that there was any change in the possession, except the physical occupancy of the premises, which is not forbidden by the term of the policy of insurance." McGinnis v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 390.

We regard the above-quoted authority as decisive of the question now submitted; and therefore, the receiver having no possessory right, but being merely a caretaker, pending adjudication in bankruptcy, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The bankruptcy proceeding was involuntary on his part; and it is not material that he had knowledge of it, or that he waived the service of notices connected with its progress.

The decision here reached can hardly be said to work a hardship upon the defendant company. It is not deprived of any right or privileges contemplated at the time the policies were issued. It is not claimed that the hazard was increased. On the contrary, it seems to have been lessened, or at least the tendency was to lessen it. The occupancy of the insured was not disturbed, and both he and the receiver's watchman were on the premises at the time of the fire. What was said in this respect in Fuller v. New York F. Ins. Co. 184 Mass. 12, 67 N. E. 879, namely, "The rights and obligations of the receiver tended to add to, and not diminish, the care and oversight of the insured property, and could in no way increase the risk, or alter it to the detriment of the insurer," is quite applicable here, although in that case the assured had been adjudged a bankrupt, and a receiver, who had been designated, had not qualified; nor had he taken actual possession. Later he did qualify, and still later a trustee was appointed.

In further support of the views here entertained are the cases of Fuller v. New York F. Ins. Co. supra, and Fuller v. Jameson, 98 App. Div. 53, 90 N. Y. Supp.

456. As against them, the defendant cites and confidently relies upon a case entitled Re Hamilton, decided by the United States district court in Arkansas, and reported in 102 Fed. 683. The policy of insurance there considered contained provisions respecting a change in the "interest, title, or possession" of the subject of insurance, similar to the provisions of these policies; and in the opinion of the court are certain dicta in which are expressed substantially the view taken by defendant here; namely, that possession of the receiver before adjudication in bankruptcy was such a change of possession as brought about a cancelation of the policy. But the policy, which was a renewal, was assigned by the assured to the receiver, with the written consent of the insurance company; and the question before the court was whether a bank, which had received the original policy as a pledge for the payment of a debt by the assured, was entitled to claim the renewal as a continuation of the pledge under the terms of the original agreement with the assured. The point decided was that "the assignment of the policy to the receiver, with the consent of the company, operated as a new and substantive contract by which the rights of the bank, as pledgee, were terminated."

We do not regard this case as an authority upon the question presented here; but, if we are mistaken in this respect, it need only be said that the decisions of our own state are binding upon us.

MARTHA J. GREEN

v.

NANCY K. GREEN, Appt.

(147 Ky. 608, 144 S. W. 1073.)

Insurance — benefit — effect of divorce.

1. A woman who divorces her husband, who has named her as beneficiary in a mutual benefit certificate, forfeits her rights thereunder where the statute provides that payment of such certificate shall be only to families, heirs, blood relatives, affianced husband, or affianced wife, or to persons dependent on the member.

Same — affianced wife — redesignation.

2. Designation of a divorced wife who has promised to remarry a holder of a mutual benefit certificate, as beneficiary, is necessary to give her the right to the proceeds as an affianced wife, where the designation in her favor as wife was annulled by the divorce.

(March 16, 1912.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Grayson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought Note. — Effect of divorce on rights of beneficiary under insurance policy or benefit certificate.

The earlier cases upon this question are collated in the note to Wallace v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 478, the present note merely being supplementary thereto.

As is indicated in the earlier note, the general rule is that a wife's interest as beneficiary in an ordinary life insurance policy is not affected by a divorce. This rule was adhered to in Begley v. Miller, 137 Ill. App. 278, wherein it was said that "the decree of divorce in no way affected the rights of the divorced wife in the policy as the beneficiary named in it, or her authority to demand and receive the amount payable in virtue of its terms." And Blum v. New York L. Ins. Co. 197 Mo. 513, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 923, 95 S. W. 317, 7 Ann. Cas. 1021, is to the same effect.

In some jurisdictions, however, it has been provided by statute that insurance pol-to recover the amount of a mutual benefit certificate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. C. Graham, Charles V. Higdon, and O'Doherty & Yontz for appellant.

Messrs. Charles P. Johnson and J. M. Campbell for appellee.

Clay, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

Joseph T. Green was a member in good standing of the Modern Woodmen of America, a fraternal insurance society. On August 8, 1908, the society issued to him a benefit certificate for $1,000, wherein appellant, Nancy K. Green, then his wife, was named as beneficiary. In January, 1910, appellant, Nancy K. Green, obtained a divorce from Joseph T. Green. On August 30, 1910, Joseph T. Green died. The Modern Woodmen of America is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Illinois, with power to conduct a fraternal life insurance business. It is under the supervision of a grand or supreme body, and procures members through the lodge system exclusively. It pays no commissions and employs no agents, except in the organization of the local or subordinate lodges or council.

The laws of Illinois, under which the society was incorporated, provide as follows:

"Payment of death benefits shall only be paid to the families, heirs, blood relations, affianced husband or affianced wife held for the benefit of the insured's wife shall inure to her separate benefit, provided that in case of her death or divorcement the insured shall have the right to designate another beneficiary. Under a statute such as this it was held in Haven v. Home Ins. Co. 149 Mo. App. 291, 130 S. W. 73, that the wife could not prevent the insured's changing the beneficiary after a divorce, even though obtained by her for his fault. But the enactment of such a statute does not impair vested rights of a married woman in a paid-up insurance policy in her favor on her husband's life. Blum v. New York L. Ins. Co. supra.

As regards mutual benefit certificates, the general rule is that where the statutes or the laws of the organization require the beneficiary to be, at the time of maturity of the certificate, either the wife or a member of the assured's family or dependent upon him, a divorce terminates the wife's rights. See cases in earlier note and Green v. Knights & Ladies of Security, — Ky. —, 144 S. W. 1076, which follows GREEN v. GREEN; and Dahlin v. Knights of Modern Maccabees, 151 Mich. 644, 115 N. W. 975, holding a divorced wife not to be a "widow."

But where the restriction to a class is construed to mean that a proper relationship must exist at the time of selection, divorce does not terminate the wife's rights, especially where the assured has a right to but does not change the beneficiary. Schmidt v. Hauer, 139 Iowa, 531, 111 N. W. 966. See also Snyder v. Supreme Ruler, F. M. C. 122 Tenn. 248, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 122 S. W. 981.

And where there is nothing in the contract of insurance, by-laws, or regulations which requires the beneficiary to belong to a special class or disqualifies a wife as a beneficiary in the event of her divorcement, she is not thereby rendered ineligible to receive the death benefit. Thus in Farra v. Brame, 171 Ind. 520, 86 N. E. 843 (but see decision in appellate court, as reported in 82 N. E. 926, on rehearing 84 N. E. 155), where the rules of the society did not require that the beneficiary be confined to the relatives or family of the assured, it was 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

held that a decree of divorce in his favor did not of itself deprive the wife of her rights as his beneficiary. In arriving at this conclusion the court said: "It may be conceded that by the divorce in question the relation of husband and wife was terminated, and the wife was no longer a relative or dependent of her former husband, and in the event of his death could not in any sense be regarded as his heir; but it does not follow that from the mere fact of the divorce alone she was thereby disqualified as a beneficiary and deprived of the benefits provided for by the insurance certificate. Of course, the relief department [assurance society] might have provided, either in the contract of insurance or in its by-laws, rules, and regulations, that in the event the wife of the insured, whom he had designated as his beneficiary, should be divorced from him, such divorce should terminate her rights as a beneficiary and deprive her of the death benefits. This, however, was not done, for we discover no provision to that effect, either in the application, certificate, by-laws, or regulations of the department. Under the circumstances, there is nothing which will require a court to read such a condition or provision into the contract of insurance here involved. In view of the by-laws, rules, and regulations, it certainly is not tenable to argue that no one but relatives of the assured, members of his family, or dependents can be lawfully designated by him as . . . it may be asserted that neither the rules of the relief department nor the provisions of the insurance contract in question limit or confine the appointment of a beneficiary by an applicant to members of his family or his relatives, or to others who are dependent upon him for support."

For a treatment of the general question as to who takes under designation of "husband," "wife," or "widow," see the note to Meeker v. Draffen, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 825.

As to the effect in general of statute permitting change of beneficiary as affecting rights of beneficiary under policy previously issued, see note to Blum v. New York L. Ins. Co. 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 923. G. J. C.

of or to persons dependent upon the member." Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1909, chap. 73, § 258.

The by-laws of the society contain the following provisions:

"Sec. 45. Benefit certificates shall be made payable only to the wife, surviving children, or some other person or persons specifically named in said benefit certificate as beneficiary, who are related to the member as heir, blood relative, or person dependent upon him or member of his family whom the applicant shall designate in his application. No payment shall be made upon any benefit certificate to any person who does not bear such relationship as wife, surviving child, heir, blood relative, or person dependent upon or member of the family of the member at the time of his death.

Sec. 46. If the death of a beneficiary of any member heretofore or hereafter adopted shall occur prior to the death of such member, or in the event of the disqualification of the beneficiary under the provisions of § 45 hereof, and if such member has failed to have another beneficiary named as provided in § 47 hereof, then the amount to be paid under the benefit certificate shall be payable to the surviving beneficiaries, if any there be, or if no beneficiaries survive him, then to the widow; if no widow, to his children, including his legally adopted children, and in case there are deceased children or child, the children or child of such shall take the share of such deceased parent; if no children or child of the deceased children or child, to the mother; if no mother, to the father; if no father, to the brothers and sisters, share and share alike, and in case there are deceased brothers or sisters, then to the children or child of such, who shall take the share of such deceased parent; if no brothers or sisters or children or child of any deceased brother or sister, then to the next of kin, who would be the distributees of the personal estate of the member upon his death intestate according to the laws of the state wherein said member resided at the time of his death."

"Sec. 49. The contract for beneficial membership between the society and its beneficial members shall include the application for beneficial membership, the medical examination furnished by the applicant, the benefit certificate issued thereupon, and the by-laws of the society as they exist at the time of the issuance of the certificate, or as they may be thereafter amended, modified, or changed; all with the same force and effect as written into the face of the benefit certificate. This provision shall be construed not only to govern the rights and conduct of the member, but also to determine the financial liability of the member to the society, and of the society to the member and his beneficiary or beneficiaries."

This action was instituted by Martha J. Green, the mother of the decedent member, against the Modern Woodmen of America and Nancy K. Green, for the purpose of recovering the proceeds of the benefit certificate. In addition to setting forth the above facts, the petition charged that Nancy K. Green and James T. Green were divorced, and that they entered into a written contract by which James T. Green transferred to Nancy K. Green certain property, money, etc., which she agreed to and did accept in full satisfaction of all claims she then had or might have to any part of his property. The petition further alleged that the decedent had no children, or child or descendant of any child, at the time of his death; that his father was dead at the time; that he had not adopted any child; and that appellee, as his mother, was entitled to the proceeds of the benefit certificate. The Modern Woodmen of America paid the proceeds of the certificate into court to abide the result of the suit. Appellant, Nancy K. Green, filed an answer in two paragraphs. In the first paragraph she denied that appellee, Martha J. Green, was entitled to the proceeds of the certificate, and in the second paragraph she alleged, in substance, that under the terms of the decedent's contract with the Modern Woodmen of America he had the right expressly reserved to him to change the beneficiary in the certificate, and to name another and different beneficiary, but that he declined and refused to do so, and elected to keep the certificate in force for appellant's benefit. She further alleged that, while she had instituted an action for and obtained a divorce from James T. Green, she had done so only after he had persevered in a course of misconduct towards her, and after he had failed to discharge any of the duties incumbent upon him as a husband, and he well understood that the proceedings were only had as the last resort; that she did not in fact desire any separation; that after the divorce was granted he changed his course of conduct and living, and there came into existence between them a tacit agreement to the effect that, as soon as he showed that he intended in good faith to reform his course of living, they would be reunited in the bonds of matrimony; and that such an agreement was in force at and for a long time prior to his death. Appellant also fled a demurrer to the petition, and moved to strike out the allegations in reference to the settlement between her and her husband. Thereafter, appellant amended her answer and counterclaim, and alleged, in substance, that at and a long time prior to the death of James T. Green, she was the affianced wife of James T. Green, and that he had expressly desired that the proceeds of said policy should come to her, and he meant and intended said policy should be for her benefit, and frequently so declared in the presence of divers persons, and designated and intended the same to be a legacy to her, and with this purpose and view elected not to change the beneficiary named in the policy, and allowed same to remain payable to appellant, and that the agreement was well understood between them at and when the divorce was granted, and was continued thereafter up to and until his death. Appellant's demurrer to the petition and motion to strike were overruled. Appellee's demurrers to the second paragraph of appellant's original answer and to the second paragraph of her amended answer were sustained, and, appellant having declined to plead further, judgment was entered in favor of appellee, Martha J. Green. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

For appellant, it is insisted that, as the law of the state of Illinois provides that death benefit may be made to the affianced wife of a member, the allegations of the second paragraph of her amended answer are sufficient to show her right of recovery. In the case of mutual benefit societies it is the rule that, when the classes of persons to whom benefits may be paid are prescribed by statute or by the society's charter of incorporation, neither the society nor the member, nor both combined, can divert the funds. 29 Cyc. 108; Kentucky Masonic Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 13 Bush. 489. In the case of old line insurance companies, a number of courts hold that, unless the contract provides to the contrary, the designation of a beneficiary, valid in its inception, remains so, although the insurable interest or relationship of the beneficiary has ceased; consequently it is held that the wife's interest in an ordinary policy of insurance payable to her is not affected by a divorce. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 46 Conn. 79, 33 Am. Rep. 14; McKee v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 28 Mo. 383, 75 Am. Dec. 129; Overhiser v. Overhiser, 63 Ohio St. 77, 50 L.R.A. 552, 81 Am. St. Rep. 612, 57 N. E. 965; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251. In the last-mentioned case the parties were divorced and each remarried. Upon the death of the husband, the court carried the doctrine to the extent of holding that the divorced wife, who was named as beneficiary in the policy, was entitled to the proceeds of the policy in preference to the lawful widow, because she had an insurable interest when the policy was taken out. Other courts, failing to notice the distinction between ordinary insurance companies and fraternal societies, have applied the same rule in the case of the mutual benefit insurance, and have based their opinions upon the authority of the rule laid down in cases where only ordinary insurance policies were involved. Courtois v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 135 Cal. 557, 87 Am. St. Rep. 137, 67 Pac. 970; Wist v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 22 Or. 271, 29 Am. St. Rep. 603, 29 Pac. 610; Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Burkhart, 110 Ind. 189, 10 N. E. 79, 11 N. E. 449; White v. Brotherhood of American Yeoman, 124 Iowa, 293, 66 L.R.A. 164, 104 Am. St. Rep. 323, 99 N. W. 1071, 2 Ann. Cas. 350.

On the other hand, a number of the courts make a distinction between policies in an ordinary insurance company and certificates in a mutual benefit society, and hold in the case of the latter that, if the insured designates as beneficiary a member of his family, the subsequent separation of the family relationship, before the insured's death, defeats the beneficiary's right to the fund, and that, where the wife is named as a beneficiary, her right to the benefit is defeated by an absolute divorce. Knights of Columbus v. Rowe, 70 Conn. 545, 40 Atl. 451; Larkin v. Knights of Columbus, 188 Mass. 22, 73 N. E. 850; 1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. 3d ed. § 243; Kirkpatrick v. Modern Woodmen, 103 Ill. App. 468; Tyler v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Asso. 145 Mass. 134, 13 N. E. 360; Williams's Appeal, 92 Pa. 69; Schonfield v. Turner, 75 Tex. 324, 7 L.R.A. 189, 12 S. W. 626; Norwegian Old People's Home Soc. v. Wilson, 176 Ill. 94, 52 N. E. 41. And it is also held that if a member names his fiancée as beneficiary, the breaking off of the engagement defeats the interest of the beneficiary. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Child, 70 Mich. 163, 38 N. W. 1.

Without approving of the rule applied by some courts in the case of ordinary life insurance companies, we are of the opinion that there is every reason why a different rule should prevail in the case of mutual benefit societies. The latter are organized for the benefit of the members, their families, and those dependent upon them. To permit the benefits to be paid to those who at one time sustained such relation, but did not sustain that relation at the time of the member's death, would be to frustrate the purpose of the society. In other words, to entitle one to receive the proceeds of a certificate in a fraternal society, he must, unless the contract or charter and by-laws provide otherwise, bear the required relation at the time of the member's death. That being true, we are of the opinion that the divorce operated to revoke the designation of appellant as the beneficiary in the certificate in question, and to substitute decedent's mother in her place.

If the insured thereafter desired that appellant, as his affianced wife, should become the beneficiary of the certificate, it was necessary for him to do some affirmative act, by which she, as his affianced wife, was designated as the beneficiary. Her appointment as beneficiary having been revoked by the divorce, a subsequent agreement between her and her divorced husband to marry again did not have the effect of reinstating the appointment. In such a case there must be not only a promise to marry, but a new designation of the affianced wife as the beneficiary of the policy. As the allegations of appellant's answer and amended answer do not bring her case within the rule above announced, it follows that the demurrers thereto were properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAM H. MURPHY

and

CHARLES H. TENNEY, Trustee.

(76 N. H. 338, 82 Atl. 720.)

Bulk sale — following profits — right.

Creditors of one who sells a stock of merchandise in bulk for an adequate consideration, without complying with the provisions of the bulk sales law, cannot hold the vendee liable for the value of the property, as trustee, although the statute provides that such sale shall be fraudulent and void as against creditors.

(March 5, 1912.)

EXCEPTIONS by the defendant trustee to a judgment of the Superior Court for Merrimack County charging him for the value of a stock of goods sold by the principal defendant to him, for which he paid an adequate consideration. Sustained.

Defendant Murphy kept a pool room in Concord in which he had a stock of goods. The defendant trustee purchased them in bulk, paying therefor $136.12. He afterwards disposed of them in the regular course of trade. At the time of the sale defendants did not know of the bulk sales law and did not comply with its provisions. The trustee was held chargeable by the court for $136.12, and he excepted.

"The courts look with favor upon the rights of creditors and will afford them every remedy and facility to detect and defeat any effort to defraud them of their just rights. And courts of law and courts of equity generally have concurrent jurisdiction in the matter of affording relief against fraudulent conveyances by debtors." 20 Cyc. 655.

Remedy at law.

Where a sale of goods has been made without compliance with the provisions of a bulk sales statute making such sale void or voidable as to creditors of the seller, it seems clear that a creditor of the seller may pursue any legal process against the property in the hands of the purchaser or transferee, as if no sale or transfer had been made; and it has been held that any single creditor of one who has sold a stock of merchandise in violation of the bulk sales law may, without the co-operation of other creditors, attack the sale by procuring a levy upon the goods sold, as the property of the vendor, of an execution issued upon a judgment in his favor and against the vendor, his debtor. Wilson v. Edwards, 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 295.

And the levy, on behalf of a creditor, of an execution issued upon a judgment against one who has sold a stock of merchandise in violation of the bulk sales law, upon the goods sold, as the property of the vendor, is an appropriate proceeding to invalidate the sale, within the meaning of a provision of the bulk sales statute that proceedings at law or equity must be brought against the purchaser to invalidate the sale within ninety days from the consummation thereof. Dickinson v. Harbison, 78 N. J. L. 97, 72 Atl. 941; Wilson v. Edwards, supra.

So, also, a creditor of one who has sold a stock of goods in violation of a bulk sales statute which declares such a sale to be fraudulent against the creditors of the vendor may proceed by attachment against the vendor as a fraudulent debtor (Knight v. Stephen Putney Shoe Co. 137 Ga. 493, 73 S. E. 740); and no title having passed to the vendee as against the creditor, the goods which were the subject-matter of such sale are subject to attachment at the suit of the creditor as the property of the vendor (W. B. Parham & Co. v. Potts-Thompson Liquor Co. 127 Ga. 303, 56 S. E. 460).

And this remedy by attachment against the debtor affords the creditor an adequate legal remedy, where the sale is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent, and is therefore inoperative and void as to creditors of the vendor, upon the grounds of fraud. Carstarphen Warehouse Co. v. Fried, 124 Ga. 544, 52 S. E. 598.

Likewise, a creditor of one who has sold his stock of goods in violation of a bulk sales act which makes such a sale void as against the creditors of the seller is entitled to maintain garnishment proceedings against the purchaser for the enforcement of the law. Musselman Grocer Co. v. Kidd, D. & P. Co. 161 Mich. 478, 115 N. W. 409; Marquette County Sav. Bank v. Koivisto, 162 Mich. 554, 127 N. W. 680.

But in Schmucker v. Lawler, 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 578, it was held that, under a bulk sales statute providing that a sale of goods in bulk in violation thereof shall be deemed fraudulent and voidable as against the creditors of the seller, while the goods sold are liable to execution in favor of any creditor of the seller, as if no sale had taken place, a creditor has no remedy against the purchaser, as garnishee, in a statutory "attachment execution" intended to reach debts due from a third person to a judgment debtor, and property of the latter held by a third person for him and as his property, as the purchaser cannot be considered a debtor of the seller, and as between them the property is the former's absolutely, so that he does not hold it for, or as the property of, the latter.

And in Bewley v. Sims, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 145 S. W. 1076, it was held that the purchaser of a stock of goods in violation of the bulk sales law, who has resold the

Mr. Robert Jackson also for plaintiff.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs seek to charge the trustee for the value of the stock of goods sold by the principal defendant to the trustee, for which the latter paid an adequate consideration, and which he has since disposed of in the regular course of business. It is conceded that, in the absence of the statute upon which the plaintiffs rely (Laws 1909, chap. 69, § 1), the sale would be deemed valid, and the trustee would be discharged. The statute referred to is as follows: "The sale in bulk of any part or the whole of a stock of merchandise, otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade and in the regular and usual prosecution of the seller's business, shall be fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the seller, unless the purchaser demands and receives from the seller a written list of names and addresses of creditors of the seller, and certified by the seller, under oath, to be, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a full, accurate, and complete list of his creditors; and unless the purchaser shall, at least five days before taking possession and becoming the owner of such merchandise, or paying therefor, notify personally, or by registered mail, every creditor whose name and address are stated in said list, of the proposed sale and of the terms and conditions thereof."

The plaintiffs' position is that under this statute the sale in question was fraudulent and void as against them, creditors of the vendor, and that they are entitled to recover their debt by trustee process of the vendee. If it is assumed that the statute gave them the right to secure their claim by an attachment of the stock of goods in the possession of the vendee, it does not follow that they charge him as a trustee of the vendor for the value of the goods. The statute pur-goods to another, is not personally liable at the suit of a creditor of the fraudulent seller, who has not, by attachment, garnishee proceedings, or otherwise, acquired a lien on the goods sold, although the statute provides that a sale in violation thereof shall be void as against creditors of the seller or transferrer. The court said: "It is true the act declares void any sale such as here alleged; but no trust relation, and no lien upon or right in the property so unlawfully purchased, is specifically conferred upon the vendor's creditors, as would have been so easy, had such been the legislative purpose. Nor do we think such lien or right is to be implied" etc.

On the other hand, in Fitz Henry v. Munter, 33 Wash. 629, 74 Pac. 1003, where creditors of one who had sold a stock of goods in violation of a bulk sales law providing that such a sale should be void as to creditors of the seller, were allowed to intervene in an action for the purchase price of the goods, and secure a distribution of the proceeds of the sale pro rata to all of the creditors who were parties to the suit, such proceeds being less than the total amount of their claims against the vendor, the court said: "We also think that the object of this law was to hold the goods of debtors under such circumstances as a trust fund for the benefit of all the creditors, and to hold the purchaser in possession as a trustee for such creditors."

And in Kohn v. Fishbach, 36 Wash. 69, 104 Am. St. Rep. 941, 78 Pac. 199, it was held that a creditor of one who has sold 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) a stock of goods in violation of the bulk sales law may recover the amount of his debt, if not more than the value of the goods sold, by a garnishment proceeding against the purchaser, although the latter, at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment, is not indebted to the seller and has disposed of the goods, the court saying: "It is true, the garnishee answered, and probably in accordance with the facts, that he did not at that time have any of the property of the defendant in his possession, and that he was not indebted to him. But, in contemplation of law, he had the property of the defendant in his hands, because, having purchased the property in fraud of law, without complying with the provisions of the law in relation to sales of property in bulk, he stood in the position of a trustee of the property, responsible to the cestui que trust, or the creditors, for the disposition of such property."
